APPLE PIE.—Line a tin or granite plate with a thin crust. Cut sour apples in quarters, remove the cores and skins, and cut each quarter in two pieces lengthwise. Fill the plate, putting the pieces of apple round the edge in regular order, and piling slightly in the middle. When the apples are not juicy, add a little water. Cover with crust without wetting the edges, and bake about half an hour. When nearly done, boil three heaping tablespoonfuls of sugar and one of water five minutes. Add the grated rind of one quarter of a lemon, or one tablespoonful of lemon juice. When the pie is done, remove to an earthen plate, pour the syrup through a cut in the top, or raise the upper crust and pour it over the fruit, or simply sprinkle with sugar and bits of butter. Replace the crust; the steam will dissolve the sugar and the pie will be sweeter and of better flavor than if sweetened before baking.

BEEF TONGUE AND OLIVES.—One fresh beef tongue, one bottle of olives, two dozen large, clean, bright, dry Chili peppers, one teacupful (ordinary size) of best vinegar, or, better still, squeeze the juice of two lemons into the cup and fill with vinegar, one teaspoonful of powdered summer savory, two tablespoonfuls finely chopped onion (should be small green onions, but dry will do), salt and olive oil, as you like it. Dissolve a half teacupful of salt in enough boiling water to cover the tongue, cook until done, and only done, or you will have rags. When cool, remove the skin and cut into very thin slices, and the tongue is ready for the sauce. Cut open the peppers the long way, take out every seed and vein, cut off the stem end, drop the skins into an agate kettle of boiling salted water (half cupful of salt). Press the skins under the water and keep at boiling heat for two hours, but the water must not even simmer, or you will find both taste and color gone. Skim into chopping bowl, be sure all water is pressed out,—chop until you have a glowing mass of red pulp; press through a seive to remove skins, and your sauce is ready to season. Do not put in all the salt needed, as the olives will add salt. Add oil and vinegar by spoonful; no danger of curdling. Put in olives last. Dip each slice of tongue into the sauce, pile the slices into a deep dish and pour over them the remaining sauce; serve the next part of the butter thin and lay it on the middle of the paste. Fold the sides towards the middle, then the ends over, and double again. Pat and roll out again. Repeat this process with the remaining pieces of butter. When the butter is all rolled in, the paste should be rolled and folded till no streaks of butter can be seen. After the last rolling, place it on the ice to harden, as it may be cut and shaped more easily.

A religious impostor in New Jersey has been made to feel the pinch of one of those old laws which the stern Puritans of a hundred years ago thought necessary for the defence of true religion against the machination of fraud and humbug. The impostor is charged with "impersonating our Saviour Jesus Christ and permitting his followers to worship or pay him divine honors, and for deluding and abusing the people and for false denunciations of judgment." And if found guilty, the penalty is six months' imprisonment and a $100 fine. It is too bad that such obselete methods of applying the straight jacket of the State for aberrations in theology, should be enforced in an enlightened community like New Jersey. The man is evidently a "crank," if not absolutely insane, and it seems a pity to sully the crown of martyrdom by giving it to such.

A Strictly Business Basis.

A wretched-looking tramp went into an Austin saloon and begged with tears in his eyes for the barkeeper to give him a nickel with which to get something to eat. He got it. As soon as he got it in his hand he slapped it down on the bar and said in a loud, vociferous, peremptory tone of voice:

"Beer!"

It was several minutes before the barkeeper could catch his breath, and then he was eloquent.

"Well, if that ain't gall, I hope I may never live to see any. Why, you—you—you—" etc.

"No speeches. Begging is my business and beer-jerking is yours. Just you attend to your business and I'll attend to mine. It is going to be a cold winter, and if you want to keep your job you had better attend to it," said the mendicant.

The partially paralyzed barkeeper handed out the schooner, the tramp downed it slowly and drifted out, perfectly satisfied with that little business transaction.

The Worst on Record.

Hans Van Spigen is notorious for the quality of his cider, and he is, furthermore, notorious for being the meanest, stingiest Dutchman in existence. He was never known to give a living soul one drop of his delicious beverage.

Now at the time of the following occurrence our friend John Barnes, being on a visit and hearing of the excellent quality of Hans' cider rode over to his farm one morning, when the following conversation took place.

"Good morning, Hans."

"Coot morning', Zhon."

"Hans, you have a fine orchard?"

"Oh, yes, coot orchard."

"Fine press, that of yours?"

"Yes, vine press, vine orchard."

"Hans, I hear your cider is the best in the country?"

"Zhon,, (to his son), "go down and draw us a mug of cider."

John braught up the desired mug, and Hans drained it to the bottom, then, turning rornd to the astonished Barnes, said:

"If you don't believe dat's goot cider, smell de mug."—[Albany Argus.

An English Medical Authority

affirms that the best regimen for preserving health may be summed up in the maxim, "keep the head cool, the feet warm, and the bowls active." There is a world of wisdom in the observation. Obstinate constipation, or costiveness, is an exciting cause of other diseases; and, with many persons of sedentary habits, or occupations, this inaction of the bowels is a source of constant annoyance, producing piles, prolapse of the rectum, fistula, and various dyspeptic symptoms. All these are warded off, and health is maintained, by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets.

The Ohio cabbage trust has busted. It possibly lacked a head.

"Like sunshine in a shady place,"
The poet called a woman's face
That gladden'd all who saw its beauty.
A face, no doubt, that beamed with health
That blessing which is more than wealth,
And lightens every daily duty.
O how can woman, whose hard life
With many wearing pain is rife,
Escape the grasp of such affliction,
And be a power to bless and cheer?
The answer comes both swift and clear—
Take Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is the only medicine for woman's peculiar weaknesses and ailments, sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers, of satisfaction being given in every case or money refunded. See guarantee printed on bottle-wrapper.

greatest carnivals of modern times the Star number is simply incomparable. The price is 35c. a copy.

—The basket social at Selby on ...y evening was a decided success. ... a number went out from town, among others, several young men. When the drawing of the numbers took place, it was found that some of the younger boys had secured comely matrons for partners. They did the agreeable as well as could be expected under the circumstances, and the ladies say that the boys behaved well.

—The Napanee Cement Company are advertising for elm stave bolts and logs, to be delivered either at Napanee Mills or at points along the line of the N. T. & Q. Railway. Heretofore, elm trees have been cut into cordwood in this section of country, but owing to the Rathbun Company starting this new industry in our midst, those having elm timber to sell, will secure much better prices than were formerly paid.

—To whom it may concern. Parties in want of flour, feed, corn meal, bran and shorts, will consult their best interests by calling at the big mill before purchasing elsewhere. A large quantity of bran on hand which must be sold; cash will buy it cheap in quantities. J. R. DAFOE. P. S.—Best grades of roller and stone flour constantly on hand. 789c.

—The fortnightly re-union given by the ladies of St. Mary Magdalene's church, as usual, passed off very successfully, although the attendance was not as large as on former occasions. The programme was well rendered. During the evening the Archdeacon stated that the ladies had donated $100 toward paying the debt of the church, and that a similar sum had been given by Dr Cook. The proceeds of Tuesdays entertainment amounted to $23.

THE FIRESIDE WEEKLY is made up exclusively of stories, poetry, and answers to correspondents. The Sheppard Publishing Company truthfully claim it to be the cheapest family story paper in America, its price being $2 per year, while that of its American rivals, not one whit better in style and much inferior as to contents, are each $3 per annum. We offer THE FIRESIDE WEEKLY and the Napanee EXPRESS at $2 per annum. Could anyone ask more? 789d

—The sale of the stock of W. D. Madden, advertised to take place on Monday afternoon, was, at that time postponed until Tuesday, and then again postponed until February 8th. The Sheriff has made a seizure of the stock, under certain executions in his hands, and it is now understood that the matter will have to be settled by an interpleader suit. It will be remembered that the stock was offered for sale under a chattle mortgage held by Mrs. W. D. Madden.

—The orchestral concert given in the Opera Hall last Friday evening under the auspices of the Y. P. A. of the W. M. C. brought together a large audience. The Telgmann orchestra is a fair musical organization bnt in our humble judgment their playing was not evenly balanced. However, they succeeded in pleasing the audience. Mr. Sherlock was suffering from hoarseness and was by no means in as good voice as when he last appeared here. His rendering of Annie Lawrie was very sweet, and in his two numbers with Miss Anna Fralick he sang well. Miss Fralick really did herself credit, her rendering of "A Lullaby Song" as an encore being especially good. Miss Dorette Telgmann pleased the audience both in her vocal and violin solos. Miss Cook, organist of the Western Methodist Church, presided at the piano in a very acceptable manner. The proceeds were most satisfactory, and added a snug sum to the funds of the Young Peoples Association.

—Read Mr. Hutchinsons advertisement regarding the sale of thoroughbred imported horses. He has some good ones.

—The Swiss Bell Rfngers will appear at the Opera House on Thursday and Friday evenings of next week. Prices ten and twenty cents.

—A good muff was left in Mr. T. Jamieson's sitting room about three weeks ago. The owner can have it, by proving property and paying for this notice.

—Elsewhere will be found the card of Dr. W. H. Nicholls. The doctor is rapidly earning a reputation as a skillful veterinary surgeon. His headquarters are Bath.

—Read Geo. I Ham's advertisement regarding bargains in groceries. He has moved into Sam McLaughlin's old stand, and is now prepared to offer rare bargains.

—On Thursday evening of last week, Mr. T. D. Pruyn installed the officers of A. O. U. W. Lodge No. 295, Adolphustown, after which he was entertained at an oyster supper at Pooles hotel.

Quarterly services will be held in the Eastern Methodist chnrch on Sunday next. Love feast and fellowship meeting will be held at twenty minutes of ten, regular service at eleven, and the sacrament administered after the evening service.

—If you want choice confectionery, or first class home made bread, call on W. H. Davis. He guarantees satisfaction.

—There will be a Scott Act convention in the Napanee town hall on Thursday next at half past one o'clock. Among other things the plan of campaign will be mapped out. It is a foregone conclusion that there will be a fight, and it will likely be a bitter one. Let there be grand rally.

—Have you wood for sale? If so, read what the Napanee Paper Company advertise for in another part of this paper. They require over three thousand cords of hard and soft wood, to be delivered at their mills in Newburgh and Napanee. Full particulars on application. The company only want wood four feet in length and of good quality.

—It is said that a couple of would-be sports attempted to get up a prize fight for $20 a side within the past few days. Friends interfered, and the fight was declared off. Surely these parties can find something else to do than engaging in such disgraceful proceedings. We withhold names out of respect for their families.

—The Napanee Paper Company want two hundred cords of basswood, one thousand cords of soft wood and five hundred cords of hard wood delivered at their mills in Newburgh. They also want one thousand cords of soft wood and one thousand cords of hardwood delivered at their works in Napanee Mills. All of the above wood is to be four feet long, and of good sound quality. For further information apply to the Napanee Paper Company.

—On Wednesday evening Rev. B. F. Stratton, of Tamworth, was the recipient of an address and a purse containing $10. The presentation was made by the rev. gentleman's bible class, the money being intended to provide a suitable covering for their teachers head. We might just say that a few days ago the congregation made ample provision for his back, by presenting him with a splendid fur coat. Evidently Mr. Stratton's congregation mean to take good care of their pastor. Our testimony is that he richly deserves a lot of such treatment.

—On Friday evening of next week the new parsonage of the Western Methodist church, will be thrown open to the public for the first time. The Young Peoples' Association are arranging a good programme, so that an enjoyable evening is assured. Instead of a fixed charge at the door, a plate offering will be taken, and we trust that the friends will respond liberally. Everybody will be made heartily welcome.

Their home was always a welcome rest for the weary preacher and many found shelter and comfort there. She was a constant and consistant attendant on the means of grace until a few years before her death. She possessed a sublime faith in a future state of happiness, and longed to depart, knowing that to be absent from the body was to be present with the Lord. Her memory is cherished as a sacred legacy, and unto each of her children, grand children and great grand children, she has left a name which is of more value than thousands of gold and silver. The memory of the just is blessed.

MRS. BENJAMIN CLARK.

The residents of Camden East and vicinity were suprised and grieved on Thursday, Jan. 24th inst., to hear of the sudden illness of Mrs. B. Clark—whose maiden name was Eunice Amantha Barnes. The alarm became greater when it was known to be a severe attack of pleuro-pneumonia, and each day left less hope of recovery. Though all that medical aid and good attendance could do was done, yet the worst fears were realized on Wednesday morning 30th inst., at 4.40, when she was released from the labors and anxieties of life, at the age of sixty-seven years, to enjoy that eternal rest that remains for the people of God. Her aged husband and three children—one son and two daughters—remain to realize that a faithful wife and devoted mother has been taken from them. Not one of the latter was able to be present during her illness and death, her son Mr. Percy Clark, of Kingston, being absent on a business trip to Manitoba and Northwest, and her elder daghter, Mrs. C. Fraser, of Trenton, having gone to Jamiaca to spend the winter in visiting her only sister Mrs. A. D. Cadenhead who resides there. Mrs. Clark was a consistent member of the Methodist church, not only evincing her christian character by attending the public services of the sanctuary, but also in the sunshine and cheer of her own home. It may truthfully be said of her that every act was influenced more or less by self-denial, ever forgetful of self she was always ready to help others. Even when suffering intensely during her last few days upon earth, she often feared that those around her would become wearied by waiting upon her. Thus she never ceased thinking of others until a higher power said—"Cease from labor and be at rest."

—The marriage of Dr. H. H. Davidson, Toronto, to Miss Carrie McDonald, daughter of Mr. Robert McDonald, proprietor of the Revere house, took place in St. Andrew's Presbyterian church, King street west, Toronto, on Wednesday evening. The ceremony was preformed by Rev. D. J. Macdonell, pastor of the church. The bridesmaids were: Miss Fannie Hosey and Miss Georgina Knight, and the groomsmen, Mr. Wm. Davidson, brother of the groom, and Fred D. McDonald, brother of the bride. After the ceremony the party adjourned to the Revere house, where supper was partaken of by a large number of invited guests. A beautiful array of presents was received by the bride. The young couple left by the eleven o'clock train for a honeymoon trip to the United States. On leaving the Revere, they received the customary demonstration of good wishes from a host of friends. We extend congratulations.

OBITUARY.

PAISLEY.

Nathaniel F. Paisley, so well known in Napanee and the surrounding country, passed away about nine o'clock last Friday morning. For the past three months "Than" has been gradually getting weaker, and for several weeks he has been confined to the house. Deceased was born in the village of Enterprise, a little over thirty-one years ago, was married to Miss Addie Douglass, of Tamworth, some half a dozen years since, and she survives him. Mr. Paisley was a member of Napanee Lodge I. O. O. F. No. 86. The funeral took place from his mother's residence on John street, on Sunday afternoon and was very largely attended, upwards of one hundred and forty Oddfellows joining in the procession. Deceased was a brother of Mr. John Paisley with whom he was associated in the grocery trade, also of Charles Paisley and of Mrs. Angus McLeod and Mrs. Walter Coxall, all of Napanee, to whom our sympathy is extented.

ABBOTT.

Margaret Smith, widow of Ralph Abbott, sr., deceased, died Dec. 31st, 1888, at her home, in the township of Tyendinaga, Hastings County, Ont., at the advanced age of 93 years, 6 months and 14 days. Mrs. Abbott was born in Albany county, New York State. She was married in 1816, and came to Canada with her husband and parents and settled in Richmond in 1824. Subsequently she and her husband moved to the adjoining township, called Tyendinaga, in 1827, where she spent the remainder of her life, sixty-one years. When they settled on the new farm it was a wilderness; to-day it is one of the finest farms in Canada. Mrs. Abbott was the mother of seven children, two sons and five daughters, all survive her but one son, Ralph Abbott; she leaves twenty grandchildren and thirteen great grandchildren. Her family are all Methodists, although she was brought up a strict Lutheran, but at a revival held by Revds. John Sills and Savage, she with her sister, Mrs. Stafford, were savingly converted to God and joined the Methodist church in 1836, continuing faithful until the Master called them home to their eternal reward.

Don't be deceived by cheap sales of every and any description. Oftentimes the so called cheap Goods prove the dearest in the end. We want you to understand our position. Encouraged by the large increase in our sales last year over the year before, we have purchased very largely for this season. A look through our establishment will soon convince you that our stock is larger and better assorted than ever before.

Our imports alone are larger than that of all the other dealers combined and almost every line, (except. ing perhaps a few lines of staples) is confined to ourselves. Thus we are able to give you a class of goods which cannot be had any place else. Now regarding our prices, everything is marked right down to the lowest possible figure. They can't be marked lower and allow us to clear ourselves. Add to this the fact that by buying direct, we have saved the middleman's commission and you will easily see that our goods should be cheap. No pains will be spared to give you satisfaction in every way. Every piece of Goods will be found to turn out exactly as represented. We want your custom, and if good, honest goods and straight forward dealing are any inducement, we are sure of getting it.

RIDAY, MARCH 22, 1889. VOL. XXVIII, No. 16.

COUNTY COUNCIL.

WARDEN FILSON MAKES AN EXHIBITION OF HIMSELF.

Disgraceful Proceedings in the Council Chamber.

This week we continue the report of the County Council proceedings. In our last issue we included all that transpired up till Thursday night. On Friday, when the committee on Roads and Bridges were in session, the Warden made repeated efforts to have a clause introduced into their report censuring Major Patterson, of Amherst Island. This the committee refused to do. On Friday afternoon, when the report was presented, the council went into Committee of the Whole to consider the report. This gave the Warden his anxiously sought for opportunity to air his spite against the gallant Major. Right here we might say that last year money was expended on roads in Amherst Island without a township engineer having been appointed to superintend the expenditure. No one pretends to say that the money was improperly expended, and Warden Filson's anxiety to attack Major Patterson is the sole reason for trying to drag the matter before the public. Last year's council fully dealt with the matter, therefore the Warden was going out of his way and wasting the time of the council in endeavoring to attack a man who is in every way his superior.

The committee refused to deal with the Warden's so-called grievance, although he persisted in wasting nearly three hours of valuable time in airing his opinions.

On Saturday morning, however, the Warden went to the council chamber with blood in his eye. He had inveigled two other members into introducing the following resolution:

That a return having been made to this council of the expenditure of county money on roads for 1888, which had not been expended under the supervision of a properly appointed engineer and this council having accepted said return on the statement of the representative of the municipality for which the return was made, that the irregularity occurred because he did not know of the requirements of the by-law governing the expenditure of said money, be it therefore resolved than in future the by-law governing the expenditure of money on county roads be strictly enforced.

As soon as the motion was made the Warden

after asking Mr Cyrus Allison to preside, and immediately went out of the council chamber. This was but a blind, however, for he only went into the ante-room, and very soon appeared in the council room again. According to all rule he should at once have taken the chair, but he did not do so. He had and a fight he was going to have. Mr. Parks spoke against the resolution, pointing out that the Amherst Island expenditure had been dealt with last year, and that other municipalities had improperly expended money so that no one municipality be so insulted next session, I would resign rather than come back."

The Warden's conduct is everywhere condemned and if he again attempts any such bar-room actions he will be taught a lesson that he will not soon forget.

Friday Morning.

The council met at 10 a. m., pursuant to adjournment, the warden in the chair, members all present.

Minutes of yesterday read and confirmed.

Mr. Lapum brought in the first report of the Finance committee.

On motion it was received and adopted.

Moved by Mr. Sweetnam, seconded by Mr. Lapum, that the warden be paid the sum of $20, the same being his expenses in accompanying the Newburgh deputation to Toronto to assist them in obtaining a grant for said municipality. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Sweetnam, that the sum of $36.60 be paid to Mr. Sweetnam; the sum of $26.65 to Mr. L. Wagar, and the sum of $25.60 to Mr. Bryden, the same being the expenses re deputation to Toronto as per resolution of last session of this council. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Sweetnam, that Messrs. Filson, Jas. Reid, Sexsmith, Parks and Lapum, be each paid the sum of $31.10, the same being their expenses to Ottawa on deputation as appointed last session. Carried

Moved by Mr. Sweetnam, seconded by Mr. Parks, that the clerk be instructed to have the report of both Toronto and Ottawa deputations printed in the minutes. Carried Moved by Mr. Jackson, seconded by Mr. Pdrks, that the order of proceedings for reading of by-laws be opened. Carried.

On motion the council went intc committee of whole on the second reading of the by-law to fix the treasurer's salary. Mr. Jackson in the chair. The committee rose and the chairman reported the second reading of the by-law amended so as to make the salary $700 instead of $600 as first proposed.

The report of the committee of whole was adopted on motion of Mr. Jackson, seconded by Mr. Roblin.

Mr. Lapum brought in the report of the finance committee.

On motion it was received and adopted.

On motion the council adjourned until 2 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

At 2 p. m. the council resumed, the warden in the chair, members all present.

Moved by Mr. Jackson, seconded by Mr. Baker, that Rule 38 be suspended for the purposes of the by-law to fix the treasurer's salary. Carried.

Mr. T. V. Sexsmith brought in the first report of the committee on roads and bridges, which is as follows:

Your committee on Roads and Bridges beg leave to report and recommend as follows:

1st. That the sum of $6.149 be expended on co[illegible] roads and the sum of $1,025 as special grants, to be appropriated as follows:

COUNTERFEIT MONEY OFFERED.

Negotiations Opened With a Napanee Merchant.

On Monday last a prominent merchant of this town, received the following circular:

DEAR SIR,—

You have been referred to me as a trustworthy person and one who can keep his own counsel, therefore I would be pleased to open a correspondence with you in regard to the business which I propose, and if you will be guided by my advice and experience there is no reason why you should not make a sure and safe fortune. There is absolutely no risk as the article is (good) money and is perfect as the enclosed newspaper clipping will prove. The sizes are $1's, $2's, $5's and $10's. My terms are $2,000 cost $250, $3000 cost $300, $5,000 cost $400, $10,000 cost $650, $20,000 cost $1,000 and so on at an increasing ratio, so the more you invest the cheaper you get the goods. $2000 in the goods, costing $250, is the lowest amount I will sell under any circumstances, and if you will take $10,000, costing $650, or $20,000, costing $1,000, I will give you the right of your state and no one else can get the goods in your state. Furthermore I do not give you the goods at these figures after the first deal. I only give them now as an extra inducement, and to give you a start, after the first deal, I charge at the rate of 25 cents on the dollar. Now my friend, if you wish to enter this speculation it will be absolutely necessary for you to come here and see me personally as I will only deal face to face with my customers which is the safest and most satisfactory way for both, as by your coming here you will see what you are buying and I see who I am dealing with and both feel better satisfied. I know it is quite a journey for you to come here, but look at the advantages and again think of the large profits to be made and no risks, and so far as expense is concerned I always make a liberal allowance in the goods to cover all expenses. Make up your mind to come here, you will find me a square white man in all my dealings and will never have cause to regret a visit to me. I will meet you in New York City any time you may appoint which I trust will be soon and I will show you my entire stock from which you can make your own selections, then if my goods are not all I claim them to be, I will pay your fare from and to your home. Now what fairer can you ask? In Gods name do not betray me, or mention to a living soul what passes between us as I have never done you any harm and never shall, but will prove a true and lasting friend to you. Make up your mind to come here and in my next letter I will name a hotel for you to stop at, how you will know me and full instructions. Be sure and send me your name and postoffice address as I might lose the one I now have. I will always return your letter to you, and as a guarantee of your confidence I also request the return of this letter and newspaper clipping.

Trusting you will answer at once and return this letter

I remain yours in confidence.

The merchant brought the circular to THE EXPRESS for publication. It is to be hoped that anyone who receives a similar circular will treat it exactly as has been done in this case. Just imagine the cheek of the brazen faced scoundrel in appealing in God's name not to be betrayed. We have the slip containing the address and will see that it reaches the proper authorities.

and a fight he was going to have. Mr. Parks spoke against the resolution, pointing out that the Amherst Island expenditure had been dealt with last year, and that other municipalities had improperly expended money, so that no one municipality ought to be singled out for attack.

The Warden lost his temper completely, and waded into the discussion with more than his usual roughness, even going so far as to stride across the chamber and shake his fist under Mr. Parks' nose. He made a most uncalled for attack on Major Patterson, ex-reeve of Amherst Island, and then resumed his seat as Warden of the county. Several members then spoke against the resolution, and Mr. Parks again pressed the objections previously raised. He also pointed out that as there was a by-law in force it was absurd to pass a motion that the by-law should be enforced.

By this time the Warden was

and again left the chair to reply to the reeve of North Fredericksburgh. Such a scene was never witnessed before in this or any other county. We have never before heard of a presiding officer of any body ever making such an exhibition of himself as did the "distinguished gentleman" from Amherst Island on Saturday last.

Again the first shaking scene was re-enacted and again the Warden resumed the chair.

Reeve Parks then arose to move an amendment, but the Warden refused to listen to him and waving the original motion said. "Are the rest of you ready? I won't listen to this man."

By this time the excitement was intense. the Warden insisting on putting the motion and Mr. Parks holding the floor, refusing to be ignored, and insisting on his right to move an amendment.

The Conservative members of the council were now thoroughly ashamed of their choice.

Reeve Sexsmith, of Richmond, sprang to his feet, and telling Mr. Parks to hold his position, turned to the Warden and indignantly protested against the course he was pursuing. He insisted that Mr. Parks had the right to move an amendment.

The Warden yelled out "I have left this chair twice and if I leave it again it won't be as Warden or Councillor, but as a man to defend myself, and—tapping his coat pocket—"I have got the thing here to do it." No attention was paid to this threat and finally he had to pull in his horns and receive the amendment which was put and lost. The original motion was then put and carried by a majority of one on a straight party vote.

The council adjourned shortly after the motion had been dealt with and then a

2nd. That the chairman of the Roads and Bridges committee, and Messrs. James Reid, and Fraser be authorized to examine a bridge on the Napanee, Camden, and Sheffield county road, at the village of Selby, and if they consider it necessary, to repair or have a new wooden bridge erected, abutments to be built with stone, and cement, sufficient for an iron bridge if ever found necessary to place an iron structure thereon, and that the treasurer be authorized to advance funds when required on the order of the chairman of the Roads and Bridges committee, and that the committee furnish this council with a statement in detail of the expenditure if any.

3rd. That the chairman of the Roads and Bridges committee, and Messrs. Fraser and Parks, be authorized to examine a bridge on the Napanee and Kingston county road known as Kaylors bridge, and if they consider it necessary, to repair or have a new wooden bridge erected abutments to be built with stone and cement sufficient for an iron bridge, if ever found necessary to place an iron structure thereon, and that the treasurer be authorized to advance funds when required on the order of the chairman of of the Roads and Bridges committee, and that the committee furnish this council with a statement in detail of the expenditure if any.

4th. With regard to the communication from the Deseronto cemetery company asking for a bridge with double driveway on the Napanee and Deseronto county road, and for permission to build a boardwalk from the town limits to the cemetery. This council having already repaired said bridge we would reccommend that permission be granted to build said boardwalk providing it does not interfere with the public travel.

5th. That the sum of $995 asked for by resolution of Mr. Baker for Colebrook bridge, be not granted, but the township of Camden may have the privilege of expending $500 of their appropriations for county roads for 1889 and $495 of their appropriation for county roads for 1890, for the purpose of completing Colebrook bridge,

6th. That on the resolution of Mr. Parks, asking a grant of $400 to assist in paying the expense of building bridge in North Fredericksburgh at Close's Mills, we recommend that North Fredericksburgh have the privilege of using $100 of their appropriation for county roads for 1889 for that purpose.

7th. That on the account of Mr. Wm. Chambers for damages sustained on bridge on boundary line between Ernesttown and North Fredericksburgh, we recommend that the sum of $5 be paid in full of said account.

8th. That the chairman of the Roads and Bridges Committee receive one day's pay and mileage for his services in connection with the repairing of Unger's bridge on the Napanee and Deseronto county road, he having been authorized to have said bridge repaired at the January session.

THE CARRUTHERS' ESTATE.

A Wealthy Man's Will.

The will of the late Mr. John Carruther's was probated on Monday. The amount left by deceased is $575,000. Of this sum the two sons of the deceased, William Colin and W. Bruce Matthews, and the daughters, Mrs. Major Short and Miss Maud Helen, get $75,000 each, but draw only interest on it. If they die without issue the money will be divided among such of deceased's children as are alive. Should either of the deceased's four children die without issue, but leaving husband or wife, then $25,000 of the $75,000 shall be paid to such husband or wife, and the balance disposed of as provided in the preceding paragraph. To Mrs. McLean, wife of Rev. Mr. McLean, Belleville, is left $5,000 for the education of deceased's nephew. To J. B. Carruther's, the eldest son, is left absolutely $275,000.

The personal estate and effects amount to $517,000, and the real estate to $58,000. The details are: Household goods, $6,000; book debts and promissory notes, $165,000; money secured by mortgage, $170,000; bank shares and other stocks, $22,000; securities for money, $154,000; real estate, $58,000; total, $575,000.

swindle that leaves the "dull-less oat scheme" a long way behind happened near Avon, Middlesex county, not long ago. On Jan. 23 an elegantly dressed young couple, handsome and gay, drove up to a wealthy rmer's residence accompanied by a young man whom he introduced as Rev. L. B. Simes. The young man told the farmer that he was on his road to Ingersoll to be married, but just a short distance from there they met the minister, and noticing your beautiful place the bride remarked that she would rather be married out there than go into Ingersoll, and if he would allow them to be united in marriage in his house and be provided with a wedding dinner he would be well rewarded.

The farmer, being an accommodating man readily consented and preparations soon began. A groomsman and bridesmaid were furnished from the good man's family and the marriage ceremony performed by the man of much grace, who gave the blushing bride certificate, but before doing so he asked the obliging host to sign as a witness, which of course was done. A jollier party never sat down to a wedding dinner than they, in fact everybody enjoyed a rare treat. They stayed until about 4 o'clock, when the groom handed the farmer $40 in gold to compensate him for his trouble and took his departure, accompanied by his new wife and the minister.

Everything passed off lovely for about a week, when a collector presented a $440 note due on Feb. 1. The farmer was greatly surprised and it was some time before he could think what note it could be. However, it came to his memory that he had a wedding at his house a while ago, and now he had to foot up to the tune of $440. There is no doubt but this whole affair was a deep laid plot, and had been some time in maturing. The young married couple and the minister are away on a visit, and it is not likely they will return very soon.

Use GRANGE'S COUGH-NOT

A Circumstantial Evidence.

And English lawyer once said that circumstantial evidence would hang the King of England. While that was putting it pretty strong, it is admitted that a chain of circumstantial evidence has often sent men to he gallows. If a circumstance can be explained away, it is but a shadow. If it cannot be explained away, it becomes a menace to the prisoner's life. A witness may be bribed, abducted, or impeached. A circumstance is a lion in the path demanding blood.

It has been often asserted that innocent men have been hung on circumstantial evidence. There may have been such instances, but they have been rare indeed. In my own experience in law and detective work I have seen some curious things about circumstantial evidence. It is, in one sense, the strangest chain which can be forged, in another the very weakest.

About twenty years ago I was detailed on a murder case in a Kentucky town. It was not to work up the case, but to save if possible the young man arrested for the crime. When I got the facts and details I felt helpless to accomplish anything. He was a young man of 23, named Graham, and was of respectable family. He had been engaged to a young lady of the highest respectability. but they had quarrelled about something. Common friends had brought about a reconciliation, but a new suitor had appeared upon the sceane, and Graham's jealousy had provoked another quarrel. He had not visited her for two weeks, when on the evening of Saturday, Oct. 30., one of Graham's friends met him and said:

"Your rival is up at Lossing's and seems bound to cut you out. Adele seems very sweet on him."

Graham truly loved the girl, and this speech made him wild. He turned pale, trembled, and finally said:

"He is an adventurer and an interloper. Let him look out for himself!"

An hour later he started for Lossing's. He passed several people who saw that he was excited. The house stood back from the road in a grove of trees, and was approached by two paths or drives from the front. Graham fully intended to enter the house, but when he came upon the grounds his courage failed him. He was afraid he might say or do something rash in his present mood, and very sensibly decided to return to town and defer his call till the next day. Next morning his rival's dead body was found on one of the drives, about half way between the house and the fence. He had been struck down with a bludgeon. Conclusions are always jumped at in murder cases. Two of the negro servants were at once arrested, but before noon they were set at liberty and Graham was taken into custody. The chain already contained several links. Others were added the moment he was arrested. He was dreadfully agitated, hesitated to acknowledge that he had been near the place, and a blood stain was found on the right side of his vest. Before he had been in jail one day even his own father believed him a murderer. He was examined and bound over, and it was only after that event that he began to protest his innocence. The girl who had been the cause of it came nobly to his rescue. While she truly loved him, she had been willing to make him jealous, and when murder had come of it, as she believed, she felt terrible conscience stricken and anxious to believe in his protestations of innocence.

When I came upon the ground, the State had its case all worked up, and when I went over it to look for a flaw I could find none. I had to acknowledge that I was without ly. I arrested him, charged him with the crime, and he did not hold out fifteen minutes. His motive was robbery. He did not intend to kill his victim, but only to stun him. He had just struck him when the dogs barked greeting to Graham, and, overcome by sudden fright, Foster dashed away and dared not return. He thought he had only to keep still to render himself safe, and, but for my being present when the saddle was found, he might never have been suspected. Graham was cleared and Foster was hanged. The change had been brought about by the fondling of a dog.

The second case occurred in Ohio, in a town not far from Cincinnati. A young man, Frank Meyers, had become infatuated with a doubtful woman. The affair created a scandal, and his father and friends made every effort to break it up. The young man was finally brought to see the error of his ways, but when he attempted to sever the tie the woman sought to hold him by threats. This angered him, and he indulged in some hard talk of what he would do in case she further annoyed him. Thus matters stood when he set out one evening to see her and make a last attempt to settle. It was a summer night, and they were seen walking in the suburbs of the town. They were overheard in angry talk. She defied him. He returned home pale and excited, his clothing disarranged, and his face bleeding from scratches. An hour later she was found dead, choked to death.

Young Meyers was arrested at midnight. He did not even assert his innocence. It was only on his examination that he protested, and even his own father believed him guilty. I happened to be in the town, and the way I came into the case was by relating the incidents of the one I have already narrated. The prisoner himself sent for me and told me this story:

"I met the woman, Mrs. Albright, by appointment. We walked out on Clark avenue to be alone. I told her that my mind was firmly made up to see her no more, and she was very angry. I should have returned with her, but at the little bridge she ordered me to leave her, threatening to do desperate things if I did not relent by the morrow. I did not return by the highway, as our meeting was a secret one and I did not want it known. I crossed a corner of the graveyard, fell off the fence as I did so, and there my face was scratched by the briers.

"But you hardly denied your guilt," I said.

"Because I was confused and stunned by my arrest, and because I saw no use of it," he replied. "I have told you the truth. I want you to help me prove myself clear."

I left him with the feeling that he was lying to me, and that nothing could be done in his case. Ten or twelve days had elapsed, but there had been no rain. I went to the bridge, crossed the creek at the point he told me to, and soon came upon his trail. At the graveyard fence I found a broken rail and the spot where he had fallen. I found the briers broken and crushed, and from the thorns I gathered several small fragments belonging to the suit he wore. Further on he had stepped into a ditch where mud was soft at the time. It had now dried hard and preserved the print. I measured it, and when I returned to town I had begun to believe that Meyers was either a good talker or an innocent man. His story was all right in one sense, but all wrong in the other. Did he make the trail while leaving the woman alive or dead?

An old saying always goes with an arrest: "If he didn't do it, who did?" Somebody must be held responsible. After two or three interviews with young Meyers and his parents, I doubted if he could have choked the woman to death. He was frail and in

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

The "Times'" Case—Affairs on the Continent—Is a Storm Brewing in the Balkans?

The collapse of the London "Times's" case has not been brought about without bitter dissensions inside the circle of its legal promoters. Sir Henry James, who had managed to preserve better relations with his former colleagues and to keep open a safer line of retreat than any other prominent Unionist, is furious now with the Attorney-General for dragging him into such a ruinous fiasco, and it is believed to be due to his vigorous protests that it has been decided to bring the case to a conclusion.

Although it cannot be said that an actual war scare prevails on the Continent, King Milan's desertion of his post in Servia has created an excitement which increases rather than diminishes. As the crisis which his act had produced is studied, it means the return of Nathalie in triumph and the restoration of the Pan-Slavist Metropolitan, Michael, and the complete control of the Russian party. St. Petersburg papers in exultation declare that Prince Ferdinand in Bulgaria, and even King Charles in Roumania, must be similarly cleared out without further delay, and, in truth, it looks as if both would have difficulty in riding out of the Slavic storm which has suddenly begun to rock the Balkans.

So far as Europe in general is concerned, the most immediate point of danger is Bosnia, which the Servians regarded as belonging to them and in which it is only too likely that a state of turbulence will be created which Austria will have to quell by force. Once this step is taken all the fat will be in the fire and the Russian legions will be set in motion forthwith.

The very fact that for the first time in five years we have got into March without any war alarms may turn out to be a part of a shrewd Muscovite plan for a huge conquering stroke. For the moment it is sufficient to indicate that this is a fundamental change in the situation. Whereas, up to the present the preservation of peace depended on Russia's unreadiness for war, it will henceforth depend on Austria's willingness to pocket affronts from her little neighbors and her ability to handle a Slavic uprising within her own borders so as not to give a warlike pretext to Russia.

How Jim Misjudged a Stranger.

"Yes, I'm in mourning," said the man, as he carefully removed his hat and gazed at the piece of crape which hid the band. "It's for my brother Jim who was planted about five months ago.'

"Sick long?"

"Not a minnit."

"Accidentally killed, then?"

"You might call it accident, but it wasn't. It was a case of misreading human nature."

The man tenderly brushed some dust off the crape, put on his hat, and after getting good and ready started out with:

"Me and Jim had a ranch on the Republican River, out in Kansas. I didn't amount to much, but Jim was a dandy. Could judge a hoss or a steer a mile off. He could size a up a man as quick as you can halve an apple. Didn't know what fear was, and the Injuns was as afraid of him as death. I've put up a $300 monument at his grave, and you can judge by that he must been a pretty good man."

When I came upon the ground, the State had its case all worked up, and when I went over it to look for a flaw I could find none. I had to acknowledge that I was without hope. Indeed, I believed Graham guilty. His own explanations rather strengthened that belief. Lossing's house faced the east. The highway in front run north and south. The lawn was twenty rods wide, and one drive led in from the north and the other from the south end. Graham approached from the north. He would naturally turn in at the first drive, but he claimed to have gone on to the second. He followed it to the house, passed around it, played for two or three minutes with the dogs, and then circled about the fish pond, and took a short cut across the grove and struck the road, not hitting the north path at all. The dead man had come from the village as well, and on foot. He had come and attempted to return by the north drive.

If Graham was innocent, who was guilty? Not the slightest suspicion had been directed elsewhere. It seemed hopeless to look. I questioned and cross-questioned him, but he could not give me the slightest foundation for a clue or a theory. What I got came by accident. I asked to see the blood-stained clothing, and I found it to be a single daub of blood on a white vest. It was a curious mark, such as I had never seen before, and when I quietly investigated further I discovered that the murdered man had been struck on the back of his head and fallen forward on his face. He had very thick hair, and while the blow had crushed the skull, he had bled but little. The blood would not spurt from such a blow. The body had not been lifted, and so how did Graham get that blood stain? Accident gave me the knowledge. I was looking the ground over at Lossing's for the fourth or fifth time, when one of the dogs came and leaped upon me in a caressing way. Lossing observed it and remarked:

"Old Fan was always very fond of Graham, and I believe she misses him. Here, Fan, let me look at your paw. Ah! it's about as well as ever, isn't it?"

"What ailed her paw?" I asked.

"She got a terrible cut on a piece of glass a few weeks ago."

"About the time Graham was arrested?

"Yes."

"Then it was her bloody paw that made the mark on his vest that night!"

"Good heavens, but it must have been!"

I had a clue and a hope. Everything changed in an hour, and I now believed Graham innocent and went to work to secure proofs. I posted up to Louisville and examined the police records for arrests. lowed a score or more of cases to their finish, but got nothing. It was my belief that a white man committed the crime, and that he meant robbery, but was frightened off. I returned to the village and looked everybody over, but got no satisfaction. The day of the trial was coming and I was in despair, but accident came to my aid again. I happened into the hotel barn as the landlord pulled a lot of rubbish out of a stall. Hidden away with it was a fine saddle, and as it was brought to light the man exclaimed:

"Bless me, here is the dead man's saddle!"

"Was it missing?" I asked.

"It was stolen on the night of his murder. That's the reason he went down to Lossing's on foot."

Who stole it? What for? An outsider, who stole the saddle for its worth would have carried it off. An insider only would have stored it in the stall. Who was inside? A white man and two negro assistants. Within an hour I had ascertained that the white man, whose name was Foster, was absent for an hour on the evening of the murder, and that since he had acted very queer. "If he didn't do it, who did?" Somebody must be held responsible. After two or three interviews with young Meyers and his parents, I doubted if he could have choked the woman to death. He was frail and in poor health, and she was robust and strong. She had scarcely struggled at all, proving that she had been attacked suddenly and that the grip was a terrible one. Her neck was discolored as well as her throat, proving that two large hands had been employed. However, no suspicious characters had been seen in the neighborhood, and the murderer, if other than Meyers, had made his escape. I was completely blocked, and could only hope that accident would help me out.

It had been said that the body had not been robbed. The only theory seemed to be revenge. If it was not Meyers, then it was some former lover, and I went to Cincinnati to make inquiries. On the way up my watch stopped, and my first call was at a jeweller's. I had not been in his place sixty seconds when in walked a stout strong fellow, who laid a lady's watch on the showcase and said:

"I am going away, and I want to sell this. It belonged to my wife, who is dead."

"We don't buy second-hand watches," replied the jeweller, but he carelessly picked the watch up, examined it and then said:

"This is one of our watches. I remember selling it two or three months ago."

"Yes," replied the man, reaching out for it.

"Let's see the name," continued the jeweller as he went for a book.

"Never mind," replied the man. "If you don't want to buy, very well; I'm in a hurry."

"Sold to Mrs. Albright of ——," said the jeweller, as he handed it over.

"The woman who was murdered!" I said to the stranger. "Were you her husband?"

"N—, yes!" he stammered.

"And you have not been near——? That is strange! You will go with me to the police."

He tried to draw his pistol, but I was too quick for him. The police recognized him as a bully and a degraded character, and inside of half a day I had established the fact that he was formerly a lover of the murdered woman. Then I traced him to the depot and on the train to the village, and later on found two villagers who remembered seeing him there that night. When I had got him reasonably sure I confronted him with my facts, and he broke down and and made a full confesson. He and the woman were bleeding young Meyers. He had come out to see her that night, and he had found her on the bridge and quarreled with her. She was desperate and defiant, and in a fit of passion he had choked her to death. He had seized the watch but left all else, and so the Coroner's jury had been misled.

If trade begets wealth, Holland promises to become the richest country in the world. A Swiss financial journal, in publishing some interesting statistics relative to the trade of the different countries in Europe, says that Holland does the largest amount per head of population. The extent of the average Hollander's commercial operations during the year totals up 1,012 francs. After Holland comes Switzerland, with 510 francs per head of population. England, the nation of shopkeepers, comes third with 421 francs, while France and Germany average about 100 francs each.

Didn't know what fear was, and the Injuns was as afraid of him as death. I've put up a $300 monument at his grave, and you can judge by that he must been a pretty good man."

"Well!"

"Well, late last fall, when we had a stock sale at the ranch, a sort of tramp came along and got in Jim's way. Jim run over him and they had some words. The tramp wanted to fight, and the boys put Jim up to skeer the liver out of him. I'm free to say I didn't like the feller's looks. There was sumthin' back of his everyday look, which had a gleam of danger in it. Jim sized him up for a runner, and when I said the chap would fight Jim whispered:

"Pete, ye never knew me to be wrong. I'll skeer him till his hair loosens at the roots."

"To make a great spread of it, the boys fastened the two together by their left arms and gave each a bowie knife. They thought the tramp would back water when it came to the tying, but he didn't. He was thar' and didn't even turn pale. It was agreed that they should fight at the word, and the word was held five minutes to let the tramp wilt. He stood like a rock, and Jim couldn't back, you see, without losing character."

"And they fought?"

"It wasn't much of a fight. Jim was as handy with the knife as any man within a hundred miles, but he stood no show in that rumpus. The word was given, the tramp made a lightning motion, and the next thing I see was Jim dead on the grass, his head cut almost off. Thar' wasn't but one lick struck."

"And—and what?"

"Nothing, much. The tramp untied himself and walked off, as cool as a bar'l of ice, and we planted Jim on a knoll back of the mule pen."

"What did the crowd say?

"Said that my brother had better stuck to readin' the character of mules and steers, and let strangers alone, and I agreed. I'm in mourning fur Jim, but I allow that he bit off more'n he could chaw, and he shouldn't a done it. Crape looks well on mouse-color, don't it? It's a reminder that in the midst of life we may bark up the wrong tree."

Both In Hard Luck.

This story opens on the third floor of a magnificent Harlem compartment house.

He had been twisting about on his chair trying to find words to express his undying devotion, and had already begun to hem and haw, when a voice came from the floor below:

"Miss Candlewick," it said, "I love you passionately—madly: bid me but hope, and all the dark colors of my life will change!"

This was a bonanza for the young man above.

"Miss Clara, darling," he said tremulously, "them's my sentiments."

Then another voice came from below: "No Mr. Goatee, I cannot bid you hope; I love another."

"And them's mine, Mr. Morris," remarked Miss Clara.—[Harper's Bazar.

Four Foolish Boys Burned.

AKRON, O. March 14.—John Greely, John Costigan, Will McGinnis and Fred Shralk, aged about 16, stole some blasting powder and started into the country to explode it. On the way it caught from matches in the pocket of one of them and exploding, frightfully burned all four. Greeley was fairly cooked from the waist down and the flesh hung in shreds. He will die. Fred Shralk's arm was baked and torn, his side was blistered and his clothes burned from him. He is in a critical condition. The other two are not fatally injured, although Costigan suffers terribly.

DOWN A MOUNTAIN.

Rapid and Exciting Descent Much Rougher than Tobogganing.

There is an indefinable exhilaration in rapid motion, as every school-boy knows, else why should he tug up hill, time after time, for the sake of sliding down again? But an Englishman, touring among the Alps, describes a coasting exploit of two ladies of his party, which, however interesting for once, would hardly have been voluntarily repeated. In a small way, and with some difference of method, it reminds one of the common practice of sliding down the Mount Washington railway on a board. The party had finished climbing, and was ready to descend, but then came the question how the descent should be made.

We might return on foot, of course, but that would take two or three hours, and besides, that was not a la mode. For all who can pay for it there is a peculiar contrivance of descent, which, sooth to say, had been one of the attractions of the mountain, though whether or not to avail ourselves of it, was a MATTER OF MUCH DISCUSSION.

Standing about the house were two or three men with long spikes in their shoes, and leaning against the walls appeared certain light wooden frames with long handles. These are sledges, and to do the mountain properly you should go down, like a streak of lightning, on one of them. It seemed a queer and nervous operation, as the sledge marks were visible down the steep crest for some distance, and then pitched round a corner into unknown space. There were, moreover, but two men available just then, so that our party must be divided.

The two ladies at last consented to try and all the little colony of the hill assembled to see them packed. The priests assured us of their safety, and that they would reach the bottom in twenty minutes. One portly old fellow, with a trombone of a voice, was not only emphatic in his assurance, but putting a hand on the shoulder of each of the men preparing to descend, warned them to take special care of the two English ladies.

Yet you should have seen them as they were tilted over the edge! A small pillow tied on each sledge formed the seat; two crooked pegs were all there was to hold by; the feet were pressed against the runners. For precaution, a string gathered in all habiliments lest they should catch against the rocks.

The men putting themselves between the handles in front, and leaning well backward, struck their spikes into the ground. In a minute they were n a minute more they were shooting round the shoulder of the hill, and whether for better or for worse, our wives were gone!

As we could not know the result till we reached the bottom ourselves, we made hurried adieus to the friendly priests, and set off at our best speed down the path, reaching Saifnitz in an hour and a half. We met two or three sledges coming up carried on their drivers' backs, but could not learn the fate of those in which we were interested. At the door of the inn, however, we spied them, propped against the wall; and within doors were S—— and A——, hardly yet knowing, it seemed, whether they stood on their heads or their heels.

They described their unwonted flight as a short agony,—which it must be also for the sledgemen themselves, who were steaming with perspiration, and looking much exhausted. The men either ran with the sledges, guiding them round many turns, and pulling them lightly over obstacles; or, when the descent favored, suddenly seating themselves in front of each occupant, left

A MATHEMATICAL WONDER.

Ignorant Old Tom Cubbage and His Astonishing Feats with Figures.

There died at Woodville, Va., some time ago one of the most remarkable characters the Blue Ridge country of Virginia ever produced. Old Tom Cubbage, as he was known, was the mathematical wonder and the pride of the Blue Ridge people. His feats at figures and his calculations were indeed wonderful, and like Blind Tom, the musical prodigy, his powers were intuitive and innate. Old Tom did not know a figure or a letter and never went to school for an hour in his life. He was a rough, ignorant and untutored native of the hills and yet he could solve, almost in a moment, any problem read to him from the text books or from the papers and give the correct answer. He would add a column of figures of any possible length, subtract, multiply or divide, and do it so quickly as to surprise the scholar who tested his remarkable powers.

His answer sometimes will include a dozen or more figures, and knowing absolutely nothing about the numerating of them he would give the figures beginning at the right, and if a mistake had been made or a wrong figure purposely introduced by the person taking down his answer, old Tom would discover it at once and give the correct one. He knew nothing of the notation of numbers, and his whole knowledge was limited to the giving of his answers, figure by figure, as fast as they could be written from the right to the left. Persons of fair education, who tested old Tom, say they could never stump him, though they hunted for the most difficult problems in the books, and believe he could give the correct answer to any possible sum. Problems involving square and cube roots, completing the square of equations were as readily solved by him as simple addition, and yet were you to ask him what cube root meant he would tell you he didn't know. No one knew the way old Tom did these things, indeed he could not tell you himself. He was simply sui generis and the only one of his kind ever known to the people of the Blue Ridge.

Old Tom went to the University of Virginia upon the solicitation of some of his admirers, with a view to his education there in his particular line, but after astonishing the professors by his great gifts and having done all the sums given him by the students, he declined all proffers made him and returned to his hut in the Old Rag and to the company of his dogs and his rifle.

The greatest work of this strangely gifted man was the calculations and computations for a hundred-year almanac, made entirely by himself and reduced to writing by one of his neighbors. This work was done by him mentally, and included all the eclipses as well as changes of the moon, and was calculated especially for the part of the State in which he lived. It was never published owing to the outbreak of the war at the time of its completion, but those who have compared the manuscript with other published almanacs say it is a perfectly correct one.

How this unlettered man could understand the movements of the earth and the heavenly bodies is the strangest of all his surprising achievements, and must remain one of the mysteries known only to Him who created man fearfully and wonderfully, and breathed into him the spirit of life. On one occasion he was asked if he could tell the contents of a pile of brush by some person who thought to rig him, and his reply proved Old Tom to be at home where figures were concerned.

"Yes," said he, "put it in water and measure the water it displaces and you will have the solid contents."

Think on These Things.

It is often said that we are "the creatures" of habit." Our habit of thought has a great deal to do with our character and influence. Our thoughts are, of course, determined by our natural disposition and temperament, but in regard to them, as to everything else, it is the truth that, consciously or unconsciously, we form the habits which regulate them. In the easy-going, pleasure-loving spirit which takes possession of most of us we are apt to forget that there is going on within us a silent forceful growth of ideas and tendencies which will gradually gain an ascendancy over us, and become the masters of our lives. We are what our thoughts are. It is therefore of the first importance that our habit of thought should be elevating, and that the subjects upon which we dwell should be those which will raise rather than debase us. The great letter-writer who had the care of the churches upon him understood this a very long time ago, and in his Epistle to the Philippians he emphasized it. It was a true love-letter that he wrote to those people, in whom he had great joy and satisfaction, and for whom he wished the best and highest blessings. There are people, and Paul must have known such, in whom there appears, to us a homely phrase, "nothing to begin upon," and it seems rather hopeless to try to make excellent characters out of them; but to this class the Philippians did certainly not belong. They had proved themselves Christians indeed; they believed in Christ and suffered for His sake; they loved Paul, and he loved them so much that "in every prayer of his for them, he made his request with joy." They were, indeed, so good that it seemed possible that they should reach the perfection which he desired for them; and in order to this, he told them what subjects they were to choose for their contemplation and reflection. "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things." Paul knew that if they did their whole lives would, in consequence, be more beautiful, more helpful, more altogether Christlike.

The advice is as good for us as for those members of the Philippian Church, and quite as necessary to us as to them, for we, too, need to watch our thoughts. Especially to those who are young and who desire to rise to the eminence which is truly Christian are the apostle's words to be commended. "But" some will perhaps say, "we cannot help our thoughts." Oh yes, indeed we can. All sorts of thoughts may flash into the mind; but the disciplined heart will so ignore those which are wrong that they will soon pass away. Guests will present themselves at our doors, but we may either harbour them or send them from us. Evil thoughts will not stay unless they receive a welcome any more than good ones will. We may choose the inmates of our hearts and minds as certainly as we may select those who are to be the inmates of our houses. It requires some decision of character and energy of purpose, it is true, to think only of the things which are virtuous and praisdworthy; but where a man is master of himself it can be accomplished. "I will elect to think good thoughts, to be interested only in excellent things, to examine into the characters that deserve to be imitated." Whoever comes to that resolution, asking for that help from the All Perfect One which is never denied, will have "gotupon the up grade" in very truth, for he will dwell most of all in the presence of the Christ who is Himself the personification of everything that is lovely and of good report.

hausted. The men either ran with the sledges, guiding them round many turns, and pulling them lightly over obstacles; or, when the descent favored, suddenly seating themselves in front of each occupant, left the sledge to its own momentum; then down went driver and sledge, and lady and all, at a velocity which took away the breath.

If a check occurred, or the ground varied, the spiked feet were struck out in a moment; but what with the speed, the shaking and the fright, poor S—— and A—— were aching all over; and though glad to have had the experience, were not inclined to repeat it.

The Sin of Worrying.

One of the hardest lessons in the school of life is the avoidance of worry. Some scholars learn it much faster and more thoroughly than others do. Indeed they seem to have been born without the capacity of worrying, and those who have not been so fortunate are sometimes disposed to deny that such beings are entitled to any credit for their philosophical behaviour. Others never seem able to learn the lesson at all, but have to wear the dunce's cap for their obtuseness to the end of the chapter. The great majority of men and women manage to learn the lesson more or less perfectly after spending more or fewer years in the effort, and after experiences more or less bitter. But even the most chronic and apparently hopeless worryers will willingly admit that there cannot be any intellectual and moral condition that is so absolutely useless. That it never made the future a bit brighter if it looked gloomy, nor in the slightest degree atoned for the errors of the past, is admitted by all. Indeed no sane person could deny it. And yet how prone most of us are to indulge in it more or less. Our reason tells us it is foolish and even sinful, that it is vain and profitless, and yet we indulge in it! Nowhere surely could a more convincing proof be found of the weak and unnatural condition to which man has been reduced by sin. For certainly in its essence worrying is either an evidence of entire forgetfulness of God, or distrust either of his willingness or his ability to help us and provide for us. Worry is always weakening. It fevers the brain, injures the digestion, impairs self-control, deranges the temper, enfeebles the whole nature, unfits a man or woman from making to the best effect those efforts which are necessary to rescue them from the very circumstances which are the bane of their existence and under the stress of which they are so apt to say they "cannot help worrying."

measure the water it displaces and you will have the solid contents."

HOUSEHOLD.

Ignorant Wives.

It is an old theme, but one that cannot be too often discoursed upon, the theme that the daughters of to-day are not given the education they should have in the practical duties of life, the duties that come to most of them as mistresses of homes, as wives and mothers. We hear often enough of the necessity of training schools for servants, but less is said about the necessity of a training school for mistresses and one is needed as much as the other, for there is no doubt of the fact that the great and ever increasing hue and cry heard about the incompetency of servants arises from the act that so many mistresses are as ignorant of the duties of kitchen and the home in general, as are the servants whom they are expected to direct. In many cases it is an attempt of the blind to lead the blind.

To be sure one hears now of sewing schools and cooking schools, the utility of which one does not question, but the practical, every-day duties of life can be learned only in the home, and they consist in something more than a knowledge of how to make angel cake and oyster patties. I once heard a young woman of almost twenty-five, who was engaged to be married, say with a girlish giggle, that she never made a loaf of bread or swept a room in all her life. My sympathy went out to the man she was to marry. I heard another girl say, "Oh, it's easy to keep house nowadays when one can buy everything already cooked. Why they even bring baked beans and hot brown bread right to the door, and one can buy all sorts of canned things and get up a lovely meal at a moment's notice."

I don't know if she exected to be married soon, but I trust not. I have eaten some of these meals furnished at a "moment's notice" by the baker and the grocer, and I feel sorry for the innocent victim of a woman who expects to feed her husband regularly on that kind of fare.

"Society makes so many demands on one's time now, that women are compelled to give less attention to their homes than they once gave to them," I heard a woman say once in feeble excuse for the condition of things in her own badly ordered and half-kept home in which there was always a spirit of unrest and unhappiness.

Is not the welfare, moral and physical, and the happiness of a wife's husband and children of immeasurably greater consequence than all the "society" on earth?

And when it comes to a knowledge of the solemn and sacred duties of maternity it is almost appalling to know how utterly ignorant many young mothers are.

The story would be almost laughable if it were not so pitiful of the young mother who seemed to know simply nothing at all about the care of her baby and when asked if her mother had never talked to her about the laws and duties of maternity, she said simply—"Oh, no; mamma thought it wasn't nice to talk about such things."

Perhaps it is because I have no daughters of my own, all of my own ducks being drakes, a fact I greatly regret, that I think I know just how a daughter should be trained. I know that I would think it a sin to send a daughter of mine to a home of her own as ignorant of its duties and of duty to herself and her husband as are so many wives of to-day.—[Good Housekeeping.

When to Use the Fingers in Eating.

It is said that Cardinal Richelieu detected We a..an ad..turer who was passing himself off armi.. ..his helping himself to ..wo demands i.. ..because it was the one-cream tartar, and the whites of three eggs; beat with a wooden spoon 20 minutes, when it should be very white and light, and on letting it run from the spoon, preserve its thread-like appearance 3 or 4 minutes. Ice the cake, and when dry it may be ornamented. One can purchase funnels for the purpose of decorating iced cakes, with different shaped ends. In place of no better funnel, make a cornucopia of stiff writing-paper; fill it with icing, and press it out at the small end, forming different shapes according to taste, over the cake. Little centre pieces or leaves can always be purchased at the confectioner's to aid in the decoration.

WEDDING CAKE.—Three pounds each of flour, butter and sugar, six pounds of raisins, six pounds of currants, one once each of nutmeg and cinnamon, half an ounce of cloves, a pound of citron, the grated peel and juice of two lemons, and thirty eggs. Stir the butter and sugar to a cream, beat the yolks and whites of the eggs separately, and add them to the butter and sugar, then by degrees put in two-thirds of the flour, then the spice and lemon-juice, and last the fruit, mixed with the remaining third of the flour. Have the citron ready cut up, and when you have put a little of the cake into the pan, put in a layer of citron, then more cake, and again citron and cake alternately. This quantity will bake in one cake in five hours, in two cakes, three hours.

The Haida Indians.

Not a little of interest and romance attaches itself to the Haida Indians of Queen Charlotte Islands, from a tradition which exists, that their ancestors came, originally, in canoes from a country far to the southward. It is said that they were many moons on the voyage, that they landed at many points on the way—like Æneas and his Trojans of classic story—and that they were repelled by savage natives, or ill omens, till, finally, they reached these outlying islands where they established themselves, built villages and fashioned new canoes from the huge yellow cedar-trees which here reach their greatest size.

It is supposed by some travellers that these exiles, seeking a home and a country, were a remnant of the mighty Aztec people of Mexico, conquered by Cortez and his Spanish cavaliers, and that after the tragic fall of Tenochtitlan, the Aztec capital of Mexico, a band of fugitives made its way down to the west coast and came northward.

Certain it is that the Haidas much excel the other Indian tribes of the north west coast, in warlike spirit, physique and ingenuity. They are now often seen at Sitka, Victoria and Puget Sound ports, but still claim the Queen Charlotte Islands as their home,

What gives the legend of their origin some degree of probability is the art they possess in carving and engraving in stone, wood, bone, silver, copper and gold. As nearly as can be ascertained, the practice of carving the huge totem posts which form so odd and striking a feature of the Indian villages along this coast originated with the Haidas.

There is something in the grotesque sculpture and imagery on these totems suggestive of Aztec art, as seen in the museum at city of Mexico. Not even civilized art exceeds the skill displayed by the Haidas in carving plates, platters, tureens, miniature totems and animal groups of statuary from solid, fine-grained black slate; for it is done with such skill, finish, and good taste in design that a single platter or group often commands forty or fifty dollars.

More remarkable yet is the skill exhibited by these people in the modelling and construction of large canoes from the trunks

WARNER ON CANADA

Extracts From Mr. Warner's Letter in Harper's.

CANADIANS CHARACTERISED—A DISTINCT TYPE—NEITHER ENGLISH NOR AMERICAN.

I have been told that the Canadians are second-hand Englishmen. No estimate could convey a more erroneous impression. A portion of the people have strong English traditions and loyalties to institutions, but in manner and in expectations the Canadians are scarcely more English than the people of the United States; they have their own colonial development, and one can mark already with tolerable distinctness a Canadian type that is neither English nor American. This is noticeable, especially in the women. The Canadian girl resembles the American in escape from a purely conventional restraint and in self-reliance, and she has, like the English, a well-modulated voice and distinct articulation. In the cities, also, she has taste in dress and a certain style which we think belongs to the New World. In features and action a certain modification has gone on, due partly to climate and partly to greater social independence. It is unnecessary to make comparisons, and I only note that there is a Canadian type of woman.

But there is great variety in Canada, and in fact a remarkable racial diversity. The man of Nova Scotia is not at all the man of British Columbia or Manitoba. The Scotch in old Canada have made

A DISTINCT IMPRESSION N FEATURES AND SPEECH

And it may be said generally in Eastern Canada that the Scotch element is a leading and conspicuous one in the vigor and push of enterprise and the accumulation of fortune. The Canadian men, as one sees them in official life, at the clubs, in business, are markedly a vigorous, stalwart race, well made, of good stature, and not seldom handsome. This physical prosperity needs to be remembered when we consider the rigorous climate and the long winters; these seem to have at least one advantage—that of breeding vivile men. The Canadians generally are fond of out-door sports and athletic games, of fishing and hunting, and they give more time to such recreations than we do. They are a little less driven by the business goad. Abundant animal apirits tend to make men good-natured and little quarrelsome. The Canadians would make good soldiers. There was a time when the drinking habit prevailed very much in Canada, and there are still places where they do not put water enough in their grog, but Temperance reform has taken as strong a hold there as it has in the United States.

THE FEELING ABOUT THE ENGLISH

is illustrated by the statment that there is not more aping of English ways in Montreal and Toronto clubs and social life than in New York, and that the English superciliousness, or condescension as to colonists, the ultra-English manner, is ridiculed in Canada, and resented with even more warmth than in the United States. The amusing stories of English presumption upon hospitality are current in Canada as well as on this side. All this is not inconsistent with pride in the empire, loyalty to its traditions and institutions, and even a considerable willingness (for human nature is prety much alike everywhere) to accept decorative titles. But the underlying fact is that there is a distinct feeling of nationality and it is increasing.

FRENCH CANADIANS—THE "SOLID" FACTOR IN POLITICS OVER THE BORDER.

Perhaps nothing will surprise the visitor

It is said that Cardinal Richelieu detected a an adventurer who was passing himself off [illegible] is helping himself to [illegible] demands it [illegible] because it was the custom then, as it is now to help one's self from the dish with the fingers, if an olive fork is not provided, rather than to use one of a different pattern. Forks for the dish alone are now manufactured and are very generally used, but after the olive has reached the plate it is always carried to the mouth by the fingers. Of course we are not referring to the stuffed olives which are bottled in oil.

Those who are very particular hold the large end of a spear of asparagus with a fork while with the tip end of a knife they daintily separate the tender green tops from the white end, which is then put aside. Others take the white end between the fingers and carry it to the mouth. Both are correct, but the former is much more dainty and easily done.

Celery is always taken from the dish and carried to the mouth by the fingers. If individual salts are not provided, it is etiquette to use one half of the butter plate for salt. If salt shakers are used, hold the celery in the left hand just over the rim of your plate and gently sprinkle it with salt. and the old custom of putting a spoonful of salt on the cloth is still in practice, When corn is served on the cob it must be taken in the fingers, only managed very daintily. We have seen pretty little doylies for the purpose of holding it, but it is a question if that is not carrying table linen too far. Many housekeepers, and especially in the South, serve corn as aseparate course when finger bowls are placed by each plate and removed with the course.

Lettuce when served without dressing is always pulled to pieces with the fingers. This is usually the lady's duty and there is no prettier picture than that of a young lady preparing a plate of young lettuce leaves in this way, for the tender green shows off to prefection her dainty white hands and she may be be as exquisitely neat about it as she likes, and it is one of the most fascinating and becoming of table duties that a hostess can possible provide for her lady guests, to assist in helping the gentlemen to a social or informal meal.

Water cress is also taken in the fingers and the prettiest way of serving it is to obtain a long low-sided basket or dish, in the bottom of which lay a folded napkin, then heap the cress so as to fill the basket and you have not only an enjoyable, but a very ornamental dish for the breakfast table.

When a slice of lemon is served with fish or meat it is much more correct to take the slice in the fingers, double the ends together and gently squeeze the juice over the article than to use a knife, for that purpose, as is sometimes done.

It is always proper to help one's self to bread, cheese, and lump sugar, if tongs are not provided, with the fingers. Never use your own knife, fork or spoon to take from the dish. It is also correct if a plate of hot, unbroken biscuits is passed, to not only break off for yourself with your fingers, but or your neighbor also.

Choice Receipts.

ALMOND ICING.—Blanch fifteen ounces of Jordon almonds and one ounce of bitter almonds; pound to a smooth fine paste with two tablespoonfuls of orange-flower water; then add one and quarter pound of confectioner's sugar, and four whites of eggs. Mix and pound well for eight or ten minutes, and ice the cake. Put into a "very slow" oven where it should remain for 35 minutes without acquiring any color. It is now ready to be covered with plain icing.

ICING.—Place one pound of confectioner's sugar in a bowl with a level teaspoonful of mands forty or fifty dollars.

More remarkable yet is the skill exhibited by these people in the modelling and construction of large canoes from the trunks of the gigantic yellow cedars, which, on the Queen Charlotte Islands, attain a diameter of seven and even ten or twelve feet—for Queen Charlotte's is the Lebanon of the northwest coast.

From a single cedar log the Haidas fashion a canoe, sometimes seventy-five feet long, with a breadth of seven or eight feet, a craft capable of carrying fifty persons, a good sailor, seaworthy and safe for a voyage of hundreds of miles on the open sea. The prows of these hgue canoes are often curved upward in a formidable war beak, and decorated like the galleys of classic times.

It will, indeed, be an interesting discovery in ethnology if the arts of these west coast Haidas can be traced to their source in that peculiar Aztec civilization of early Mexico, which Cortez and the conquistador e crushed so ruthlessly three hundred and seventy years ago.

One Million Dolls.

A few weeks ago we spoke of the phono graph dolls which Mr. Edison is now inventing, and the Boston Journal has the following additional facts about their manufacture and sale :

Imagine for one moment one million dolls ! Placed side by side theywould almost extend around Boston Common. And yet this number, it is said, has been ordered, and what is still more alarming, these charming little tots are all to be fitted internally with phonographs invented by Edison. Touch a spring and they begin, some to sing, some to play and some to scold. They can be made to talk in any langnage, and sing secular music or anthems. It is true they will keep on singing the tune and repeating the same soliloquy, which may become tedions in time. To obviate this there can be an interchange of dolls. The pet which sings "Home Sweet Home," on Commonwealth Avenue, can be sent on a visit to Beacon Street, and the doll exchanged will recite, " How doth the little busy bee."

It is said that one million of these dolls are to be manufactured by a company which has a stock valuation of two millions of dollars. One million of dolls at $5 each will be $5,000, 000, and this is the number that the market of the Northern States will absorb. The amount to be derived from the rest of the world can be imagined. The Phonographic Doll Company will be listed in Boston and New York, and daily quotations of the stock will be given. The possibilities of this company are beyond Calumet and Hecla, Tamarack, Pullman Palace Car Company, or even the Chemical Bank of New York. At least monthly dividends will be declared, and the doll mania will never die out; because, if you tire of hearing, "The boy stood on the burning deck," you can exchange it at the headquarters of the company, paying a slight compensation, for one which will ask you, "Why should the spirit of mortal be proud?" Childless couples can have a family of these dolls, and even old bachelors may be able to realize with Tupper that "a babe in the house is a wellspring of pleasure."

The lead linings and piping of the recently discovered Roman baths, in Bath, England, were found to be in a wonderfully good state of preservation.

FRENCH CANADIANS—THE "SOLID" FACTOR IN POLITICS OVER THE BORDER.

Perhaps nothing will surprise the visitor more than the persistence of the French type in Canada, and naturally its aggressiveness. Guaranteed their religion, laws and language, the French have not only failed to assimilate, but have had hopes—maybe still have—of making Canada French. The French "national" party means simply a French consolidation, and has no relation to the "nationalism" of Sir John Macdonald. So far as the Church and the French politicians are concerned, the effort is to keep the French solid as a political force, and whether the French are Liberal or Conservative, this is the underlying thought. The Province of Quebec is Liberal, but the Liberalism is of a different hue from that of Ontario. The French recognise the truth that of a people's growth that the individuality of a people depends upon maintaining it. The French have escaped absorption in Canada mainly by loyalty to their native tongue, aided by the concession to them of their civil laws and their religious privileges.

The French have always been loyal to the English connection under all temptations, for these guarantees have been continued, which could scarcely be expected from any other power, and certainly not in a legislative union of the Canadian Provinces. In literature and sentiment the connection is with France ; in religion, with Rome ; in politics England has been the guarantee of both. There will be no prevailing sentiment in favor of annexation to the United States so long as the Church retains its authority, nor would it be favored by the accomplished politicians so long as they can use the solid French mass as political force.

THE VIRTUAL RULER OF CANADA—MR. WARNER'S IMPRESSIONS OF SIR JOHN MACDONALD.

For many years Sir John Macdonald has been virtually the ruler of Canada. He has had the ability and skill to keep his party in power, while all the Provinces have remained or become Liberal. I believe his continuance is due to his devotion to the national idea, to the development of the country, to bold measures—like the urgency of the Canadian Pacific railway construction—for binding the provinces together and promoting commercial activity. Canada is proud of this, even while it counts its debt. Sir John is worshipped by his party, especially by the younger men, to whom he furnishes an ideal, as a statesman of bold conceptions and courage. He is disliked as a politician as cordially by the Opposition, who attribute to him the same policy of adventure that was attributed to Beaconsfield. Personally he resembles that remarkable man. Undoubtedly Sir John adds prudence to his knowledge of men, and his habit of never crossing a stream till he gets to it has gained him the sobriquet of "Old To-morrow. He is a man of the world as well as a man of affairs, with a wide and liberal literary taste.

A FORCE THAT MAKES FOR ANNEXATION—LABOR ORGANIZATIONS IN THE DOMINION.

These are in affiliation with those in the United States and most of them are international. The plumbers, the bricklayers, and stonemasons and stonecutters, the Typographical Union, the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, the wood-carvers, the Knights of Labor, are affiliated ; there is a branch of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in Canada, the railway conductors, with delegates from all our States, held their conference in Toronto last summer. The Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners is a British association, with headquarters in Manchester, but it has an Executive Committee in New York, with which all the Canadian and American societies communicate, and it sustains a periodical in New York. The Society of Amalgamated Engine Builders has its office in London, but there is an American branch, with which all the Canadian societies work in harmony. The Cigarmakers' Union is American, but a strike of cigarmakers in Toronto was supported by the American; so with the plumbers. It may be said generally that the societies each side the line will sustain each other. The trade organizations are also taken up by women, and these all affiliate with the United States.

WHEN A "NATIONAL" UNION

affiliates with one on the other side the name is changed to "International." This union and interchange draws the laborers of both nations closer together. From my best information, and notwithstanding the denial of some politicians, the Canadian unions have love and sympathy for and with America. And this feeling must be reckoned with in speaking of the tendency to Annexation. The present much-respected Mayor of Toronto is a trade unionist and has a seat in the Local Parliament as a Conservative; he was once arrested for picketing for some such trade union performance. I should not say that the trades unions are in favor of Annexation, but they are not afraid to discuss it. There is in Toronto a society of a hundred young men, the greater part of whom are of the artisan class, who meet to discuss questions of economy and politics. One of their subjects was Canadian Independence. I am told that there is among young men a considerable desire for Independence, accompanied with a determination to be on the best terms with the United States, and that as between a connection with Great Britain and the United States they would prefer the latter. In my own observation the determination to be on good terms with the United States is general in Canada; the desire for Independence is not.

AFTER-THOUGHTS ON "RETALIATION"—THE REAL FEELING ON THE SUBJECT IN CANADA.

I happened to be in Canada during the fishery and "Retaliation" talk. There was no belief that the "Retaliation" threatened was anything more than a campaign measure; it may have chilled the rapport for the moment, but there was literally no excitement over it, and the opinion was general that Retaliation as to transportation would benefit the Canadian railways. The effect of the moment was that importers made large foreign orders for goods to be sent by Halifax that would otherwise have gone to United States ports. The fishery question is not one that can be treated in the space at our command. Naturally Canada sees it from its point view. To a considerable portion of the Maritime Provinces fishing means livelihood, and the view is that if the United States shares in it we ought to open our markets to the Canadian fishermen. Some, indeed, and those are generally advocates of freer trade, think that our fishermen ought to have the right of entering the Canadian harbors for bait and shipment of their catch and think also that Canada would derive an equal benefit from this; but probably the general feeling is that these privileges should be

COMPENSATED BY A UNITED STATES MARKET.

The defence of the treaty in the United States Senate debate was not the defence of the Canadian Government in many particulars. For instance, it was said that the "outrages" had been disowned as the acts of irresponsible men. The Canadian defence was that the "outrages"— that is, the most conspicuous of them which appeared in the debate—had been disproved in the investigation.

AUSTRALIA.

Facts About the Wonderful Island Continent.

Australia contains an area of about 3,000,000 square miles, or nearly that of the United States exclusive of Alaska. Owing to its position at the antipodes of the civilized world, this continent was longer unknown than any other country of similar extent.

It was first visited during the seventeenth century, and in the latter half of the eighteenth century was explored along the coast, while in 1788 colonization began by the transportation of a shipload of criminals to Port Jackson. The interior of the country is a plateau studded with groups of small mountains, and there are higher ranges parallel to the east and west coast. There are some excellent and large harbors in various parts of the coast, but the greater part of the shore on the north, the west, and the south, is low and sandy. Nearly all around the coast and the east part of the continent is a rich grazing country, well adapted to the rearing of sheep, of which there were 64,500,000 in 1887. Sheep farming is the most important branch of industry in the country. Speaking generally, one of the most notable characteristics of the continent is its scarcity of rivers and fresh water lakes.

There are few rivers of any considerable size along the whole coast line of 8000 miles, and in one strip of nearly 1500 miles on the southcoast there is not a single water course. There are many small lakes, but numbers of them are salt, and those that are fresh are more like marshes than lakes, being dependent for their supplies of water on the rivers and floods in the rainy season.

The entire central part of the continent is a plain, so destitute of water courses as to be almost a desert. The continent of Australia, extending over twenty-eight degrees of latitude, has, of course, considerable diversities of climate, but far less then those of any other great country. In the southeastern part the rainfall is pretty good, and the heat of the summer season is tempered by the sea breezes. The mean annual temperature is 64 4 deg. Fahr. The province of Victoria has a similar mild character much like Southern Europe. The mean temperature through the year at Melbourne is 58.8 deg. Fahr. The central and western parts of the continent, however, are very dry and intensely hot in the summer months. The continent of Australia is divided into five colonies —New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia. In the mountains minerals abound, comprising gold, copper, iron, and coal in large quantities, silver, mercury, tin, zinc, and others in lesser amount. All the settled portions of the country are intersected by railways, extending to nearly 6000 miles, and with about 59,956 miles of telegraphic wire, connecting all the principal towns. The productions of the different colonies include wheat and all other grains, with all the vegetables and fruits of temperate climes. The total population of Australia was estimated in December, 1888, 2,800,886.

Photographing a Snow-storm.

A certain artist in a New England town had a laughable and yet a somewhat vexatious experience last winter while attempting to photograph a snow-storm. One afternoon in midwinter he was gratified by just such a snowfall as he had desired; the large, white flakes, heavy with moisture, drifted slowly, lazily down to earth.

Mr. Tracy, the photographer, made rapid preparations for his picture, for these "robin

The road of Marriage is sometimes depicted as a very rough one to travel, but the newly wedded Emperor of China, is bound to be well shod for all eventualities. No fewer than two hundred and sixty pairs of boots having been made for that young bride-groom.

The expanse of telegraph wires on some of the streets of this city is becoming more and more ominously imposing, and what is to be done about it, is a very serious question. We trust that the pilgrimage to New York, which a few of our aldermen have taken in order to get some light on the subject, will have good results. By all means let us have these wires underground, if the thing be at all possible.

It is such occurrences as that at St. George, which shake the conventional veneer from the outside of character and reveal more human nature in ten minutes than would have come to the surface in as many years under ordinary circumstances There are few natures who can stand the test so well, and come out of the furnace more gloriously than was the case with Miss Aggie Nicholson, of Hamilton, who prove herself a real heroine on that awful night.

The rumour goes that Professor Watson of Queen's College, Kingston, has a good chance of being called to succeed Professor Young in the metaphysical chair in University College. As good a choice probably as could be made. Mr. Watson already has a high reputation in educational circles in this country, and his knowledge of the subject is excellent. Queen's no doubt would be loth to lose him, and strong efforts would be made to keep him where he is.

The pros and cons of the underground system of laying electric wires in cities were warmly discussed this week at the meeting of the National Electrical Assocciation. There was anything but unanimity of opinion on the part of the experts. The committee appointed at the last meeting to examine the underground system reported that they communicated with all the electric light companies in the United States and found that in all or nearly all instances defective insulation and defective mechanical construction had interfered much with the electric currents. On the other hand, Prof. Barrett, city electrician of Chicago, pronounced the underground system in his city, where it has been in operation for five or six years in the case of electric light wires and thirteen years in the case of telegraph wires a "big success."

Mr. Waters has again failed to carry his measure for the enfranchisement of women, but he is not discouraged and he need not be. Of course, there is still a good deal of small wit indulged in by those who think that the only thing women are good for is to "suckle slaves and chronicle small beer." That is an experience through which every great change and improvement has to pass. But the change comes all the same, and the dreadful prophecies are not fulfilled. If the great majority of women don't want the franchise and would not use it let them take their own mind on it. But that is no reason why justice should not be done or why women should not get fair play. We have no fear about the disastrous results likely to flow from the dreaded innovation.

had been disowned as the acts of irresponsible men. The Canadian defence was that the "outrages"— that is, the most conspicuous of them which appeared in the debate— had been disproved in the investigation. Several of them, which excited indignation in the United States, were declared by a Cabinet Minister to have no foundation in fact, and after proof of the falsity of the allegations, the complainants were not again heard of. Of course it is known that no arrangement made by England can hold that is not materially beneficial to Canada and the United States; and I believe I state the best judgment of both sides that the whole fishery question, in the hands of sensible representatives of both countries, upon ascertained facts, could be settled between Canada and the United States. It is not natural that, with England conducting the negotiations, Canada should appear as a somewhat irresponsible litigating party bent on securing all that she can get? But whatever the legal rights are, under treaties or the law of nations, I am sure that the absurdity of making a casus belli of them is as much felt in Canada as in the United States. And I believe the Canadians understand that this attitude is consistent with a firm maintenance of treaty or other rights by the United States as it is by Canada.

THE FUTURE OF CANADA—DEVELOPMENT ON THE LINE OF BRITISH CONNECTION.

If one would forecast the future of Canada, he needs to take a wider view than personal preferences or the agitations of local parties. The railway development, the Canadian Pacific alone, has changed within five years the prospects of the political situation. It has brought together the widely-separated Provinces, and has given a new impulse to the sentiment of nationality. It has produced a sort of unity which no Act of Parliament could ever create. But it has done more than this; it has changed the relation of England to Canada. The Dominion is felt to be a much more important part of the British Empire than it was ten years ago, and in England within less than ten years there has been a revolution in colonial policy. With a line of fast steamers from the British Islands to Halifax, with lines of fast steamers from Vancouver to Yokohama, Hong Kong and Australia, with an all-rail transit, within British limits, through an empire of magnificent capacities, offering homes for any possible British overflow, will England regard Canada as a weakness? It is true that on this Continent the day of dynasties is over, and that the people will determine their own place. But there are great commercial forces at work that cannot be ignored, which seem strong enough to keep Canada for a long time on her present line of development in British connection.—Charles Dudley Warner, in Harper's Magazine for March.

Colonel Denison's course in sending a boy to jail for ten days for stealing newspapers from house doors, was severe certainly, but perhaps not too severe. Pilfering of that kind needs to be put down with a high hand both because it is an injury to those who pay for the papers, and not infrequently leads to undeserved disgrace for the route boys, who are an honest, hard-working and ill-appreciated race of laborers. It is a pity, however, that the young thief could not have been sent to some other place than the common jail where he will be kept idle and forced into close companionship with older and more hardened criminals, so that the chances are all in favour of his coming out of jail a much worse boy than when he entered it. Of course the Magistrate had nowhere else to send him, but the fact emphasizes the necessity for our philanthropic citizens and law makers to bestir themselves and consider what can be done to meet such noon in midwinter he was gratified by just such a snowfall as he had desired; the large, white flakes, heavy with moisture, drifted slowly, lazily down to earth.

Mr. Tracy, the photographer, made rapid preparations for his picture, for these "robin snows," as they are locally termed, are of brief duration. To add vividness and the life-touch to the scene, he summoned a half-dozen village boys to simulate a game of snow balling. He arranged the lads in proper position, snowballs in hand, a few yards from the camera, and then explained to them that when he gave the signal, "One, two, three, fire!" they must all, at the same time, throw their snowballs.

"Throw hard, as if you meant to hit something," he added.

Mr. Tracy either failed to make his meaning plain, or the roguish boys purposely misunderstood.

When everything was in readiness, the photographer retired to his camera, arranged his sensitive plate, gave a final look at the boys, and then, as he put his hand on the top-shutter, he called out:

"Now look at me! One, two, three, fire!"

The boys did fire! Every one of them threw his snowball at the camera! They had aimed well. The apparatus tumbled over into the snow, and the artist, dodging to avoid the missiles, slipped and went down with it, and there for a half-minute he floundered in the snowy depths, struggling to regain his feet.

The boys looked on in dismay, feeling an irresistible desire to laugh; and then, fearing the consequences of the act for themselves, they took to their heels.

The photographer finally extricated himself. He was very angry at first, and had the boys been there, it is quite possible some of them might have felt his indignation; but they had for the time escaped, so he picked up his camera, and fortunately found nothing broken or injured. Intantaneous photography, too, had triumphed; the sensitive plate had the image of the snow-storm the boys with their half-eager, half-roguish expressions, and the snow-balls just leaving their hands.

Mr. Tracy's anger gradually cooled, as he viewed the perfect picture, and then the ludicrousness of the scene dawned upon him.

"The only revenge I ever took on those boys," he said to the writer, as he finished the story, "was to make each of them buy one of those photographs at fifty cents."

franchise and would not use it let them take their own mind on it. But that is no reason why justice should not be done or why women should not get fair play. We have no fear about the disastrous results likely to flow from the dreaded innovation. Any thing worse than the way in which elections have been conducted by men could not be well imagined, and the heavens will not fall though women should have a say in the election of those who are to make laws for them.

There are of course many who hold that man is essentially a fighting animal and that he will continue to be this to the end of the chapter. We, however, rather believe that what is spoken in the Bible about the reign of truth and peace and righteousness is not destined to turn out a falsity and an illusion. The quantity of foolish and unfounded platitudes which have been uttered about the enobling influence of war is of course immense. But after, all what is war but a repeal of the Ten Commandments? The business of the soldier may be a necessary one but it is very damnable all the same. In short, to hear a great many professed christians talking, one would conclude that Jesus Christ had never lived, had never spoken and had never died. Their whole code of morals and of polity are so essentially heathenish, that one is almost tempted to think that those are not far out of the way who tell us that Roman Paganism has again come back and is re-enthroned, while the Sermon on the Mount is to all intents and purposes repealed. "Love your enemies! Do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you!" But who believes that? Has any one met with any body who does? It is all very well in church, and for an hour or two on Sundays; but in the market place, and for all the rest of the week—hem—"enemies" and "haters" had better look out. If they get a blessing we would like to listen to its wording, and look for a moment at the heart which utters the benediction. In these days the "Peace and good will" of Christmas chimes sounds strangely as explained, and illustrated by Anti-Poverty tirades and blood-thirsty threatenings.

Complaints have been made, and with some reason, about the Central Prison method which compels the prisoners for want of more useful work, to wheel sand from one part of the yard to another. It is imperative of course that the men should be kept busy, but a much better plan it seems to us than such objectless, brute-like work at treadmill sand-wheeling would be to put them through a stern "course of sprouts" in the shape of military drill. Why not fasten a weight upon their shoulders, which would be an equivalent to the heavy marching order of soldiers, and set them to learn the manual exercise, to hold their heads up, to keep their backs straight, their toes turned out and their eyes right, to march back and forward, back and forward, slow step, quick step, double quick, to wheel, form fours, mark time, and much else of the same sort, all of which has not only the virtue of giving needful physical exercise, but has mental and moral beneficial tendencies which criminals need. On the theory that punishment ought to be remedial as well as penal much more might be said for such treatment as this than for the purely mechanical and gin horse, soulless, debasing monotony o purposeless sand toting And a similar course would be advantageous to the prisoners at the jail who spend the most of their time in absolute idleness which is hurtful both to body and mind. If they were put through five or six hours, drill every day they would be all the better for it. It would give them something to do, and some of the jail officials are not so very busy but that part of their time could be occupied in such a way to good advantage.

NAPANEE FRIDAY MARCH 22, 1889

On Monday last, at Ottawa, Dr. Platt M. P., for Prince Edward county moved the following resolution:—"That it is expedient to remove the duty on and place upon the free list all grains and seeds which do not ripen in Canada, but which are now largely imported and sown for the production of food for cattle under the system of feeding cattle called soiling and ensilage, now largely adopted by the farmers of Canada." The Minister of Customs, and other conservatives opposed the motion, but,so strong were the arguments advanced in favor of it, Mr. Bowell consented to look into the matter, and see if the change could be made.

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.

The Napanee correspondent of the Belleville Ontario very justly commented upon the condition of the High School here by stating that it was overcrowded at present and in such an unsatisfactory condition, that the head master had requested the Board to accept his resignation. The correspondent went on to say that the number of cubic feet per head was only one-half of that required by statute and there was a likelihood of the government withdrawing its grant unless better sanitary arrangements was made and suitable accommodation provided for all the pupils. He then stated that Deseronto had voted $12,000 for a high achool, while Napanee has failed to raise the $8.000 or $9,000 asked. The letter was a fair criticism upon the relative positions of the two towns on the school question. The Beaver must certainly have spilled some of the mud it has been using so freely lately over the perceptive position of its alleged brains when it sums up the correspondent's letters as follows:

"The Napanee correspondent of the Ontario is a person of stupendous intellect, and that he maintains his incog. is a serious loss to the community. He argues that because Napanee High School is full to overflowing; unless the School Board shows more energy, Deseronto will outstrip us in the face. What a pity our school was not languishing and doing inferior work, in order that the poor fellow and our jealous rivals might feel some encouragement.'

If any pupil in the High School had made such a stupid comment upon the letter in question, the teachers would have been justified had they given him a grand flogging. Yours, etc.,

COUNTY COUNCIL.

to adjournment, the warden in the chair, members all present.

The minutes of Friday were read and confirmed.

Mr. Baker presented the report of the County Property Committee which was received and adopted.

Moved by Mr. Aylsworth, seconded by Mr. Ball, that the chairman of county property be authorized to enter into a contract for the supply of coal (during the summer months) for the year 1889. Carried

The treasurer presented a statement as to the amount of county rate due, cash on hand, etc., which was received and filed.

Moved by Mr. Roblin, seconded by Mr. Ball, that the county treasurer be and is hereby instructed to collect the balance due from the several municipalities for county rate forthwith or pay interest at the rate of six per cent per annum. Lost.

Moved by Mr. Sweetnam, seconded by Mr. H. Reid, that John Cheetham be paid $1.50 per day as messenger this session. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Jackson, seconded by Mr. Wees, that the by-law fixing the county treasurer's salary be now read a third time, numbered, signed, sealed and finally passed. Carried.

The by-law was then read a third time and passed as Number 116.

Moved by Mr. Sexsmith, seconded by Mr. Jas. Reid, that a return having been made to this council of the expenditure of county money on roads for 1888, which had not been expended under the supervision of a properly appointed engineer and this council having accepted said return on the statement of the representative of the municipality for which the return was made, that the irregularity occurred because he did not know of the requirements of the by-law governing the expenditure of said money, be it therefore resolved than in future the by-law governing the expenditure of money on county roads be strictly enforced.

Moved in amendment by Mr. Parks, seconded by Mr. Aylsworth, that it appears that there was a municipality which made a return of expenditure of county grant which was not in accordance with the by-law governing county roads, although said municipality had a regular appointed county engineer,therefore be it resolved that the resolution be amended by adding these words: That irregularities had occurred even in a municipality where an engineer had been appointed. Lost.

The original motion was then put and carried.

Moved by Mr. Jas. Reid, seconded by Mr. Thomson, that the treasurer be instructed to collect from the different municipalities the amount of county rate due from said municipalities not later than the first day of April next. Carried.

The yeas and nays being demanded the motion was declared carried on the following division:

Yeas—Messrs. Ball, Baker, Bryden, Carson, Filson, Jackson, Lapum, Roblin, Jas. Reid, Thomson, Wees—11.

Nays—Messrs. Aylsworth, Allison, Derbyshire, Fraser, Parks, H. Reid, Sweetnam, Sexsmith, L. Wagar and J. H. Wagar—10.

Mr. Roblin brought in the report of the Education and Printing Committee, which was received and adopted.

On motion the council adjourned until 2 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

At 2 p. m. the council resumed, the warden in the chair, members all present.

Moved by Mr. Aylsworth, seconded by Mr. Jackson, that the motion ordering the treasurer to collect the money due from the

OUR OTTAWA LETTER.

OTTAWA, March 19.—Trade questions are this session dwarfing all others in parliament. Five days debate has not yet disposed of the budget though there is an understanding that to-day, the sixth day, will see a division in the wee hours of Wednesday morning. This is really the fourth debate on trade questions so far and others are on the paper. Progress in Supply has been altogether stopped. A government's chief care is of course to get the supplies voted through. The leader of the House patiently waits the termination of talk. I was

IN THE PARLIAMENTARY BARBER SHOP.

Thursday evening, when the Premier came down for a shave. It was between eleven and twelve o'clock and "the old man as he is very often called,looked tired out. I asked him, while he waited a minute for Napoleon to finish swabbing my face, if there would be a division that night, as it was rumored, he was going to force the sitting on until a vote was taken. "No," he replied, "we have just arranged that no vote will be taken till Tuesday," adding "you see the government can't always have things their own way." The chieftain then laid back his venerable head for the barber. Napoloen, the barber, had just been telling me that the Premier had "a funny shaped head" as he termed it. Napoleon has handled all the great heads of the Dominion and professes to be quite a practical phrenologist. Big sleek heads do not, he says, always contain the biggest brains. He is making a collection of a unique character, keeping a lock of hair from the head of each statesman that comes under his tonsorial care. Mr. Blake's is of a fine texture without a trace of gray althought he is 55.

KILLED IN COMMITTEE.

The duel between Col. Tisdale, of Simcoe, and Mr. Brown, of Hamilton, has resulted in victory for the former, and the defeat of the Pigeon Shooting Bill. It had been passed one stage by a majority of one, and defeated another by a majority of one, and then put back on the paper by a majority of four. In committee Col. Tisdale again attacked the bill and the count showed 57 against and only 60 for the bill which was therefore thrown out, this time for good as the session is so far advanced that no further effort this year will be made by Mr. Brown. Live pigeon shooting is not yet, therefore unlawful.

THE JESUITS BILL.

Col. O'Brien's intention to bring up the Jesuits Bill and make the House vote on it is the leading theme here. The gallant member for Muskoka was reported several times to have agreed to withdraw the motion but as I pointed out before he is a man of independent mind where his convictions are concerned and he yesterday declared his original intention unaltered. That intention as announced in the House is to move that the bill should be vetoed as an amendment to the governments motion to go into supply. No amendment to the amendment can be moved on such an occasion so that it would be a straight vote of yea or nay. If it was offered as a substantive resolution there would certainly be two amendments and on the last one the vote would be taken so that Mr. O'Brien's method is the only one compelling a straight vote on the principal involved. Of course such a motion will be one of want of confidence in the government and on that ground many will vote against it who would otherwise vote for a substantial resolution. The Globe's manifesto of Saturday is an invitation to the Liberals to vote with Col.

Case of Blackmail.

OTTAWA, March 15.—The case of Bell v, Tupper, which has been looked forward to with much expectancy for some time past, came before Justice McMahon and a jury at the Carleton Assizes to-day. It is the case where Mrs. R. B. Bell, keeper of a boarding-house in Ottawa, sues Sir Charles Tupper for some $600, alleged to be due for services rendered by her as a "spotter" on the Intercolonial railway in 1881. She testified to-day that she was employed by Sir Charles personally, and he engaged to pay her out of his own pocket. She got passes, and she and her husband were engaged on the work. She made several reports of the result of her observations to Sir Charles. One of the chief duties laid upon her by her employer was to ascertain if Mr. Carvell, who had been superseded by Mr. Pottinger in the management of the road, was still allowed to travel free on the road by the conductors. One unpleasant result of this espionage was that a conductor named Hillson, a nephew of Sir Charles, was reported by Mrs. Bell two or three times for passing persons free. She also found that Mr. Carvell travelled on the road with a pass. She was recalled in December and told by the defendant that she had done her work well, but not to be in a hurry for her money, as he had to pay it out of his own pocket. She had only received $7 of the money due her. Mrs. Bell's husband corroborated her evidence, as did her daughter, Mrs. Short. Mr. McCarthy, in cross-examination, succeeded in puzzling the witnesses considerably, and their stories were not consistent. The defence called Sir Charles Tupper, who denied in toto every statement made by the plaintiff and her witnesses. He had never engaged her for any work, and all the rest of the story was equally fictitious. Mr. Dalton McCarthy, Mr. W. D. Hogg, and Mr. Wm. Mosgrave appeared for the defence, and Mr. J. Gibb and Mr. G. Lount, Q. C., for the plaintiff.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

Judge McMahon then said to Bell that he would take till morning to consider whether he should not direct the grand jury to consider the propriety of considering the charge of perjury against him and his wife. He considered that both had been guilty of the grossest perjury. It was certainly, he added, a case of blackmail on the part of the plaintiff and her husband.

OTTAWA, March 16.—To-day Judge MacMahon sent to Mrs. Bell desiring her presence in court. Mrs. Bell, however, failed to appear, the plea being that she was confined to her bed completely prostrated by a nervous attack.

The plaintiff and her husband are well known not only in Napanee, but through out this county. R. B. Bell is a cousin of John W. Bell, M. P., for Addington, and at one time resided in Napanee.

Mr. Bell has been engaged as doorkeeper of the House of Commons at the munificent salary of $250 per session. On Monday last he received a notification from the speaker of the House that his services would no longer be required.

The Brompton Hospital for consumptives, London, Eng., published a statement that fifty-two (52) per cent. of the patients of that institution have unsuspected kidney disorder. Prof. Wm. H. Thompson of the University of the city of New York, says "More adults are carried off in this country by cronic kidney disease than by any other one malady except consumption." The late Dr. Dio Lewis, in speaking of Warner's Safe Cure, says over his own signature "If I found myself the victim of a serious kidney trouble, I would use Warner's Safe

At 2 p. m. the council resumed, the warden in the chair, members all present.

Moved by Mr. Aylsworth, seconded by Mr. Jackson, that the motion ordering the treasurer to collect the money due from the different municipalities be re-considered. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Aylsworth, seconded by Mr. Jackson, that the motion before the council relating to the treasurer being instructed to collect from the different municipalities the amount of uncollected rates be rescinded.

The Warden declared this motion lost but Mr. Parks immediately demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. Filson refused to allow the yeas and nays to be taken and said that if Mr. Parks wished to appeal to the council that he could do so.

Mr. Parks said "No. If you wish to violate the rules of the council I prefer leaving you just in that position."

Mr. Sexsmith and Mr. Reid both told the warden that he was wrong and urged him to allow the vote to be taken. Very reluctantly the warden backed down from his untenable position and the yeas and nays were taken with the following result :

YEAS.—Messrs. Aylsworth, Allison, Derbyshire, Fraser, Jackson, Lapum, Parks, H. Reid, Sexsmith, L. Wagar, Jas. Wagar.—11, NAYS.—Messrs. Ball, Baker, Bryden, Carson, Filson, Roblin, Jas. Reid, Sweetnam, Thomson, Wees.—10.

The motion was then declared carried.

Moved by Mr. Sexsmith, seconded by Mr. Lapum, that the treasurer be instructed to collect all county rate remaining unpaid on the 15th day of May next from the different municipalities. Carried.

The minutes of to-day were read and confirmed.

On motion the council adjourned until the second Tuesday in June next.

NOTES.

Reeve Lapum voted against the reduction in the treasurer's salary. Perhaps he will have to explain why.

The Beaver foisted Robert Filson on the council for the position he now occupies. Warden Filson and Editor Scott are a well matched team.

We congratulate councillors Jackson and Derbyshire on the saving they have brought about to the county. They have made a move in the right direction.

Cyrus Allison, the popular reeve of South Fredericksburgh, has done a good thing for the township he represents, in securing so in the government and on that ground many will vote against it who would otherwise vote for a substantial resolution. The Globe's manifesto of Saturday is an invitation to the Liberals to vote with Col. O'Brien on the ground that the Act was not within the jurisdiction of the Quebec Legislature. The Minister of Justice has said it was wholly within their jurisdiction, so that there are two opinions on the point. The situation is decidedly interesting. Senator Macdonald has resigned the presidency of the Dominion Evangelical Alliance because the executive of that body decided to petition the Queen. Mr. Macdonald thinks the Dominion authority, the Governor General, should first be exhausted and notwithstanding that the Federal government has passed an order-in-council agreeing not to interfere with the bill they yet have till August within which time the Act may be disallowed.

IN AND AROUND THE HOUSE.

The private bill enabling Queen's College Board to hold property bequeathed to them was challenged by Mr. D. Mills as unconstitutional, but it was carried on a division by a large majority.

Dr. Bergin believes the proposed plans for the security of the Cornwall canal are wrong and that the chief engineer, Mr. Page, adheres to them from professional jealousy of the interference of other engineers. He concluded his statement to this effect yesterday in the House, and his motion for papers carried.

Mr. Kerkpatrick's bill providing for full reciprocity in wrecking, passed, though rejected last session. Under it Canadian vessels wrecked may be relieved by Americans and a similar law will now become in force in the United States.

It is understood the imposition of postage on fortnightly and monthly publications will not be enforced so strong has been the protest.

Mr. Davies the P. E. I. Liberal leader is to visit and speak in Western Ontario this week.

The Royal Canadian Academy of Art is holding its annual exhibition here. Its president, Mr. L. R. O'Brien is brother of Col. O'Brien, M. P.

There is no talk now of Mr. Blake not staying out the session. He is in the House every day but never opens his lips.

Col. Bacon, of Ottawa, has been appointed to the command of the Wimbledon team for 1889.

In future only steamers from Europe putting in both summer and winter at Canadians ports will be subsidized by the government.

The Senate has twenty-three members over 70 years of age, some of them reaching 80 and over. Three are 85 viz., Botsford, Wark and Ryan.

BELLEVILLE, March 18.—The hull-less oat swindle is rapidly approaching a climax here. On Saturday numbers of people who had given their notes were in town demanding them from the holders; and whilst some were put off by artifices, the more determined and persistent succeeded in recovering their securities. The county attorney Mr. Geo. E. Henderson, Q. C., was consulted by an irate farmer and declared the scheme to be a swindle, and stated, that upon application being made in proper form, he will have the swindlers arrested. Mrs. Elizabeth Way, a widow, who lives in Prince Edward, recovered her note for $200 by the aid of County Constable Johnston; but another widow from the same township, who had given a note for a like amount, was not so fortunate. It is reported, however, that the man who holds the note, for which he is said to have paid $50, will give it up.

P. SLAVEN & CO'Y

Have opened sixty-five cases and bales of new goods during the past week and are now showing one of the largest and choicest stocks that they have ever shown, comprising all the newest styles and colors of Dress Goods, Prints, Sateens, Ribbons, Hosiery, Gloves, Parasols, Embroideries, Kid Gloves, Handkerchiefs, etc., etc.

—IN THE—

Carpet and House Furnishing Department,

We show a grand stock of fine Carpets, Lace Curtains, Toilet Quilts, Cretonnes, Fringes, Curtain Poles, etc. Prices of all Goods are marked down to meet the closest competition.

P. SLAVEN & CO.

We have just received one carload of Mothproof Paper Felt for laying under Carpets. This Felt should be laid under every Carpet as it makes the room warmer in winter and prevents moths in summer, makes the Carpet smoother and softer to walk on, and makes it wear a great deal longer.

Manitoba and British Columbia.

Parties going to Manitoba or British Columbia should buy through tickets over Canadian Pacific R. R. from J. L. Boyes, Napanee. He can sell a ticket from Napanee to destination and check baggage through. No other agent can do this. When passengers have a through ticket and baggage checked through they avoid all trouble. 1389 2m

There is some talk that Mr. Whelan is going to to build another hotel on the place where the old one was burnt. Probably he will wait and see the result of the present struggle.

Last Wednesday night (13th inst.) a Scott Act meeting was held at the school house, sec. 16. The speakers were Messrs Thornton, Storrings and Barry, who spoke against the "sore evil."

There was a dance in this neighborhood lately, and there is a rumor of another to be shortly. this is only a token of what is anticipated by some. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth: and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things, God will bring thee into judgement."

Honesty and Intelligence.

It pays to be honest, you say.

Granted.

Yet how many are dishonest through ignorance, expediency, or intentionally. One can be dishonest and yet say nothing.

A clerk who lets a customer buy a damaged pieces of goods, a witness who holds back the truth which would clear a prisoner, a medical practitioner who takes his patient's money when he knows he is doing him no good,—all are culpably dishonest.

It is generally known that doctors bind themselves by codes, resolutions and oaths not to use any advertised medicines. Now, there is a medicine on the market which, for the past ten years, has accomplished a marvelous amount of good in the cure of Kidney and Liver diseases, and diseases arising from the derangement of these great organs,—we refer to Warner's Safe Cure. So widespread are the merits of this medicine that the majority of the doctors of this country know from actual evidence that it will cure Advanced Kidney Disease, which is but another name for Bright's Disease.

The medical profession admit that there is no cure for this terrible malady, yet there are physicians dishonest enough to procure Warner's Safe Cure, put the same into plain,

Several of our most promising young men have just left for Manitoba, and many more are to follow. A great many horses and young colts have also been shipped to the west.

The travelling on the ice has become unsafe although some are venturing on the bay with light rigs.

The Scott Act meeting, at the Town hall South Fredericksburgh on Monday night, was a great success, considering the terrible state of the roads. Peter Bristol, Esq., in the chair, A. L. Morden, Esq., and the Rev. Baker, of Napanee, were with us, as good men, and true, and gave capital speeches, that cannot but be helpful to the cause.

The Rev. Mr. Ash will preach at Conway next Sabbath, at 3 o'clock, instead of the evening, and will preach a sermon to young men in the Town hall, Sillsville at night. This latter service will be regarded as a valedictory to the young men who are about to leave for Manitoba.

Our reeve is home once more after a week of hard work at the County Council. We hope that he will succeed in getting the new iron bridge at Selby.

Bright's Disease.

The medical profession admit that there is no cure for this terrible malady, yet there are physicians dishonest enough to procure Warner's Safe Cure, put the same into plain, four-ounce vials, and charge their patients $2.00 per vial, when a sixteen-ounce bottle of the remedy, in its original package, can be bought at any drug store in the world for for $1.25.

Perhaps the doctor argues that the cure of the patient justifies his dishonesty, yet he will boldly stand up at the next local medical meeting and denounce Warner's Safe Cure as a patent medicine, and one which he cannot and will not use.

The people are waking up to the truth that the medical profession is far from honest, and that it does not possess a monopoly of wisdom in the curing of disease, doctoring the many symptoms of kidney disease, instead of striking at the seat of disease—the kidneys themselves,—allowing patients to die rather than use a remedy known to be a specific, simply becaue it has been advertised, and when patients are dead from Advanced Kidney Disease, still practicing deception by giving the cause of death in their certificate as pneumonia, dropsy, heart disease, or some other accompanying effect of Bright's Disease.

Lieut. Col. Bacon, of Ottawa, will command this year's Wimbledon team.

Scott Act Meetings

Meetings to oppose the repeal of the Last week the matter of the re-survey of Kennebec came up in the Legislative Assembly. Mr. Miller moved for copies of all correspondence and orders-in-Council relating to the re-survey of the township of Kennebec, in the County of Frontenac. Also of all correspondence between all members and officers of the Government and L. D. Williams, or anyone on his behalf in reference to the sale to him of lot No. 11. in the 4th concession of Kennebec, or as to issue of a patent therefor. Also, copies of all correspondence relating to the timber license granted for the land, or the rights of the limit holder thereunder. He said that there had been two inaccurate surveys of this township, which had created great hardship and confusion. Men found that their lots and the property they had erected were by the re-survey declared to belong to their neighbors. One man found that the re-survey shifted his property into the lake.

Mr. Hardy admitted there was something to complain of. One of the surveyors who had made erroneous surveys went out of his mind, and the Government did not learn of the fact till some years after. The late Commissioner of Crown Lands had been prevented by illness from adjusting matters. The Government would, no doubt, have to pass a special measure legalizing the surveys which appeared equitable. The Surveyor-in-chief was considering the matter.

A Circumst

THE DESERTER.

It was the last year of the Civil War—a year full of anxiety, suspense and privation of every kind. Down here in Louisiana we were beginning to realize that our cause was hopeless, and that the Confederacy was near its end. I suppose it was that knowledge which made people so reckless. Men had lost all sense of responsibility in the whirl of events, and acts were constantly committed, which, in the light of a calmer day, seem the acts of madmen.

New Orleans, in possession of the Federals, had quieted down to a certain extent, but the country parishes were in a ferment, occupied as they were in turn by Confederate and Northern troops. The ravages of irresponsible, plundering bands had become so terrible in some of the Western parishes that, at the urgent invitation of Judge Maxwell, who was a distant relative of mine, I took refuge with him at Boscabel, a plantation in the Red River Country.

This district, it is true, was occupied by Federal troops, but they were well disciplined, and committed no outrages. After the terrors and uncertainties of the "debatable ground," there was a comfortable feeling of security in finding ourselves within the lines and not in danger of capture. Several ladies, friends of Judge Maxwell, had collected at Boscabel, so our social life was far from dull.

Beautiful Adela Maxwell was our host's young daughter-in-law. She had only been married a week when her husband, who had enlisted in General Taylor's army, was compelled to leave her.

She was a lovely, irresponsible child—a spoiled one, too. At sixteen years of age, she had married Theo Maxwell, who was not then twenty. It was due to the recklessness so common at that period that the marriage of the young pair was sanctioned by the two families.

Theo was grave and thoughtful, beyond his years; brave, as were all the Maxwells, almost stern in his ideas of duty, and only weak where his beautiful little bride was concerned.

Most Southern women were brave and high-spirited, ready to make any sacrifice for a cause they considered sacred, but Adela had not a grain of patriotism in her soul. She did not care a straw which cause conquered, so that the war might end and Theo return home. Her standing grievance was that he had joined the army as a private, instead of marching forth in all the glory of a general's paraphernalia.

At times she would give way to a perfect passion of grief, and eat nothing for days. Then the mood would change, and she would be in the wildest spirits, laughing, singing, dancing. She reminded me of a butterfly I once saw lighting on the rim of a cannon the moment before it was discharged.

One morning she burst in upon us in the breakfast-room in an irritable and impatient mood.

"I can't stand this!" she cried. "I never closed my eyes all night thinking of Theo. I can't eat, I can't sleep, and I shall die if Theo doesn't come home! I must see with my own eyes that he is alive and well."

"But how can you expect him to come?" cried Dora Maxwell, the judge's daughter, a sensible, spirited girl, who had not too much patience with her sister-in-law's childish ways. "He is a soldier, a private, too, and they are not allowed a furlough every time their wives happen to cry for them. With all this skirmishing going on around us, you

"Dora, you had better take your sister to her room and make her lie down," the judge said, gently. "Adela, my dear, you must try to control yourself. Remember that your tears will not bring your husband back one day sooner. You are only injuring your health and for Theo's sake you must take care of that."

After they left the room, the judge and I sat silent until the lamps were lighted. Suddenly he sprang to his feet, for we heard the hurried steps of a man on the long veranda in front of the house.

Then the door was violently thrown open and Theo stood before us. Theo pale, wild-eyed, and covered with dust. He looked in our faces strangely, inquiringly, and uttered a deep groan. His parched lips strove to speak but the words died in a gasp.

"My son! what is the matter?" cried the judge, taking his hand.

"Adela, my darling! Is she dead?" the son managed to articulate. "Am I too late?"

"Adela! Why, she is in perfect health—never has been ill. She was in this room five minutes ago."

The judge stopped suddenly, terrified by his son's look. He had grown ghastly pale, and sank into a chair.

He covered his face with his hands, shaking as if in an attack of ague. In a moment he controlled himself and tried to speak calmly. "'Read that," he said, drawing a letter from his pocket, and handing it to his father, "and tell me if I could have stayed away?'

Months afterwards I read the letter. In it Adela told her husband she was dying and he must come to her immediately if he would see her alive, but, ill as she was, no one should write him but herself. If he loved her, come! The letter was written in faint, tremulous characters, as if the hand was too weak to hold the pen and her eyes too dim to see the lines.

Judge Maxwell's face was stern when he laid down the letter.

"It was an unjustifiable deceit," he said. "but you must try to forgive her. You must not let it embitter your visit."

"Father, do you not understand?" cried the young soldier. "I asked for permission to visit a dying wife, but the general positively refused. They expect a battle at Pleasant Pill, and not a man was allowed to leave. I came without permission."

"A deserter! you, Theo Maxwell!" cried the judge, looking stunned.

"Yes, a deserter on the eve of battle," Theo cried, with a bitter laugh. "I've done for myself now, father." There was a hurried step in the corridor, and in a moment Adela was in her husband's arms, crying and laughing hysterically.

"I heard your voice, darling," she cried "Why hadn't I been called? Didn't I tell you all he should come back to me? And now I've got him! I've got him! I've got him!" her voice rising shrill and strained with excitement. "But what is the matter, Theo? Why do you look at me like that? What is the matter with you all?"

"The matter, madam," cried Judge Maxwell, sternly, "is disgrace to my son and your husband. By your falsehoods you brought him from his post—made him a deserter. Do you know what that means. A disgraceful death! Yes, that is what you have brought upon the man you professed to love."

He got no further, for Adela's head fell back on her husband's shoulder in merciful unconsciousness. He strained her to his bosom and pressed a kiss upon her white lips.

"Dora, take her to her room," he said,

"Thank God!" sobbed Dora, "he was spared the ignominious fate of a deserter. I think he wanted to be killed."

Adela's grief at first was violent. She soon returned to her father's house. In a few months I saw her there as lovely, as irresponsible and as gay as if she had not caused the disgrace and death of the man who had loved her more than his duty.

they are not allowed a furlough every time their wives happen to cry for them. With all this skirmishing going on around us, you surely don't think there's any chance of his getting off? I do wish, Adela, you would try to be reasonable—for Theo's sake, if for no other reason."

"Look at Mrs. Rogers," she continued. "Her husband is in constant peril, and see how brave and cheerful she is! She says that is the only way in which she can imitate him."

"Don't talk to me of Mrs. Rogers!" Adela looked like a small fury. "Do you pretend to compare my love for Theo with hers for her husband? Easy enough to be quiet when she doesn't care a picayune for him! Didn't she actually hurry him off last week, when he hadn't been with her for more than an hour? Don't compare us, and set that cold-hearted thing up as my model!"

"I don't compare you," Dora said, dryly. "Mrs. Rogers is utterly unselfish, a noble woman, to whom the honor of her husband is as dear as his life. She hurried him off, because she knew if he waited until daylight his risk of being made a prisoner would be great. Besides, he had promised his captain to be back that night, and he was in honor bound to keep his word."

Adela burst into a flood of angry tears.

"Honor! honor!" she repeated, petulantly. "I just hate the word! Honor made Theo join the army, and leave me here to be wretched! Honor keeps him away! Some day honor is going to leave him on the battlefield, with a bullet in his heart. What will it do for me, if I lose him, I'd like to know? Nobody here feels for me. Nobody loves Theo as I do!"

She hurried from the room, but stopped on the threshold and turned her pretty, tear stained face to us.

"Theo shall come back to me, in spite of you all!" she cried.

Dora sighed deeply as the door closed behind Adela. "Poor Theo!" she said, softly. "He always seemed to feel such a contempt for silly women! Yet that girl can make him do anything!"

"She is such a child!" I interposed.

"Yes, and that makes her so unfit to be a wife. We are going to have an opportunity of sending letters through the lines today, and heaven only knows what Adela will write to her husband! Enough to make him wretched, I dare say, for she won't spare him a tear of hers. He'll fancy her pining to death, and before night, I dare say, she'll be laughing and singing."

But for once Dora was mistaken. Adela complained of a violent headache, and after writing her letter went to bed, and did not make her appearance until late the next day. Then she wore a subdued, rather frightened look, not natural to her. She appeared like a mischievous child who had done something naughty, and was afraid of being found out.

For the next two following days she was in a state of perpetual excitement almost hysterical. She would rush from door to window, or to any place which commanded a view of the long front avenue. At any unexpected sound she would spring up, and listen breathlessly, and then sink back in her seat with a sigh.

"I am afraid our little girl is getting nervous," said Judge Maxwell on the second evening, putting his arm affectionately around her. "Come, it won't do when Theo returns, for him to find a wife with her nerves unstrung. The women of our family were as brave as the men, and I can't have a Maxwell a coward."

"But I'm not an out and out Maxwell," she answered with an hysterical laugh; "and I'm an awful coward. Oh, why don't Theo come home!" This was followed by a violent burst of tears, and she wrung her hands as if in despair.

bosom and pressed a kiss upon her white lips.

"Dora, take her to her room," he said, "Be gentle with her for my sake, sister. She is only a child and did not know what she was doing. I must get away from here before she revives." He tightened his belt and pulled his cap over his eyes.

The old judge laid a trembling hand on his son's arm.

"Theo, my son," he said, tremulously, "don't go back! There is a squadron of Northern soldiers camped just back here in Miller's field. You can be taken prisoner by them you know, and you'll be safe from, from—"

He stammered and choked.

"I understand you, father," Theo said, quietly. "You mean if I am taken prisoner I will escape a deserter's fate. It would add cowardice to desertion. No, sir, I will get back the soonest I can, and bear my fate as your son should. I had to run a cordon of Federal troops coming here, and I fear it will be hard work getting back through the lines."

"But General Taylor is my friend." The old man's speech was growing inarticulate. "I will write to him, I will go to him. He must listen to me. No court martial could condemn you under such circumstances."

Theo smiled sadly.

"I hope for little leniency. I left on the eve of a battle, you must remember. Farewell, father! Be kind to my poor little wife. Dora, don't unman me." She was clinging to him and sobbing convulsively. "If you love me you will go back to Adela. Do not tell her what may happen to me. I leave her to you all as a sacred charge," he added, solemnly, and before any one answered had gone.

"I will go myself," stammered the judge, trying to rise from his seat. I will explain to General Taylor. My boy shall not be sacrificed." A convulsion passed over his face, his feet refused to support him and he sank back in the chair.

We knew well what was the matter. A year before he had an attack of paralysis, a slight one, and his old enemy had him once more in its relentless grip. For three days and nights we watched beside him until the end came.

A week afterward our cruel suspense as to Theo's fate was over. In trying to pass the Federal pickets he had been shot.

HEAD HUNTING.

As it is Practiced Among New Guinea Savages.

The bad habit some savages have of cutting off the heads of any strangers who fall in their way simply because heads are required to adorn their sacred houses or to serve in the dedicatory exercises of their war canoes, has tragically ended the careers of a number of white men within the past year, says the Boston "Herald." The latest news from New Guinea is that Mr. Armstrong, an Englishman, was recently lured to one of the coast islands, where he was decapitated and his head sent to the coast chiefs as proofs that the islanders were attending to business. About a year ago a brave in one of the wild tribes on the Indian frontier was not permitted to wed the maiden of his choice, because her relatives were of the opinion that he had not acquired a sufficient number of heads to demonstrate his prowess. It was agreed that when he could show two more heads he might have the girl, and so he sallied forth to win reputation and a bride. It happened that the first strangers the brave and his party encountered were Lieutenant Stewart of the British army and his small escort, who were led into an ambush and slaughtered, and their heads taken back in triumph to the village. This was the cap sheaf of a series of head-hunting outrages, and the brave had not long enjoyed his honey-moon before an Indian expedition fell upon the tribe and gave it some new views on the ethics of head-hunting. This favourite pastime has flourished greatly at Borneo, but it is now in a bad way in the British part of that island, where the penalty of death is visited upon every headhunter who is unlucky enough to be caught. A while ago the British authorities, in settling a dispute between two tribes, found that one village persisted in head-hunting because the other fellows had three heads the advantage of them. The accounts were balanced by a small supply of trade goods, and the rival head-hunters promised thereafter to live in amity.

LOST AT SEA.

Thrilling Experience of the Crew of the British Bark Port Gordon.

Chief Officer Smith of the British bar Port Gordon, has arrived at Port Townsend, Wash. Ter., on the tug Sea Lion, with twelve of the crew. He reports that the vessel was lost at 5 a. m. on Feb. 27 by the sea breaking over her, the men having to lash themselves in the rigging to prevent being washed overboard. The heavy sea prevented the men from lowering the boats, as each was crushed when launched. Two seamen attempted to swim ashore with lines, but were lost. The vessel grounded one hundred fathoms from the shore. The officers and crew remained in the rigging all the forenoon waiting for the sea to subside. The after house was torn away and made into rafts, on which four of the seamen got ashore. The vessel had a rope secure to the shore and efforts were made to get the men ashore. The steward and cook accidentally fell out of the basket and were washed ashore and died shortly afterward.

By night everybody excepting Capt. Gibbs, who remained on the wreck thirty-six hours, had got ashore. No clothing or provisions were saved. An Indian village near by supplied the men with food. On the second day the Captain swam ashore, and sent word to Cape Flattery for assistance. The first officer and nine men commenced the journey to Cape Flattery, and Sikkim and Suakin.

Sikkim and Suakin both threaten to give the British forces and their allies more trouble in the immediate future. The Mahdi is about to send reinforcements to Osman Digna for a new attack on the English lines, while the refusal of the Thibetans to make any concessions to the Indian Government seems to render another campaign among the Himalayas necessary for the coming season. Again, the dangerous impetuosity of the Ameer of Afghanistan needs to be restrained. Flushed with his defeat of Ishak Khan, he proposes, it is said, to take steps against Russia as the suspected instigator of Ishak. This imprudence England would have to restrain, since, however well pleased with the Ameer's fidelity to her, she could not permit him to go beyond his frontier and thereby give Russia an excuse for driving him back and crossing in her turn. Altogether, if the bursting of that "thunder cloud" which the British Secretary of War sees gathering over Europe should not come to pass during the present year, there will yet be some play of distant heat lightning for the British War Office to watch.—[N.Y Times.

The Glory of War Departing.

The Philadelphia "Press" says :—The new English drill book just adopted for the use of the army cuts the space given to company drill to one-half its old space and expands the pages devoted to tactics to thrice the old number. The mechanical wheeling of companies on whose perfection our militia companies pride themselves is left out altogether. So are the movements for counter-marching. The drill is greatly simplified. The figures and movements which make so fine a show on the parade ground and are so useless in battle are omitted. For the long, straight wheel, the rigid line, volley firing, counter-marching, and all the intricate drill to which so much time is given by our national guard, there is substituted a loose order in which the fire is maintained by the independent action of a cloud of skirmishers, and the company officers are occupied in feeding this skirmish line from the rear and keeping the company in hand over a wide area, not by command, but by the intelligent co-operation of the men.

Drew His Gun.

TORONTO, March 18.—Detective Black arrested Laywood Romain, a colored man living at 164 Centre street, and a porter at the Queen's hotel, charged with having shot at Henry Harris, another colored man on Centre street, early the other morning while returning from a dance. It is stated that Romain and his sitter were walking together on their way home when Harris attempted to take the girl away from him. Some hot words ensued and Romain drew a revolver and fired. The bullet fortunately flew wide of the mark and Romain fled without waiting to try a second shot. When taken to police headquarters he denied having fired at Harris, but alleges that his life was threatened if he would not allow his sister to go with Harris.

Went Home in Her Stockings.

A lady who visited Hooley's Theatre the other evening suffered through the first act of the play with exceedingly tight shoes. When the curtain fell she confided her sufferings to her husband, and he suggested that she slyly remove her shoes till the performance was over. This she did, and the consequent relief afforded her allowed her a proper enjoyment of the other act. When the curtain went down for the last time she discovered to her horror that her feet had so swollen in the warm atmosphere of the house that she could not get the tight shoes even on her toes. As they had only to walk to the Tremont House, and as the lady had on black stockings, her husband told her to do the shoes up in her programme and walk along as though nothing had happened. This she did, and they started to move out slowly with the crowd. The lady walked along comfortably until near the door, when she suddenly began to jump and cavort around as though mad. Her stockinged feet had struck an exceedingly warm register, and the heat had curled her feet out of shape during her brief sojourn on it. When she struck the stone sidewalk outside a chill replaced the feverish feeling, and when she reached the Tremont she swore never to wear tight shoes to the theatre again.—[Chicago Herald.

HEALTH.

About Eating.

The first organ that nature made for a living creature was a stomach. It is the most important to-day, after many thousands of years, and after the evolution of many other organs. But it is that one part of the body which we persist in neglecting or destroying; and just where nature began to build we begin to pull down. The possession of a good digestive organ is really more important than g od eyes and ears, and even more than a large brain; for the relation of the nerves of nutrition are as intimate with the other parts of the body as are the blood vessels. If the stomach be disordered the thinking and recollecting apparatus is also disordered, and the unseating of clear vision and good hearing is as liable to be from bad nutrition as from local causes. So it come about that the first lesson of education is how to eat and not how to think; how to warm up and run the organism and not clog it, rather than how to think; for if there be no hindrances or interferences the brain is sure to do good thinking and plenty of it. Nine-tenths of scholarship is wasted owing to indigestion. Many fine brains are rendered useless by a dyspeptic stomach. There is no getting around this. If you want to do good head-work you must digest suitable food to nourish the brain—enough of it, and not too much. This is exactly the reverse of the common practice, because we have not got over the old celibate and ascetic idea that the mind is somehow higher and better than the body, and can despise it. A college is the paradise of ignorance and stupidity on all matters pertaining to the stomach. Brains are supposed to have the entire control and alone to be worthy of consideration. The object of the whole curriculum is to culture heads; and the result is, the foundation of good head-work becomes impossible. Four out of five graduates are permanently disabled from doing their level best in the world, while the coarsest fellows in life outstrip the finer because they have better stomachs. We need a University of the Stomach, with a full set of professors of nutrition, digestion, assimilation and waste, as well as of general physiology, anatomy and general biology. Or better yet, each college and every common school in the land should teach how to take care of the body and how to save the stomach.

It is hardly possible to use language in such a manner as to place this matter before the people so distinctly and emphatically that they can not mistake its full import. To establish and maintain a sound digestion is not only a duty, but the foundation of all duties. It is our greatest need, and the lack of it our greatest disaster. We are hurrying civilization into degeneration, not by overworked brains, but by badly worked stomachs. The bottom of not only dyspepsia, but of insomnia, of hysteria, paralysis and apoplexy is bad eating. Few people really know or care what they eat if it gives no immediate distress. They bolt their food while reading the morning papers, which is no better that loading a wagon with a pitchfork, hay or turnips as it happens. When the headache follows there is a resort to drugs or alcohol. Others know a deal too much what they eat and drink and are simply desirous of the immediate pleasures of appetite. In either case the very center of the systen, the basis of all life and activity is assailed and destroyed. So far has this one and so widespread is the mischie that civilization affords a very few who can successfully endure the demands and needs of business and culture.

The amount of food devoured is immense-and next to this I believe very ripe currants to be invaluable.

Rules for diet are as common as snowflakes. It is impossible, however, for one to prescribe absolutely for another. The physician is never more severely taxed than when called on to resuscitate an enfeebled stomach. Vegetarians, Grahamites and a thousand other ites have their nostrums and prescribe with great confidence. The real necessity is to discover some preventive rather than a cure. Some one has said that dyspepsia is killing more people than rum. It certainly is undermining the national constitution and therewith the national character quite as fast as drunkenness. Intemperance is altogether the same vice whether it affects food or drink. Horace Mann sounded the note of warning to young men forty years ago in his famous lectures. They should be reprinted and reread. "No glutton or dyspeptic can stand up alongside a man with a sound stomach and clear head." "Nature abhors two things—a vacuum and a foul stomach." Whoever falls to eat wisely carries decay in his stomach. His breath is the smoke of the charnel house. Every faculty of mind and every function of body are affected, and degeneration is the result.

The most unpleasant feature of this intemperance of eating is that it is quite as easily added to heredity as the intemperance of drinking. We have to suffer for the sins of diet of our grandfathers. I have often been able to trace the ancestral blunders of my patients. The grandmother of one was an extravagant lover of tea and condiment. A stout, hale old lady, it was enough for her to know that she was not herself suffering dire consequences for her habits. The daughter was born with an irritable stomach, and suffered more or less all her life with nervous ills, but she adhered to the same diet as her mother. The next generation is now on the field, suffering the full measure of consequences of actions for which it is not personally responsible. Can the natural selfishness of human nature be overcome sufficiently to reverse this tendency, and make it a law that each generation shall have a little better chance than the last? If I am not mistaken, it can be so reversed, and there are pretty sure signs that our next generation will show the change. The boys and girls who in ten years will constitute the working world will have firmer nerves and better digestion, with more common sense habits than we have had.

The Value of Peanuts.

In the Northern States we know little of the peanut except as the chief luxury of the circus and the ball-ground, where the cheerful cry of "Peanuts, five a bag!" salutes the ear on every side, and where boys sit, like the sailor's wife in Macbeth, "and munch and munch and munch." At the South they are more important. Farmers in that genial clime plant them among the corn, as well as in the fields by themselves, and in the fall, when the corn is gathered, they turn all their pigs loose among the peanut vines to dig and eat.

The pigs root and grow fat. The field furnishes both food an exercise. The animals enjoy life to the utmost of their capacity, and, when Christmas comes, render to their owners, in return for the six weeks' banquet, a year's supply of excellent pork.

The peanut has other virtues During the war, when the Southern farmers had to send all the corn they could spare to the army, they went far more extensively than ever before into the cultivation of substitutes, and then the peanut became a really valuable crop.

Besides nourishing pigs and chickens, and thus saving corn, it was found to be of nutritive power as human food, particularly

THE CANADIAN MUTUAL AID ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The eight annual meeting of "The Canadian Mutual Aid Association" was held at the company's office, 10 King street east, Toronto, on Thursday, 24 inst., a good representative gathering being present.

The President, Mr. William Rennie, occupied the chair, and in opening the meeting expressed his pleasure at seeing so many of the policy holders present, and was also specially pleased to see the number of the active agents of the Company present. Great success, he said, had been the experience of the past year. Although steady progress had marked the work of the Association from its organization, yet the past year far exceeded its predecessors in the volume of new business. He attributed this to the growing popularity of the assessment system of the insurance and more especially to the equitable and popular plan of our Company. We issued during the year 1888, new and renewed policies, 1,508, representing insurance to the amount of $2,306,000; the total number of policies now in force being 4,393, representing a total insurance of $9,017,000. In Reserve Fund there is now in the credit of policyholders about $40,000. During the past year there was paid out to beneficiaries to the large sum of $88,776 This system of insurance, he said, evidently filled a long felt want, giving, as it did insurance at such rates as were within the reach of the people who most needed such protection. Our Company aimed, not alone at CHEAP INSURANCE, but rather RELIABLE INSURANCE at REASONABLE COST, and our success is the best evidence of the wisdom of our plan of insurance.

The manager, Mr. Wm. Pemberton Page, was then called upon to read the Directors' Report. The following is condensed from the financial statement: civilization affords a very few who can successfully endure the demands and needs of business and culture.

The amount of food devoured is immense. We are able to meet the demands or the craving [illegible] Growth and repair are the two demands in early life, and repair alone is the requirement of our later years, and these require no such engorgements of food as are indulged in by the masses. The heat of the body must always be sustained at nearly 100 degrees. In summer we have only to combat a few degrees of lower temperature; but in winter by food and clothing, we must raise the body heat from zero outside of us to 100 degrees above zero inside of us. It plainly will not do to eat in summer as we do in winter, as much, or of the same kind of food—if we consider heat alone. But in summer we live, as a rule, more active lives and pass off superfluous heat with great ease and rapidity, while the surface of this body is cooled by perspiration. Besides, in winter we live, on the average, far more sedentary lives, rendering it much more difficult to get rid of superfluous food. It is probable that most people digest and assimilate and dispose of waste so much better in the warm season that they eat more than in winter—and ought to do so. The kind of foods used should, however, be very unlike. It is almost impossible in summer to eat too much of ripe fruits, while of meats very few care to eat in large amounts.

There is a remarkable revolution going on in this matter of diet. Twenty-five years ago the consumption of fruit per capita in the United States could not have exceeded one-half the present consumption, for the simple reason that it was not procurable. The increased growth of small fruits is enormous, but the demand is said to fully keep up with the supply. Thousands of additional acres are planted to berries each season, but there is no glut on the market. Fifty years ago a strawberry garden was almost unknown, and there were no cultivated raspberries ever seen in market. Residents of cities rarely ever enjoyed a dish of berries of any sort. Now our farmers consider their homes incomplete without a good berry garden, while the vegetable garden is less thought of and cared for. One of the most wholesome of all foods is the grape. The enormous increase in its cultivation is to be welcomed by all who desire to see a healthy people.

It is one of those fruits that can be indulged in almost without limit. A surfeit of grapes is hardly a possibility. Thousands of tons are now consumed where one ton was eaten thirty years ago.

It is hardly possible to use too much fruit as food. While it certainly is injurious to be always eating of anything, even apples and peaches and grapes, yet at regular hours an honest stomach not only craves a large supply of fruit, but uses it for the health of the whole system. Most fruits, however, are best in their season, and often injurious out of season. The seeds of canned berries are very often troublesome or positively dangerous. Eaten in the fresh state one by one they are all right in summer, but in the cooked or semi-cooked state they are liable to clog the system. Again a few fruits are poisonous to special organisms Many persons can not eat strawberries. I know one who can not eat an orange without severe suffering and almost convulsions. Red raspberries in one case only I have found to be severely injurious, while black raspberries are often rejected unnecessarily by those who like them. Grapes I have never known to be injurious to any one, if seeds and skins are rejected. We should eat more oranges. The lemon is also of prime value, although the acid should be weakened for most stomachs. For my own health I prefer the sour cherry when quite ripe to all other fruits, the grape excepted.

tutes, and then the peanut became a really valuable crop.

Besides nourishing pigs and chickens, and thus saving corn, it was found to be of nutritive power as human food, particularly when eaten with a little syrup made from the juice of the watermelon. Some wise Southern women learned how to make peanut candy from peanuts and watermelon syrup. The children liked it very much; their mothers found it tolerable, and as to the colored people in the South, they would eat almost anything short of brickbats if it was covered with sweet syrup.

The peanut had another use during the war. As kerosene and whale oil could not be obtained, the women were driven to their wits' end to procure the means of lighting their houses. Among other substitutes, the oil compressed from peanuts was found to be useful. Like other nuts, it contains much oil—more than we should suppose, one nut furnishing several drops.

Perhaps, however, we ought not to call it a nut, since it grows in the ground like a vegetable. The southern people call it by several names, ground pea, ground nut, pindar, peanut and goober, the last name being probably of African origin.

It grows abundantly on the coast of Africa, whence vast quantities are conveyed to Europe, and this name may have been brought from that continent by our negroes. In Alabama, goober is still the common name for the peanut.

Rev. Dr. Parker on the Present and Future.

Dr. Parker is convinced that the whole situation of religion in England needs radical revision. He believes that the Established Church is doing infinitely more harm than good, that the Book of Common Prayer is full of Popery and that the High Churchman is the only consistent interpreter of its teachings. On the other hand, Nonconformists, split up into so many sections, are spending their time and energy in tearing and devouring one another. Their training of men for the ministry is, he says, in seven cases out of ten a simple mockery. Instead of committing the whole Bible to memory and making themselves acquainted with the toiling and starving people around them, they are made to study the Council of Chalcedon, the Filioque controversy, the views of Apollonaris Satellius and Arius, with various tomfooleries that pass under the elastic name of philosophy. He would have the various Nonconformists concentrate their forces, shut up all their colleges but two or three, and try to get for their ministers something like a genuine and practical education, which would help instead of hindering them in their after life work.

All this may be rather strongly put, as is Dr. Parker's way in many cases, but there is a vast deal of truth in it all the same for this as for the other side of the Atlantic.

AUDITORS' REPORT.

To the President and Directors of the Canadian Mutual Aid Association.

GENTLEMEN,—We have carefully audited the books and accounts of your Company, and compared vouchers with expenditure for the year ending 31st December, 1888, and have found them correct. We have also had free access to all bonds, mortgages and other securities held by the Company, and have much pleasure in certifying to their accuracy as shown in the Directors' report.

We find $23,000 of the funds (Reserve and Disbursement) invested at 6 per cent. $11,390 at 7 per cent. and all deposits in banks are drawing 4 per cent.

We would also express our approvel of the very satisfactory manner in which we find the affairs of the Company.

JOHN PETERS, Hastings,
JOHN WALES, Oakville, } Auditors.

Toronto, Jan. 24, 1889.

A Starved Life.

I recall the child who used to come home from his playfellows' houses, bright with chrysanthemums, and watched by some dignified, devoted dog, when the tail of the pet bird rang out between the games, and entering, his own staid, well-kept home, ask piteously of his mother, "Why can't we have flowers and birds like other folks?" "They are too much care," was always the answer, and the poor little life grew up starved for want of pretty things, a cross, unlovely child and youth. When means came to his hands, however, to spend for his naturally good tastes, the change was notable in his looks and disposition. The soured face reflected something of the beauty with which he surrounded himself, the arch of the brow lifted, the eye beamed and expanded, graciousness taking the place of dissatisfaction.

You can not put human nature under continual strain and denial, to have any health or beauty from it—least of all in a child. Hamper children, cross their personal likings only when imperative. If possible, make their likings your own, so far that you cross your own pleasure in crossing theirs, and let them see that you do. If the girl sets her heart on a blue and gold Longfellow edition in place of the white vellum you prefer, grant her choice graciously, and let the boy wear high-colored neckties in his teens, when crude color delights his untamed eye. They will get over these inaccuracies of taste soon, but they will not get over their confidence in the love that was indulgent of their whims.

Parents miss a fast link to a child's heart when by preoccupation or carlessness they lose the chance of sheltering him from fright and griefs. Children suffer terribly from imaginary fears when alone or in the dark, and the cruelty which laughs at them, or turns them over to their terrors unfeeling, is never forgotten. Never to show them anything frightful, in nature or art, should be of one of the cannons of a family. The way their fancy reduplicates anything horrifying is akin to delirium.

Is any "Flower Born to Blush Unseen"?

The old wives tell us "that blushing is virtue's livery." But, alas! to many a maiden, whose soul is purity itself, has been denied the gracious privilege of wearing the delicate crimson; and all because her skin is covered with blotches, pimples, yellow "liver spots," and other discolorations. Who can tell how such a maiden loathes the very sight of herself, or who shall intrude upon her as she weeps bitter tears over her uncomely appearance? Thrice unhappy she, if by the use of cosmetics, she shall seek to hide her wretched complexion. But if she will use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, to regulate the liver and purify the blood of all poisonous humors, she will find that her "flesh shall come again like unto the flesh of a little child." It cures scrofula, tetter, salt-rheum, pimples, blotches, eruptions, and all skin diseases. Druggists.

—Rev. G. S. White, of Amherst Island, was in town on Monday en route to the county of Victoria, where he has gone to assist in the Scott Act campaign. Mr. White is a fluent speaker and will doubtless render valuable assistance there.

—The Brandon Sun says :—"At the late meeting of the quarterly board of the Methodist church it was decided to ask Rev. J. P. Wilson, the present pastor, to remain another term. It has fallen to the lot of few pastors to make such a favorable impression as Mr. Wilson has made in Brandon. He is looked upon as the ablest Methodist minister in the province."

—Edward Shultz, about forty-five years of age, married, was employed in Rothwell's shanty, at Little Lake near Odessa. Two weeks ago to-day while working with a man by the name of Heath, they felled an elm tree which lodged in an ash. The ash snapped, one of the top limbs skimming Shultz's face and breaking his shoulder. He died on Sunday morning last from the effect of his injuries.

—Mr. D. Fowler, of Amherst Island, is an accomplished artist and at the present time some of his pictures are attracting considerable attention in Ottawa where he is showing four water colors at the Art Exhibition. They are named "Low Water Bay of Quinte," "Heavy Squall," "A Wanderer in the Woodlands" and "Old Olive trees at Tivoli. The are all finely executed and show a true artists touch.

—At the Literary Society meeting held in the Eastern Church on Saturday evening, Miss Chambers distinguished herself by spelling down all competitors. As the leader of one of the sides, she rose to the responsibility of the position and although left to oppose no less than seven of the other side came off victorious and made them all take their seats. We congratulate Miss Chambers on her ability. We shall be glad to hear of more spelling matches. They are an educator.

—On Saturday last the Nimmo farm near Camden East was offered for sale by public action. The farm comprises three hundred and fifty acres and a few years ago would readily have brought $11,000 or $12,000. On Saturday it was bid in by Mr. Nimmo, of Edinburgh, for $7,600 or a falling off in price of over thirty per cent. This is another proof of the correctness of the statement recently made in the House of Commons by Sir Richard Cartwright and about which he was so bitterly assailed. The N. P. has done great things for the farmers.

On Monday last no less than seven residents of this county left for various points in Manitoba and the Northwest. A. Gravelstine and wife of North Fredericksburgh go to Morden, Manitoba. Mr. Gravelstine took with him a car load of horses, colts and farming implements. Albert Joyce and Murney Parks of the same township have gone to Deloraine, and Alex. and Thomas Rennie have chosen the same section as their future home. John G. Smith, of Napanee, went to Regina. At this rate of exodus a day's work will soon be worth a day's pay in this county.

to the stables in the Brisco House yard where they can be inspected. It will pay farmers to inspect this stock. Adv.

—On Sunday evening Rev. E. N. Baker will deliver a sermon on the sixth commandment. His sermon last Sunday night was a masterly effort. One week from next Sunday General-superintendent Carman will deliver educational sermons in Napanee.

—Mr. G. W. McCabe has brought us in the champion egg of the season. It measures eight inches one way and nine the other and weighs seven ounces. A Plymouth Rock hen performed the feat of producing this remarkable speciman of hen fruit. The egg is now on exhibition at THE EXPRESS office.

—A load of local talent went out to Switzerville on Wednesday evening to assist at the social held there. They went out in a sleigh but Walt says some of them had to follow a wagon home about two o'clock in the morning, the sleigh having collapsed. And yet people will talk about the fun there is in going to a social in the country.

—The assizes will open here on Monday next, before Justice Falconbridge. Thus far five jury, and two non-jury cases have been entered for trial. There will also be a small amount of criminal business to be disposed of. The jury cases are Webster vs. the Grand Trunk Ry., Wilson vs. the G. T. R., Vanslyck vs. the G. T. R., Lawson vs. Abell, and Curl vs. Baird. The non-jury cases to be tried are Cartwright vs. Stevens and Bartels vs. Vanslyck.

—A peculiar accident happened yesterday at the crossing near Grange's drug store. The horses of Dr. Cowan and Mrs. Sidney Warner met at the crossing, when the Doctor's horse was seized with blind staggers. Rearing, it came down on the wheel of Mrs Warner's carriage and the animal's legs became so entangled in the wheel that the wheel had to be taken off the carriage before the animal could be extricated.

—Harvey Warner and J. Rudd Perry arrived home from the sunny south on Friday last. During their absence they travelled upwards of six thousand miles, passed through twenty-seven States of the Union and took in the sights in some of the most important cities of the Uuited States. They were particularly charmed with New Orleans and its darkeyed beauties.

—On Monday last the Western Canada Loan and Savings Company appointed J. C. Drewry their appraiser for Lennox and Addington, and he is now prepared to loan any amount of money at lowest rates of interest. The Western has a large business in this county. Anyone desiring information regarding either old loans or new ones can procure it by applying directly to J. C. Drewry at THE EXPRESS office.

—Remember the Scott Act mass meeting to be held in the town hall here to-morrow at half-past one. An invitation is extended to all temperance workers in the county. Let there be a grand rally as final arrangements must be made for polling day. Able speakers will address the meeting. Friends of the Scott Act can secure voters lists on application to either A. L. Morden or A. R. Davis. The name of a scrutineer for every polling district in the county must be sent in to the secretary so as to reach him not later than April 1st., as on that day the returning officer will appoint said parties scrutineers for their respection polling districts. Let every committee work faithfully until the night of April 4th, and the result must be the retaining of the Act.

—Fresh oranges and lemons only 20c per dozen at Bruton's.

—Mrs. J. W. Bristol in her 88th year has just finished two crib quilts, each containing 1,017 pieces.

—The case of Baird vs. Parks, otherwise known as the North Fredericksburgh protest matter, came up in Toronto on Tuesday last, and was further enlarged until Tuesday, April 9th.

—Division court was held here on Wednesday, before Judge Price. But few cases were disposed of. In the case of John Herring vs. Elias Clapp of Adolphustown, the plaintiff was non-suited, each party to pay their own costs.

—A lively runaway occured on Wednesday afternoon. A horse belonging to Miles Fralick, dashed up Main street as far as John street, and then went up as far as the market square where it was captured. The cutter to which the horse was attached was badly wrecked.

—Messrs. John Rennie and John Cliff, have in contemplation the erection of an Opera House on east street just in rear of the new Rennie block. They propose putt-

SCOTT ACT COLUMN.

It is currently reported that Prayn & Son have secured the refusal of the store adjoining their grocery establishment and that, if the Scott Act is repealed, they will open a liquor store there. Is this why Mr. Harshaw is so opposed to the Scott Act? What do other grocerymen think of this feature of the case?

HOW TO VOTE.

The form of the ballot tickets for the election to take place in these United Counties on the 4th of April, is as below. "Against the Act," is printed in red ink; "For the Act," in black ink:—

Hall's remarks he would move to rescind his motion. This was done and then the report of the committee, as originally presented, was adopted.

An effort was made to secure some of the business men to canvass for stock, but nearly all of them pleaded lack of time.

The stock book is now being prepared and will be immediatly circulated.

We trust that the required amount will be raised and that the works will be pushed. The enterprise looks like a safe one, and certainly there is room for such a business in the Bay of Quinte section.

—Twenty-one people left this county for points in Manitoba and the Northwest, on Monday last, and several more have followed them since that time.

PERSONAL.

—Mr. Henry Fralick has gone to New York on business.

—Mr. Henry Lane left for chicago on Tuesday morning.

—Miss Lizzie Miller, is home again after a long visit in Toronto.

—Mrs. J. N. Armstrong, of King[illegible] upon her father, Wilder Joy, Esq.

cutter to which the horse was attached was badly wrecked.

—Messrs. John Rennie and John Cliff, have in contemplation the erection of an Opera House on east street just in rear of the new Rennie block. They propose putting up a fine structure, and fitting it up in first-class style. Mr. Cliff is busily engaged on the plans. If this scheme is carried out, Mr. Ben Brisco, will not rebuild his hall.

—As intimated in last week's paper, Mrs. McCarthy, of Camden East, was, on Saturday last, fined $100 and costs for a second offence against the Scott Act. James M. Gamble, of the Tichborne House, was convicted of having liquor for sale and for offering it for sale, and was fined $50 and costs for each case. He had to contribute $114.50 to the county treasury. Mr. C. A. Cornell, of the Brisco House, has been summoned for to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, to answer to the charge of a second offence against the Scott Act.

—At the last regular meeting of "No Surrender" lodge No. 18 Royal True Blues. The following were duly installed officers for the current year: Bro. J. W. Schryver, W. M.; Bro. Wm. Warner, D. M.; Bro. Jas. Plumley, Chap.; Bro. A. Briggs, R. S.; Bro. M. S. Plumley, Treas.; Bro. F. Scott. F. of C. The nights of meeting were changed to the first and third Thursdays of each month. The lodge is progressing having initiated ten since their December meeting. Visiting brethren are always welcomed.

—For the past few weeks the friends of Amos H. Allison have noticed that he has been rapidly failing in health, and that his mind has gradually been weakening. Last week he grew rapidly worse, so that on Saturday it was deemed advisable to remove him to his brother's residence in the township of Richmond. His mind has become completely unsettled, and it is feared that he will never recover. Heavy losses in bucket shop deals preyed upon his mind constantly, and the result is that today his reason is dethroned.

—On Tuesday afternoon an assault case from Amherst Island engaged the attention of Police Magistrate Daly. The plaintiff was William Fleming and the defendant goes him one better and styles himself William J. Fleming. Both parties reside on Amherst Island. The assault was committed on the 13th day of March, about one mile from the village of Stella. The evidence was conclusive against the defendant and the Magistrate imposed a fine of $4 and costs. Warden Filson was on hand to testify to the previous good character of the defendant, but the Magistrate did not take his evidence.

—We have received a great many reports regarding the sermon delivered on Sunday evening last by Venerable Archdeacon Bedford-Jones. We are informed that he styled prohibition and total abstinence quack remedies, and claimed that the grace of God should be relied upon, rather than the legislation of a parliament, to suppress the liquor traffic. We asked if he advocated the doing away with laws against theft and murder but the reply was "no." Another informant who heard the discourse, tells us that the Archdeacon said "We ought to thank God that we have the whiskey to drink to stimulate us to pray for grace to resist temptation." We can scarcely credit that a professed Christian clergyman should so far forget what he owes to his position and his God as to use his holy office to propogate such damnable doctrine. We prefer thinking that the Archdeacon's hearers have misconstrued his remarks, rather than believe that he forsook the line adopted by our Saviour who preached of Righteousness, Temperance and a Judgment to come.

are again to the front with a Splendid Line of Agricultural Implements.

FARMERS will study their best interests in purchasing from us, and we commend to their attention the following list of the best farming implements, which we are now in a position to supply at bottom prices.

Iron Frame Daisy Seeder

The Iron Frame Daisy Seeder, in the matter of simplicity, accuracy, and range of work, is without a successful rival.

It distributes all kinds of grain or grass seeds, without change of cumbersome gear wheels, which are done away with, the change of quantity being made in a moment, whether drill is in motion or at rest. The wide throats of the cups prevent all clogging with dirty seed. Our improved feed does not break nor crack the grain. To sow a larger quantity, a larger surface of the Fluted Feed Rolls, is brought into play, and the size of the cups remaining the same, the force of the feed is kept up during all changes. The grain is forced out, not spilled out.

The Daisy is furnished with the Latest and Best Improved Spring Hoe. The bars are strong and rigid and the Hoes can be almost instantly changed from Drill to Broadcast and vice versa. These Spring Hoes admit of the Daisy being used for cultivating, fallow or fall plowing.

NEW MILLINERY

Is the absorbing topic with the ladies. Miss Smith and her large staff are kept as busy as bees showing the many new and pretty styles and executing orders. Our stock of Childrens' Trimmed Hats is unusually attractive. Sailor Hats in endless variety. No trouble to show you the styles.

DRESS GOODS

DRESS GOODS

We have been fortunate in our selection of Dress Goods for this season. The patterns are all new and being imported direct cannot be obtained from other dealers. Moreover the prices are much lower than usual. Bargains in all wool Dress Goods at 15 cents worth 25 cents; bargains in French Dress Goods at 25 cents worth 40 cents.

Our Prints are pronounced the prettiest to be seen anywhere. We had the choice of the best manufacturers' stocks, and for variety and cheapness they cannot be equalled. See shem before buying.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

The undersigned desires to inform the public that he is prepared to

Spring Tooth Harrow

We are able to offer to the trade and farming community, our Spring Tooth Harrow, which is far in advance of anything attained before, and easily adjusted, so as to adapt itself to all kinds of soil, by simply raising or lowering the teeth.

Farmers can save the price of one of these Harrows in a very short time, in time and labor saved in going over the ground, as once going over prepares and mellows it up in such a condition to receive the seed as would not be obtained in going over three or four times with any of the ordinary Harrows. It is also the best seed coverer in the world.

Ground prepared by this Harrow will yield a larger crop than by any other agricultural implement, because it pulverizes the ground thoroughly, cuts the soil from the bottom, shakes it up, and leaves it in a loose condition; in so doing, it shakes out all grass, thistles, and weeds, leaving them on the surface in the sun, where they die much quicker than if half covered up.

We have also arranged to supply the farmers of this county with the one of the most useful Agricultural Implements now made. LIGHT DRAFT, no WALKING, no LOADING or UNLOADING from field to field. It is constructed of the very best material in the market, Solid Steel Teeth in Every Harrow, and Solid Steel Spokes in Every Wheel, and is designed to fill a long felt want in the agricultural world, as it is a well known fact that the present cumbersome and altogether unsatisfactory Harrow is unable to do the necessary work, and is altogether unworthy of the age in which we live. It is as far in advance of the present Harrow in use as the latest improved binder is in advance of the old-fashioned sickle. Past attempts to remedy this has brought out many other altogether unnecessary and expensive implements.

Herring's 2-Horse Iron Cultivator, and 2-Horse Wooden Frame Cultivator are unequalled in these counties for first class work. Strong, well-built and always to be depended upon, they are the only Implements suitable for cultivating our hard clay ground.

We solicit a call and an inspection for the above and think it will be to the interest of the farmers of these counties to purchase at home where repairs if required, can be quickly and easily procured. Fall in with the crowd and secure the best Spring Implements on the most favorable terms. Every endeavor will be made to serve our patrons so acceptably that they will find it to their best interests to continue dealing with us.

BAIRD VS. PARKS.

THE NORTH FREDERICKSBURGH PROTEST.

Judge Wilkison Hears Part of the Evidence.

Pursuant to an order made by R. G. Dalton, Master in Chambers at Toronto, evidence in the North Fredericksburgh protest is to be taken before Judge Wilkison and transmitted to the court at Toronto. On Tuesday last between thirty and forty witnesses appeared at the court house, brought thither by subpœnas served on them at the instance of Edward Baird, the petitioner.

Messrs. Preston & Ruttan appeared for their client, the redoubtable Edward, and H. M. Deroche looked after the interests of Mr. Parks.

The first witness called was P. R. McCabe, clerk of the township. He was called to produce the returns made by the deputy returning officers, the poll books and other papers in connection with the election. The chief point in his evidence was that he did not act as agent for Irvine Parks during the campaign, and that Mr. Parks did not have an agent at the No. 3 poll. The agents' authorities filed were produced.

Several other witnesses were called, including Mac Fralick, Azel Schryver, Geo. Smith, Thos. Smith, Daniel Lucas, Henry Hough, John G. Lucas, Robert Brown and James Parks.

Daniel Lucas swore that Irvine Parks had talked with him on the Saturday before the election, and had promised him pay for his day. Lucas swore that Henry Hough was present and was included in the offer.

Henry Hough was called but contradicted Lucas. He swore positively that no offer had been made.

Robert Brown and James Parks gave evidence as to an offer made by P. R. McCabe.

John G. Lucas testified that his son Daniel had told him that it was McCabe that had made the offer instead of Parks.

Evidence was given that owing to the new division of the township certain voters were disfranchised. By reference to the poll books it was found that all of the parties mentioned had voted.

The case about Mrs. Snider voting at number three poll was taken up with a view of making a point against the deputy-returning officer for allowing her to vote. The Judge said that the officer had done exactly right and that he could not refuse a ballot to any one taking the oath.

Taking of evidence was adjourned until this (Friday) morning at ten o'clock.

The following extracts from a report presented to the School Board at their last meeting, speak for themselves:

After a toilsome climb up a long hill, which few of the members of the board ever take on foot, we reached the High school. The average attendance is about one hundred and thirty, but a considerable number of students were absent and in fact irregularity of attendance is one of the difficulties which is inseparable from the location of the school, and the bad ventilation of crowded rooms. The accommodations are totally inadequate. We believe that in Mr. Reid's room in the West Ward school, there are more cubic feet of space than in the entire High school. At the time of its purchase this building may have been the best provision under the circumstances, but it was at the most a temporary makeshift, the wisdom of which was doubted then and subsequent events have changed doubts into certainties. The only good thing now remaining in keeping with the present conditions and proportions of the school is the site. We are not a little surprised that the Inspector's have even in their extreme leniency permitted the present state of affairs to exist so long.

In our opinion Mr. Fessenden and his assistants constitute an efficient staff, well qualified to do the work committed to them, but are crippled and hampered by their surroundings. If they were furnished with rooms of sufficient dimensions, well lighted and properly ventilated, we believe the results of their labors would not only be largely increased so far as the present attendance is concerned, but would draw largely from places not now tributary to the school. The grounds and closets are kept clean.

In conclusion we are not unmindful of the honor conferred upon us in this appointment, we having been the first visiting trustees at the schools for months past, and we take the liberty of recommending that, in order to increase the personal knowledge and efficiency of the Board, each member be selected in turn to visit the schools and report in writing the results of his inspection, both as to the character of the work done and the conditions of the rooms and buildings. All of which is respectfully submitted.

We understand that the Board have decided to ask the corporation to provide the necessary funds for the erection of a High school at once. The application will be made next Monday night. The Board have decided to erect a $12,000 building, and wish to have it ready for occupation by the first of January next. They have decided wisely and will doubtless be heartily supported by a large majority of the ratepayers.

OUR OTTAWA LETTER.

OTTAWA, April 9.—The House of Commons during the week has been unusually dull, the reaction from the excitement of the Jesuit debate. Monday evening the House did not sit owing to Mr. Pope's death, and on Wednesday the Premier eulogized his dead colleague, declaring in trembling tones, that he had lost the best friend he had in the world. The House then went on with its business, reminding one that,

> "The gay will laugh when thou art gone
> The solemn brood of care plod on,
> And each one as before will chase
> His favorite phantom.",

The late minister had a standing joke with news hunters. He would say he had a good item, get the reporter to take out his note book and then whisper "The devil's dead." This was the item. On one occasion he said. "I always tell you newspaper fellows to go to the devil."

The C. P. R. debt conversion bill has been delayed in passage, by the unexpected announcement by the Premier that the government had come to an agreement with the C. P. R. Co. so the 120 mile link from Harvey to Moncton N. B., would be built. The maritime members, irrespective of party, held out against the bill until something was done to compel the C. P. R. to build the link as Sir Chas. Tupper had promised. The Premier refused to say what the nature of the agreement was, as the time was inopportune, so the opposition obstructed the bill in default of the information.

The Irish Home Rule resolutions were reached yesterday but the rules of order threw them over till to-morrow or perhaps Monday. On Monday they would stand first on the paper.

The bill increasing the salaries of the judges, introduced by the government, will be dropped. Praiseworthy efforts have been made to get through by Easter, but all to no purpose as it is evident now that May will perhaps be here before prorogation.

Waterworks.

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.

Sir,—I have been very much interested in what you have been saying on the waterworks question, and heartily agree with you that the town ought to take hold of this matter. The town can borrow money much cheaper than can any private individual, and the saving on a loan of twenty or thirty thousand dollars would be quite an important item. My idea is, to buy out Mr. Northey's plant, borrow sufficient money to complete the works, and then let the town own and run them. Under the present contract, the town will have to expend over $1,500 a year for which they merely get fire protection. If the corporation owned the works, a snug revenue would be received from the Grand Trunk Railway and from private parties. I believe that enough would be received to pay running expenses and thus give the town its fire protection free. This would be a saving of fifteen hundred dollars a year to the town, which sum could go to form a sinking fund, which would very soon pay for the entire works. I believe that Mr. Northey ought to be seen at once, and his lowest price secured for the pipe already laid, etc.

Our town financers ought to give this matter their earnest attention, as it is of great importance. Thanking you for your space, I remain yours, etc.,

NAPANEE, April 9th, 1889.

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.

As you invite correspondence on the subject of waterworks, allow me to express the opinion, that it is one of the most important matters that the people of Napanee have to consider.

I have always opposed the Northey scheme, because I thought that the Electric Light Company were promoting it, more for the purpose of making money out of it than to benefit the people of the town, and because they did not propose to supply us with good drinking water, but I am strongly in favor of the corporation constructing waterworks, and I think the first step that should be taken, should be to employ some skilful and competent engineer, who has made a special study of the subject, and let him examine carefully the different sources from which a good supply of pure water could be obtained, and report which he considered the best and most reliable plan or system for us to adopt, and make an estimate of the cost of construction and maintenance, not for one year or ten years but for one hundred years, because the system that will last the longest, and cost the least for maintenance and repairs, would certainly be the cheapest in the long run, and is the one that we should certainly adopt. Yours very truly,

Obituary.

AMEY.

This week we have to chronicle the sudden death of Jane Maria, wife of Amerit Amey, of the township of Camden, which sad event took place on Sunday morning last. Deceased retired on Saturday night in apparently good health. About one o'clock she was seized with a violent fit of coughing and expired about two o'clock. It is supposed that she ruptured a blood vessel.

Mrs. Amey was the eldest daughter of the late Captain Joshua B. Lockwood, and was born in the township of Ernesttown nearly sixty-five years ago. Deceased was a sister of I. J. Lockwood of Napanee. About forty-six years ago, deceased was married to Amerit Amey and he and several children survive her.

PERSONAL.

Miss Victoria Burns left for New York on Wednesday.

—Mr. and Mrs. Archie Dingman returned to Toronto yesterday.

—John Dollar and family will remove to Rochester, N. Y., next week.

—Mr. R. L. Roe of the engineering staff of the Pennsylvania, R. R., is spending his holidays in town.

—Mrs. Wm. Embury and family have removed to their summer residence in North Fredericksburgh.

—Messrs. W. A. Rombough and W. R. Frens leave for Manitoba next Monday. Mr. Rombough has a farm at Deloraine.

—Mr. Ed. Curlette and wife are visiting in town. Ed. has secured a good situation in New York city and will remove there with his family.

—Mr. L. McGowan goes to Toronto on Monday and intends to remove there shortly. We are very sorry to lose him, as he is one of the leading lights of the new party.

—Mr. Will Robbie, of Bay City, Michigan, has been visiting with friends at Croydon and Tamworth. He has secured a situation as bookkeeper with a firm in Calgary, N. W. T. and will leave in a few days to enter upon his duties.

—Mrs. W. S. Williams and Miss Williams have been spending a few days in town prior to their departure for the far west. Mrs. Williams leaves to-morrow night for Los Angeles. Miss Williams only goes as far as St. Louis, at present, but will likely join the rest of the family in September. Mrs. Williams and her daughter have been very popular in Napanee, and will be greatly missed.

In the course of his speech in favor of Imperial Federation last session Mr. Dalton McCarthy contended that Canadian barley growers were not dependant upon the United States market, as they could export barley to England. At the instance of the Ontario Minister of Agriculture, some samples of Ontario barley were recently sent to England to be tested by the malsters and brewers of that country, and they have been pronounced unsuited for the purposes for which barley is required in England. Mr. McCarthy's theories are therefore exploded by practical experiment, and our farmers must continue to sell their barley to the Americans. When we get Unrestricted Reciprocity Canadian barley will be worth at least ten cents a bushel more than it is now.

OTTAWA, April 8.—A startling discovery has been made here that all the Scott Act repeal voting on Thursday was illegal and void. The proper lists to use are the Dominion voters' lists, but on Thursday the lists used were the new lists of names set up here at the Printing Bureau, which are not authorized by any law, are not revised, and are not voters' lists at all in a proper and legal sense. They are supposed to be a copy of the old voters' lists. But in any event they are at present mere proof sheets from a printing office, not authorized to be used. The proof-reader has usurped the functions of the revising barrister. The lists used on Thursday bear absolutely no imprint of authority, not even a statute authorizing their setting up, as admitted by the Minister of Justice in the House the other day in reply to Mr. Edgar. Mr. Chapleau one morning ordered the superintendent of the Printing Bureau to set up a million names. This was done and nobody knows what names are on or off these lists. Mr. E. H. Bronson, M. P. P. for Ottawa, has voted in Carleton County for thirty years, but when he went out on Thursday to vote against the repeal he found his name not on the list, and could not vote His name is on the list of 1885, the only authorized list in existence, yet his vote was refused. The type-setter or the proof-reader dropped his name off, and presto, he is disfranchised. The Hon. R. W. Scott, Q. C. senator and author of the Scott Act, give the opinion that every election where the new lists were used is void. The Clerk of the Crown-in-Chancery says the new lists were used in every contest of Thursday.

THE DESERTED FARM.

A TRAGIC STORY OF OLD CANADA.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTER.

[The story opens with a gentleman's account of a visit paid by him to the village of St. Claude in the Province of Quebec. In one of his walks he stumbled across what appeared to be a deserted farm-house and farm, and it was his enquiries as to the history of the neglected place, which elicited from the priest of the village the narrative contained herein.

A century ago Antoine Desjarniers and his wife had come to that place from France, and being of rather superior education to the ordinary run of immigrants, and withal industrious and benevolent, they soon attained considerable wealth and were reverenced and beloved by their poorer neighbors. They had one son, Felix, the pride of his parents' hearts, but Providence had denied them one of their dearest wishes in withholding from them a daughter. However, by the death of a neighbour, who left, without home or friends a sweet little daughter, they were enabled in a measure to fill this want by the adoption of the little Louise. When the children grew up they became engaged and about five months from the time fixed for the nuptials Felix, who was impatient for the happy event took a trip to Nova Scotia on business to be absent about four months. That would bring his wedding day close at hand on his return.]

CHAPTER II.—MONSIEUR LE CURE RESUMES HIS NARRATIVE.

"Years passed away. At St. Claude, matters progressed in the accustomed quiet way; but nothing had been heard of or from Felix Desjarniers. In France, however, there were already signs of the outbreak of the terrible revolution that was to revenge the wrongs of ages, and that was to strike down in its ruthless progress alike the innocent and the guilty.

"In the year 1796, Monsieur Ligny, the then cure of St. Claude, was compelled to visit Paris to receive a legacy bequeathed to him by some distant relative, whose name he had scarcely ever heard, for he was himself a native of Canada, and had never in his life been a hundred miles distant from his native village.

"When M. Ligny was about to embark for Quebec, there to take passage to France, poor M. Desjarniers, who still believed that his son would one day return, and who would not hearken to those who believed that the young man—so long unheard of—must be dead, besought the good cure to seek out Felix, if possible, and conjure him to return home to his loving father forthwith.

"Poor man! always, even in his youth, having lived in a remote province of France, and so many long years a resident of St. Claude, he fancied that it would be as easy a matter to seek out a person in Paris, or in France, as it was in the then thinly populated province of Lower Canada!

"M. Ligny had not the heart to undeceive the poor, lonely old man. He could not conscientiously bid him hope; but he promised to do his best to discover whether his son was still living, and, if he could find him, to try to persuade him to return to St. Claude.

"M. Ligny had been six weeks in Paris. His business was completed, and he had neither seen nor heard anything of Felix

"'The haughtiest aristocrat in Paris,' was the reply. 'But do not think that the people care to see him. No, no! It is Madame they wish to gaze upon,—Madame the Viscountess, the most beautiful woman in Paris; and she is as good and amiable as she is lovely. 'Tis a thousand pities she has not a husband more worthy of her."

"By this time, M. Ligny had recollected the name; but he had not time to ask further questions before the carriage was close to him, necessarily proceeding at a snail's pace; greatly, as it appeared, to the annoyance of one of its occupants—a gentleman attired in a gorgeous military uniform, who, at this moment, thrust his head out of the window, and cried, in a voice of thunder, to his coachman, "Why do you not drive faster? Drive over the wretches if they don't get out of the way!"

"A low growl from the crowd was the only response, and the driver still did his best to proceed at a more rapid pace. As the carriage passed onward, M. Ligny was enabled to perceive that the only other occupant of the vehicle was a lady magnificently attired, but he could not discern her features.

"The carriage was close to the gate, and about to enter the court-yard, when the young man already spoken of, whom M. Ligny believed to be Felix Desjarniers, suddenly sprang upon the door-steps, and gazed boldly into the open window.

"A tremendous blow, hit full in his face by the Viscount, immediately struck him down, senseless and bleeding among the crowd.

"'Drive on!' shouted the enraged nobleman to his coachmam. 'You are as great a bore as any among the rabble. One scoundrel has got his deserts. Pity that I cannot serve all the same way!'

"'Ah, Charles,' exclaimed the Viscountess, in a low voice, yet so sweet and clear that it was distinctly audible above the murmurs of the crowd. 'I fear me you have hurt that poor man. It was cruel to strike so hard a blow. Poor fellow! it was likely mere curiosity which induced him to look in at the window.'

"The Viscount's answer was inaudible, and presently the carriage entered the court yard, and the gates were closed behind it.

"M. Ligny now sought to approach the stricken man to render such service as he was capable of; but Felix—if, indeed it was he—had been borne away by some of the bystanders, and the crowd was too dense to allow the good father to follow them.

"M. Ligny extricated himself as soon as possible from the throng. The spectacle no longer afforded him any pleasure, and during the remainder of that day, and during several days afterwards—postponing his departure from Paris for an entire week—he sought—by making inquiries at the hospitals, and by every means that occurred to him—to discover the whereabouts of the poor injured man; but no one knew the name of Felix Desjarniers, and all his endeavours proved fruitless. At length he was obliged to take his departure from Paris without having succeeded in gaining the object which had caused his delay in the capital. He sailed from Havre, and in due time arrived in safety at his quiet peaceful home.

"He had not the heart to acquaint M. Desjarniers with the abject condition in which he believed he had met with M. Felix-ance, and I have waited patiently for it, that it might be all the sweeter when the hour arrived. It has come at last. You are my first victim. But if it will be any consolation to you, know that there are three others upon whom I intend to wreak my vengance. Madame Lavigny and her two children will soon follow you—dying the same swift death. Now I have done with you." And with these last words, he stood aside, the fatal knife fell, and, in view of the gaping crowd, who enjoyed the cruel spectacle, Colonel Viscount de Lavigny was launched into eternity.

"Within a few weeks of her unhappy husband's execution, Madame de Lavigny and her two children were arrested at the instigation of Francois Moulins, and confined in the Conciergerie, in different apartments; the unhappy mother having been forbidden to have any communication with her innocent offspring. Months elapsed, with purposed and cruel delay, ere the poor lady was brought to trial; and then the charges that were preferred against her sound like mockery to our ears at the present day.

"The Viscountess Lavigny was charged not only with having aided and abetted her husband in conspiring against the liberties of the new born republic, but also with training up her children to work future evil to the republic under the guise of childish innocence and ignorance.

"The unhappy lady, and her daughter Louise, were condemned to death; and though, on account of his extreme youth, the life of the little boy, named Felix—after his mother's never forgotten, although forsaken lover—was spared, it had, perhaps, been a greater mercy to the poor child had he perished on the scaffold with his parents and sister.

"Although condemned to die, the execution of the unfortunate Viscountess and her daughter was delayed for a few days, at the instigation of Francois Moulins, whose vengeance was not yet satiated. He wished to embitter the few remaining hours of his unhappy and helpless victims, and to render more terrible the pangs of death.

"The poor mother prayed and entreated that during the few days of life which yet remained to her, she might have the society of her innocent children. Her prayers and entreaties were not listened to. She was told that her children would accompany her to the scaffold—her daughter to suffer with her—her little son to witness the death; but, until the day appointed for her execution, she would not be permitted to see one or the other of her children.

"The Viscountess was confined in a cell in the Conciergerie, in the companionship of a young women of inferior rank, who had fallen under the suspicion of the republic but whose fate had not yet been decided. Francois Moulins had been appointed temporarily, and, as it is surmised, at his own request, one of the gaolers of the Conciergerie; and it was his greatest pleasure to listen at the door of his poor victim's cell, and hear her complaints and lamentations.

"One day—only the day previous to that appointed for her execution—Madame de Lavigny related the history of her early life to her unfortunate companion, and bitterly lamented her unfaithfulness to her betrothed husband, and her ingratitude to her foster-parents. To her unfaithfulness and ingratitude she attributed all the evils that had come upon her, and her husband and children.

"'Tis the judgment of heaven upon my sins,' she said; 'and may heaven grant that they may thus be expiated upon earth; and that I may find mercy and forgiveness in the world to come. Oh, that I could but ask the forgiveness of my dear foster parents, if his son was still living, and, if he could find him, to try to persuade him to return to St. Claude.

"M. Ligny had been six weeks in Paris. His business was completed, and he had neither seen nor heard anything of Felix Desjarniers. The good cure was anxious to return to his peaceful home; for, even in his inexperienced eyes, the signs of the approaching conflict between the aristocracy and the people were patent, although those who had the greatest cause for dread still remained apathetic. He was on his way to an office to secure his passage on board a vessel that was to sail in a few days from Havre-de-Grace for Quebec, when the unusual throng of people in the Boulevard Italiens attracted his attention; and upon making inquiry, he was informed that there was to be that day a grand levee at the Tuileries.

"The people of Paris, notwithstanding their antagonistic feelings towards the once idolized monarchy and revered aristocracy, were still attracted by anything that promised them a free spectacle. Alas! it was the only amusement that many of them could afford themselves: and M. Ligny himself, who had never seen anything of a Court in his life, thought that he, too, before he quitted Paris for ever, would like, for once, to see the gay equipages of the land, and perhaps even to get a glimpse at royalty itself. It would be something to amuse his friends with when he returned to his home, so he pushed forward with the crowd. "He had been for some half-hour standing near the gates of the Tuileries, watching the gorgeous equipages, as they rolled past into the enclosure, and marvelling at the still more gorgeous dresses of the occupants of the carriages, and listening, too, to the suppressed murmurs and threats of many of the more turbulent amongst the lookers-on, when a tall, raggedly-clothed man brushed rudely past him, and took his stand still nearer to the gates.

"He had caught a glimpse of the man's features as he pushed rudely by, and, amidst the forest of hair with which the face was covered, he was almost certain that he recognised the once handsome features of Felix Desjarniers. Yes; squalid as was his attire—once always so neat and trim—and sunken and dirt-begrimed as were the features, there was no mistaking the young man. Though some distance off, he stood in a position in which his profile was clearly visible; and marvelling to himself what could have brought Felix so low, when, with his education and natural abilties, he could not fail, if he tried, to earn at least a decent livelihood—or, if he did not chose to work, when a single line sent to his father would have been immediately responded to,—M. Ligny strove to push his way through the crowd, resolved, if he could but get near enough, to address the young man at all hazards, and redeem the promise he had made to the broken-hearted father. With all his exertions, however, the good priest could approach only within several feet of the spot on which Felix stood, and there he was content until, by some fortunate chance, he could draw near enough to speak without being overheard by others.

Suddenly there was a great commotion in the crowd; and an elegantly appointed equipage was seen approaching, the coachman with difficulty forcing his way through the dense throng.

"'Whose carriage is that?" inquired M. Ligny of a bystander.

"'You must be a stranger to Paris, good father, not to know the liveries of the Viscount de Lavigny?'

"'The Viscount de Lavigny!' muttered M. Ligny to himself, not immediately recognizing the name with the title prefixed. "Pray, my friend," he said aloud, "who is this gentleman?"

the capital. He sailed from Havre, and in due time arrived in safety at his quiet peaceful home.

"He had not the heart to acquaint M. Desjarniers with the abject condition in which he believed he had met with M. Felix; and the poor old man was at length almost induced to acquiesce in the opinions of his friends, ane to believe that his beloved son was indeed no more.

"Thus far," said the cure, "the story I have told you has been gleaned from the reports of M. Ligny and others, who knew the Desjarniers—these reports having been handed down from father to son among the inhabitants of St. Claude. That which I have yet to relate—by far the most terrible portion of my story—has been gathered from a diary found after the supposed decease of the unhappy Felix Desjarniers,

'Again two years passed away, and then in 1789 came the sacking and destruction of the Bastile, which event may be said to have inaugurated the Revolution, and the frightful events which followed in rapid succession. From the diary to which I have alluded, disjointed as it is, and evidently written by one whom misfortune, misery, and a savage desire for revenge had at least partially deprived of his senses, I gather that Felix Desjarniers had, during the greater portion of those two years, served in the French army, in the regiment commanded by Colonel Viscount de Lavigny, and had conducted himself so well that he had risen to the grade of sergeant, and had become the confidential servant of the colonel under the assumed name of Francois Moulins. After the sacking of the Bastile, when the army gradually became demoralized, he still remained in the service,—still seemingly attached to the Viscount, while, at the same time, he was secretly acting with, and was a trusted servant of, the chiefs of the malcontents.

"By these means he obtained a knowledge of all the Colonel's private and family affairs, and also carefully noted down every expression that was made use of to the disparagement of the populace, all of which were immediately reported to the revolutionary tribunals. At length, though I have been unable to discover the exact period, the time arrived, in the opinion of the so-called Francois Moulins, for action. He threw off his disguise, though still reserving, till a later period, the disclosure of his real name, and the Viscount was arrested in his bureau by a party of Republicans, headed by Francois Moulins himself, and charged with the heinous crime of conspiring against the liberties of the people. His own expressions, written down at the time at which they were uttered, and corroborated by witnesses whom Francois had taken the precaution to have always at hand, were triumphantly pointed out to him by his once trusted servant. He was hurried to prison, tried, condemned, and brought to the scaffold within a few days, having been sternly and savagely refused permission to see or even to communicate with, his wife and his children—a girl of eight, and a boy of four years of age. This was the awful moment chosen by Francois Moulins to disclose his real name to the Colonel. He obtained permission to stand on the scaffold, and to assist to bind the first victim of his fiendish desire for vengeance. Just at the last moment, when the condemned man was about to be placed on the plank, with his neck beneath the glittering knife, he whispered in his ear—

"'Citizen Lavigny' (the republic had abolished the noble prefix of De),—'know you who I am? You do not? You think my name is Francois Moulins? Know, then, miserable tyrant, about to meet thy just deserts, that I am Felix Desjarniers. I am he whom you so fearfully wronged at the village of St. Claude. I swore vengeance—'Tis the judgment of heaven upon my sins,' she said; 'and may heaven grant that they may thus be expiated upon earth; and that I may find mercy and forgiveness in the world to come. Oh, that I could but ask the forgiveness of my dear foster parents, if they be still living! Oh, that I could for one brief moment see the foster-brother—the betrothed husband whom I deceived and betrayed, yet whom I have never ceased to love! Oh, that I could hear him express his forgiveness of his once happy, but now wretched and forsaken, Louise! Oh, Felix, Felix! would that I could summon thee to my presence! and kneeling at thy feet could ask the pardon which at this awful moment, thou wouldst surely grant!"

"Francois Moulins had been listening outside, and had heard all that had passed between the unhappy women. He now suddenly threw open the door, and entered the cell.

"'Who calls upon Felix Desjarniers?' he cried in a voice of thunder. 'Behold him here! What wouldst thou have of him, base, deceitful woman? Thinkest thou that I credit thy false assertions? 'Tis but the fear of death that is fast approaching that haunts thy craven spirit, and causes thee to reflect upon the wrongs thou hast done to those whom thou wast in duty bound to love.'

"Terrified at the sudden appearance of a tall, rough-looking man, in the costume of a gaoler, and with his features almost wholly concealed beneath a forest of beard and whiskers, the two women had, with a loud shriek, retreated into a far corner of the cell. Madame de Lavigny had not at first recognized Felix Desjarniers in the rude, stern-looking man who had thus intruded upon her miserable privacy. She had never known that her foster-brother had quitted his home; and believing him but a few moments before, to be thousands of miles distant from her, there would have been little wonder had she failed immediately to recognize him after so many years' absence, even had he appeared in a less questionable garb.

"Notwithstanding, however, the great changes that years of misery, and long cherished ideas of vengeance, had wrought in the unhappy Felix, there was still something in the tone of his voice, and in his general aspect, which reminded her of her once handsome and happy lover. The thought that she might yet perhaps save her innocent daughter's life flashed upon her, and throwing herself upon her knees before the intruder, and clasping her hands, she said, 'Oh, if you be indeed Felix Desjarniers, though I have believed Felix to be far distant, say that you forgive your once beloved Louise, and I will die content!'

"A fresh thought suddenly entered her mind. As if by intuition, she seemed to feel that through the desire of vengeance, cherished by her once betrothed husband, all her sad troubles had been wrought upon her.

"'You wear the gaoler's garb,' she went on. 'Oh, if through your instigation this cruelty has been wrought upon me and mine, only now exert your influence and save the life of my poor innocent child, and I will bless you with my dying breath. I ask no mercy for myself; I have brought, by my own misdeeds, sorrow and misery upon the once happy home and the kind protectors whom I was in duty bound to revere and to love. My sin has found me out and I deserve to suffer; but oh, Felix, once loved and never forgotten, I conjure and beseech you, by the love you once bore your unhappy Louise, save my child and take a dying mother's blessing!'

"Felix was unmoved even by this earnest appeal.

"'Woman,' he cried, 'would you, even now, when death stares you in the face, use your artful wiles to induce me to believe that you, in your foully earned prosperity, ever gave a thought to the once happy home that you blighted, or to those whose fond affections you spurned, whose hearts you have broken? I would not believe you, though—Ha! What is this?'

"In her agony of feeling, Louise had leant forward to clasp the knees of the man to whom she so earnestly appealed, and who she appeared intuitively to believe had even yet the power or influence to save and protect her child. In this position, a miniature, painted upon ivory, had fallen from her bosom to the stone floor of the cell.

"The noise it made in falling attracted the attention of Felix, and caused the sudden exclamation which had checked his speech. He stooped and picked it up from the floor, and recognized a portrait of himself, as he had appeared in his days of youth and happiness, which he had given to Louise on her seventeenth birthday.

"For a few moments he seemed, as he gazed upon the miniature, to be slightly moved, and his features assumed a less stern expression, as he muttered to himself, 'So changed—so sadly, sadly changed!'

"Still bent only on her one earnest purpose, Louise sought to take advantage of this milder mood.

"'Heaven in its mercy has afforded proof of my assertion that you have never, never been forgotten,' she cried. 'Felix, still my betrothed husband in the sight of heaven—for my misdeeds could not sever the sacred bond which united us—I call my Creator to witness that never for an hour together, by night or day, has that cherished portrait quitted it resting place near my heart. Is not that proof that the sin committed in a moment of infatuation has been bitterly repented? Is not that proof sufficient that your memory was ever fondly cherished in my heart? He who has gone before me to his eternal rest—he who was ever a loving husband to me, and to whom I strove to do a loving wife's duty, though I never loved him, as I had loved you—knew that I wore your portrait in my bosom. Not even for him would I part with it.'

"It was ill done on the part of the unhappy Louise to call up these recollections of her late unfortunate husband, in the presence of him who had been the cause of the Viscount's arrest and cruel death. Felix had become in some degree softened. He might have listened to the unhappy mother's prayer; but no sooner did she speak of the man who had been the prime cause of all his misery, than the momentary softness passed away, and his heart became as hard as stone. The recollections of his wrongs, and his long years of misery—of his embittered life, flashed to his mind, and raising his hand, and dashing the miniature to the floor, where it lay broken to atoms, he cried, 'Traitress, do you think thus to play upon my feelings, and baulk me of my long-cherished and most righteous vengeance? Know that I can prove your falsity. Dost recollect some years since, when, in all the pride of your prosperity, you went, with other minions of the Court, to pay homage to our base rulers, that a young man, urged by the love for you that still lingered in his foolish heart, sprang upon the steps of your carriage, that he might once more gaze upon your features?

"'I was that young man. Worn by misery and poverty, you might not have recognized me; but had you but smiled at the innocent curiosity which led one of the despised populace to seek to gaze upon the grace and beauty for which you—the lovely Canadian—were famed, even amidst the proud dames of the aristocracy, my heart might have relented of its ferocity; and you, and possibly your husband, might have been spared. But no; your traitor husband struck me a blow, which felled me senseless to the ground; and you, doubtless, looked on my prostrate form with a smile of triumph. Years passed away, and I returned to my native land, to find my parents dead, and myself the sole heir to their property. Then I sought you out, and found you the wife of the Viscount de Lavigny. I watched you, and found you were the mother of a child. I learned that you were about to leave Paris for your country seat, and I resolved that you should not escape me. I followed you, and I have you in my power. Your husband is in my power, and your child is in my power. Ha! ha! ha! Louise de Lavigny, might have relented of its ferocity; and you, and possibly your husband, might have been spared. But no; your traitor husband struck me a blow, which felled me senseless to the ground; and you, doubtless, looked smilingly on, and thought that the wretched serf was rightly served. From that moment I vowed that I would have full and perfect vengeance for my wrongs. Then I entered the hated King's service, and became the confidential servant—as he, dolt that he was, believed—of your husband. That was the first act of the plot, which I have since perfectly matured. You and your child must perish; and he, your infant boy, shall be taught to hate and jeer at his parents' memory!'

"The unhappy Louise recalled to mind the circumstance to which Felix had alluded. She recollected that she had shuddered at the blow her husband struck the poor young man, and, at the risk of offending him, had expressed her pity for the injured one, and detestation of the Viscount's brutality. She sought to explain that such had been the case; but Felix had quitted the cell as he gave utterance to the last words, and she felt that now, indeed, all hope had fled.

"She rose from her suppliant posture. Her companion would have gathered up the fragments of the miniature; but she bade her let them remain.

"'It cannot be Felix whom I have seen and spoken with,' she said, calmly, 'but a fiend who has assumed his form. Henceforward, during the few hours that remain to me, I will strive to banish all worldly feelings from my heart, and to direct my thoughts and prayers to heaven.'

"At noon on the following day, Madame de Lavigny, the ill-fated Louise Legris, was removed from her wretched cell to the tumbril which bore her and some fifty other victims of the tyranny of the populace to the fatal Place de Greve. In the tumbril, Madame de Lavigny once more met with her innocent and youthful daughter, from whom she had been cruelly separated since the date of her arrest, several months before. The mother and daughter sat together, locked in a firm embrace, until they arrived at the spot on which stood the terrible guillotine, heedless of all that was passing around them—careless alike of the suppressed murmurs of pity, and the loud jeers and ribald epithets which saluted the ears of the unhappy victims of what has been truly termed the Reign of Terror. Their thoughts and aspirations seemed to be wholly directed to heaven. They were among the first that suffered on that day.

"'The child first—the child first!' shouted the circle of cruel women who were seated, busily occupied in knitting, in front of the instrument of death, when Madame de Lavigny and her little daughter were supported from the tumbril to the scaffold, and, willing to gratify their wishes, the executioner placed the bound child first beneath the fatal knife.

"'Be firm, my darling. In another minute thou and thy mother will meet thy father in heaven," whispered Madame de Lavigny in her little daughter's ear; and the pretty, fair-haired child gave her mother one last earthly embrace, and, without a murmur, submitted herself to the executioner. Thus perished the little Louise de Lavigny—one of the ill-fated band of innocent juveniles who, during that frightful epoch, fell victims to the cruel frenzy of a maddened and brutalized populace.

"A shudder and a murmur of pity passed through even the inhuman multitude, when the severed head of the innocent child fell into the basket beneath the scaffold; but this feeling lingered but for a moment, and then arose a clamour for fresh victims. Madame de Lavigny's turn came next.

"'One brief moment,' she said. 'If you will not permit me to embrace, at least—if "You have come, perhaps, to order some extra cop—"

"I have come, sir, for personal satisfaction. Your reporter asked for photographs of Mrs. Grumpy and myself to use in writing up the wedding, sir."

"Yes. Didn't he—"

"He said he would have engravings made from them and run them in with the article he wrote about the affair."

"Yes. Was there any—"

"And some lop-eared, wopper-jawed, bow-legged gourd-head of a printer in this office mixed up the portraits, sir. You published me this morning, sir, in your advertising columns as a Tennessee barber who had suffered for fifteen years with a lame back and a sore throat, and had been cured by twenty-seven bottles of Dr. Billjaw's Compound of Hankus Pankus; and you run the portrait of that infernal Tennessee barber in your account of my wedding, sir. You can stop my paper, sir. And now, will you show me the typesetting department of this office? I am on the warpath this morning, sir, bigger than a grizzly bear, and I am going to find the man that mixed those cuts and reorganize him from the ground up!'

In the excitement and confusion that followed some one hastily turned in a fire alarm, and it took the entire department and a squad of police to quench the fiery young man.

Battle With Knife and Razor.

A hand-to-hand fight took place the other day in Clarendon County, Columbia, S. C., between A. Freeman Jenkinson, a farmer, and a negro highwayman. The farmer was accosted by the negro, who knocked him down and then demanded his money and watch, threatening to kill him if they were not delivered, at the same time drawing a razor with his left hand. Jenkinson had a large knife in his pocket, which he drew and opened.

A desperate duel was fought and both men were gashed in several places. Finally the negro made a desperate lunge at the farmer and inflicted a terrible wound in his right breast. Jenkinson then rushed in on the highwayman, caught him by the top of the head with his left hand, and the next moment had cut his throat from ear to ear. The negro died in a few minutes. He has not been identified. It is not known how seriously the white man is injured.

Where Cow-Bells Are Made.

Collinsville, Ill., is a great place for cattle bells. That cow-bells are made and do not grow on trees or elsewhere seems to surprise some people, but there are four establishments in the United States which are exclusively devoted to manufacture of that resonant article, and two of these are in Collinsville. One hundred and fifty dozen are turned out daily and thousands of them dangle from the necks of unfortunate cows all over the prairies of North and South America. The manufacture of cow-bells is entirely distinct from that of other bells. Instead of being molded the metal is rolled into sheets, cut into symmetrical polygons, which, when folded, are pressed into their well-known form. Having been riveted they are next packed in clay and brought to a white heat. When suddenly cooled these steel bells are found to be not only tempered, but also beautifully brazed.

Mrs. Lightpurse: "Here is an article in this paper entitled 'The World's Debt to the Jews.' Shall I read it?" Mr. Lightpurse: "No; that's a chestnut, I guess. Nearly everybody is in debt to the Jews; we all know that. Here, put this last pawn ticket with the others."

enough to recognize that a Hungarian wife could not justly be treated exactly like a Turkish one; while Schnitzer, on his part, behaved with scrupulous loyalty to his patron, and was regarded with ever increasing affection and respect by the Vali. Schnitzer, in fact, made himself so necessary that Ismael openly alluded to him as his right hand, and the Albanians commonly spoke of the doctor as the Deputy-Vali. But Ismael, like many a Turkish governor, had numerous enemies, and these were powerful enough to procure his disgrace. One day a Turkish frigate anchored in the mouth of the Bojana, one of the Sultan's aides-de-camp rowed unexpectedly ashore, and, without any warning whatever, Ismael Pasha was taken on board and carried as a state prisoner to Constantinople. All his property was confiscated; and if his wife, Hanum, had not managed to conceal her jewels she would probably have starved. Under Dr. Schnitzer's escort she followed her unfortunate husband to Stamboul; but soon after her arrival there Ismael was sent in chains to Trebizond, where he was kept in a state of great misery for more than four years. During the whole of this period he was daily and almost hourly attended by Schnitzer; who not only endeavored to lighten his misfortunes, but acted as his secretary and drew up for him numerous appeals to the Sultan and to the representatives of the Great Powers at Para. Not, however, until 1873 did these appeals produce any apparent effect. Then, as suddenly as had come the order for the Pasha's arrest, came the order for his release and restoration to imperial favor. Ismael was loaded with honors; he was appointed Governor of Janina, in Lower Albania, and in due course, with his wife and with the ever faithful Schnitzer, he went to assume his position. A year later Ismael, whose health had suffered from his long imprisonment, died, and it became Schnitzer's duty first to bury his old friend and then to arrange affairs for his old friend's wife. The doctor had, it seems, already exchanged Judaism for Mohammedanism, and had assumed the name of Emin. He had, moreover, become greatly attached to Hanum. It is not surprising, therefore, that he considered that he should facilitate the carrying out of his various obligations by marrying his patron's widow. As soon as the needful formalities had been attended to and the period of mourning had elapsed, he put his project into practice: and the wedding was celebrated at Constantinople in, we believe, the summer of 1875. Such is the true story of Emin's marriage. It has been stated that his wife was "a relative of the celebrated Pasha of Janina"—a description which applies with more accuracy to a connection of the great Ali Pasha who was murdered in 1822 than to the widow of Ismael Pasha; but Ismael was one of the most celebrated soldiers of his day, and as he was also, for a short time, Pasha of Janina, the assertion, though misleading, is not altogether incorrect. Emin, we understand, has now been for some years a widower. He is still a Mohammedan, and, in spite of much that has been said to the contrary, he has never professed Christianity. He is, however, a man of the greatest tolerance and breadth of mind; he never obtrudes his religious belief; and many of those who have most closely associated with him have suspected his creed as little as his nationality. The linguistic studies which he began in 1865 he has continued ever since; and he is now credited with a thorough knowledge, not only of Hebrew, Arabic, Turkish, Persian, Albanian, Italian, English and French, but also of Koptic, Chaldee, Somali Suaheli, Berberi, Galla, and many African dialects which are scarcely known to the dictionary-maker or grammarian. In these studies, as in his marvellous work in the Equatorial Province, his indomitable energy has overcome all obstacles.

YOUNG FOLKS.

A Problem in Threes.

If three little houses stood in a row,
With never a fence to divide,
And if each little house had three little maids
At play in the garden wide,
And if each little maid had three little cats
(Three times three times three),
And if each little cat had three little kits,
How many kits would there be?

And if each little maid had three little friends
With whom she loved to play,
And if each little friend had three little dolls
In dresses and ribbons gay,
And if friends and dolls and cats and kits
Were all invited to tea,
And if none of them all should send regrets,
How many guests would there be?

JONAS POPKIN'S MODEL.

BY F. B STANFORD.

It was a great surprise to Chester Ludlow when he found out that Jonas Popkin had taken pattern after him. But the way he found out—that was the more surprising still! Jonas was a small colored boy, black as coal; and Chester was a white boy, the leader of all the other boys in the village. Jonas would have given all the world to be the sort of boy that no one dared to make sport of,—just such a boy, for instance, as Chester. He always watched Chester when he ordered the other boys around; and he was always very willing to be ordered around himself by Chester, for whose father he worked. But one day something happened that, taken altogether, astonished Jonas very much.

"Look here, Jonas, I'll tell you something if you will keep it to yourself," Chester said, taking him out behind the house.

"I'll neber say a word," Jonas answered. "Guess I knows how to keep mum as well as you do."

"All right. Follow me, and I'll show you something."

They went into the stable, and climbed up on the haymow. In a barrel under the hay Chester had hidden away an old suit of clothing, a mask, and a worn-out beaver hat. These possessions he drew out, article by article, and exhibited.

"I'm going to have a high time to-night," he explained.

"You're gwine to the marquerade up at the school-house," said Jonas. "I knew that was jes' what you was up to. I could tole you so."

"We're going to have a roaring lot of fun," Chester continued. "But I'm afraid mother won't let me out after dark."

That was the reason everything happened as it did. Chester's mother did not let him out that night until he had pleaded with her a long time, and it had grown late. In the meanwhile the idea had occurred to Jonas to put on the marquerade, and go to that party himself. If Chester could not go, he would not, of course, want all the fixings he had hidden; and Jonas believed he could borrow them an hour or two without anybody being the wiser.

"The fellows will think I'm Ches," he chuckled. "They'll neber know the difference if I jes' cover my head and hole my tongue. I'll hab some fun, sure!"

His teeth chattered and he shook in his boots,—he was so nervous,—while he stood on the hay-mow and changed his clothes for the disguise. If Chester caught him he knew it would go hard with him. But he

"Then we'll drag him outdoors," said Chester.

"And after that you can settle with him," added Dave.

While this arrangement was being made, Jonas happened to be standing in the rear of the school house eating an apple, and looking in at one of the windows. It had occurred to him that it would be best to wait a while and see what was going on before he ventured in among the white boys. They were having a good time; there could be no doubt about that. Shortly he discovered there was a colored boy among them,—a colored boy who was blacker than even he himself was; and—unless his eyes deceived him—that boy had on his clothes. Jonas dropped his apple half eaten, and moved nearer the window. He felt rather scared. How had that strange boy got those clothes? His hair almost uncurled and stood up straight the next instant, when he saw Farmer Cole rush in among the crowd, and seize that colored boy by the nape of the neck.

"Now, then, sonny," shouted Farmer Cole. "come along with me!"

"Let go of me. What are you doing?" Chester replied, resisting with all his strength.

"Come on, I say," and Farmer Cole dragged Chester outdoors before he could do anything to save himself.

In a few minutes everybody knew that he had been stealing apples. Chester was taken by surprise. He had helped himself to Farmer Cole's apples whenever he felt like it, but he had not been near the orchard for more than two weeks. He did not suppose that any one, not even Jonas Popkin, suspected him.

"If I'd got my hands on you half an hour ago, when I was chasing you around those stumps, boy, I would shook the wind out of you," said Farmer Cole.

"I guess you've made a mistake, Mr. Cole," Chester answered. "I haven't been near your stump-field to-night."

"Tut, tut, boy, don't you try that game. You had a mask on and an old beaver hat, but I saw your face. And I followed you all the way up here to the schoolhouse."

They were walking down the road, followed by several boys, and Farmer Cole kept his grip on Chester's collar. Chester guessed, as soon as he heard about the mask and beaver hat, that Jonas had gone to the orchard instead of the school-house. It was Jonas who should be punished.

"It was Jonas Popkin, our colored boy, you chased," Chester asserted stoutly, refusing to go any farther.

"So you're not that boy, but you are blacked up to look like him?" Farmer Cole asked with some surprise, halting a moment. "Well, you are the boy I want all the same, black or white. I saw you, and you can't get off that way."

Chester was marched home to his father and mother, in spite of everything he could say. Jonas was in bed up in the attic then, but he could hear Farmer Cole's voice downstairs, and he knew something awful was taking place. By and by somebody crept up the stairs, and Jonas sat up in bed nearly scared out of his wits.

"Oh! I'll fix you to-morrow, Jonas Popkin," Chester whispered at the door by way of comfort. "You won't steal any more apples in a hurry."

"I ain't agwine to steal nuffin agin, neber," Jonas answered. "I ain't agwine to be like you any more. You better neber steal apples any more yourself."

Chester shut the door. He did not want to say anything more. After he got into bed, he lay awake half the night thinking.

Any one may guess what he was thinking about. His thoughts did not make him feel very manly the next day.

LATE CABLE NEWS.

The Late English Commoner-Mail Steamer Sunk—General Notes.

At Mr. Bright's funeral crowds of people lined the route of the procession from One Ash, Mr. Bright's late residence, near Rochdale, to the cemetery. Among those present were the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Arnold Morely, Mr. William Rathbone and General H. Lynedoch Gardiner, C. B., Equerry in Ordinary to Queen Victoria, who represented Her Majesty. A number of deputations headed the procession. Fifteen carriages, containing mourners, followed the hearse. Eight of Mr. Bright's workmen carried the coffin to the hearse and from the hearse to the grave. When the coffin was deposited in the grave the mourners gathered around in silent meditation, according to the custom of the Quakers, to which sect Mr. Bright belonged.

HIS TALENTS A GIFT OF GOD.

The Dean of Founders College afterward delivered an oration. He spoke of Mr. Bright as a man of great simplicity, who did not attribute his talents to his own efforts, but considered them gifts from God. Four wreaths remained on the coffin when it was lowered into the grave. One was sent from Biarritz by Queen Victoria. Attached to it was Her Majesty's autograph. Another was from the Prince and Princess of Wales, with a cord bearing the words, "As a mark of respect." The third was from Mr. Bright's work people, and the fourth from Miss Cobden. Attached to Miss Cobden's wreath wos a card inscribed, "In loving memory of my father's best friend."

The mail steamer Comtesse de Flandre was run into off Dunkirk the other afternoon by the Belgian mail boat Princesse Henriette. The collision occurred during a dense fog. It was at first reported that the Comtesse de Flandre immediately sank, but advices received later state that the Comtesse de Flandre was cut in two and that only the fore part sank at once. The Princesse Henriette took the after part in tow and started for this port, but had proceeded only a short distance when the portion of the wreck which she had in tow capsized and went down. The Comtesse de Flandre's mails were lost. After the collision her boiler burst, blowing the centre of the ship to pieces and killing all the engineers, the captain and others who were with him on the bridge and the passengers in the vicinity. Prince Leopold of Belgium, who was one of the passengers, escaped injury. The passengers of both vessels were panic stricken. Three passengers, the captain, first officer and nine of the crew of the Comtesse de Flandre were lost.

The Egyptian government has transferred the payment of the Egyptian coupons from the Comptoir d'Escompte, of Paris, to the Bank of England.

St. Petersburg papers express much indignation at the proclamation of Prince Ferdinand, nephew of King Charles, as Crown Prince of Roumania. They refer to the expulsion of Russians from Roumania, and warn the Roumanians to be careful.

Captain Bowler, the unionist candidate, has been elected member of Parliament for the Enfield division of Middlesex in the place of Lord Folkestone, elevated to the peerage.

tongue. I'll have some fun, sure!

His teeth chattered and he shook in his boots,—he was so nervous,—while he stood on the hay-mow and changed his clothes for the disguise. If Chester caught him he knew it would go hard with him. But he did not intend to let any one find out what he was doing. Out in the road he stopped, and reflected in the moonlight. There was Farmer Cole's apple orchard, which he would have to pass on the way to the school-house. He would never have a better chance, as long as he lived, to help himself to some of those apples. Whenever he had been in the orchard before he was always afraid some one would spy him, and know that he was Ludlow's colored boy. Now no one could tell who he was.

It must have been about the time Jonas was climbing over Farmer Cole's fence that Chester gained permission from his motner to go out, and made tracks for the stable to array himself for the evening's frolic. He scrambled on the hay-mow and made haste to get to the barrel; but when he got to it, of course, he soon was not in the best of tempers:

"It's that little nigger," he said, standing petrified and looking ferociously at the moonbeams filtering through a cobwebbed window. "That's just who it is,—that little nigger Jonas. Not a soul except him knew where those duds were; and he has either hidden them somewhere else, or taken them and gone to the party himself."

Chester searched here and there desperately a few moments, upsetting all the hens that had gone to roost, and frightening the horse and cow. He found Jonas's clothes snuggled in the corn-crib. All was plain to him then.

"I'll fix him!" he growled savagely, bundling up the clothes, and returning to the house with them.

Ten or fifteen minutes later, any one on the watch might have seen a very black negro boy stealing out the back door of Mr. Ludlow's residence; but no one would have been likely to guess that the boy was Chester himself. He had blackened his face with the shoe-brush, and put on Jonas's clothes. His straight, brown hair was concealed by an old fur cap, which he pulled down over his ears. He meant to go to the party disguised one way or another, and he meant to catch Jonas if he had gone there.

By this time Jonas's indiscretion threatened to bring dire disaster to him in more ways than one. Farmer Cole was after him also, and he carried in hand an oxgoad that had a brad in it.

"I'll teach you, boy, not to steal apples," he cried, chasing Jonas round and round the orchard. "I'll teach you, you young darkey, to be up to better tricks than such dishonest ones."

The mask and beaver hat had fallen off but Jonas held them in his hand, and ran with all his might. Farmer Cole knew him, and now he was in a fix, sure. He did not stop to think much, however; he threw himself over the fence, and dodged among an acre of stumps, until he escaped the old man and his goad. After that he crawled away to some bushes, where he rested and recovered his breath.

Chester looked for him in vain among the thirty or forty boys gathered in the one room of the old-fashioned school house. They were all in masquerade of one sort or another, and he could not easily make out who any one was. Jonas was not there, though, in his disguise. He was certain of that; but he expected he would make his appearance any moment, and he kept watch of the door.

"You keep watch, too, Dave," he said to one of his friends who had been told the secret. "When he comes in, we'll nab him before he knows where he is."

"Hold him against the wall, and I'll tie his hands behind him," Dave suggested.

to say anything more. After he got into bed, he lay awake half the night thinking.

Any one may guess what he was thinking about. His thoughts did not make him feel very manly the next day.

Appalled at His Legs.

A person arrayed in full Highland costume caused terrible commotion in a railway carriage in the Perrache Station, near Lyons, France. Two ladies who were in the carriage shrieked as they saw the awful spectacle presented by the entry into their compartment of a man without pantaloons. The Highlander, who was on his way to Nice, nevertheless, took his seat with Caledonian coolness, whereupon the ladies screamed the louder.

It was in vain that the apparition in the garb of old Gall apologized and explained the situation in bad French, and equally futile were the efforts of the station master who assured the ladies that the gentleman in the dirk, the sporran and the tartan accessories of properties was perfectly harmless. "You don't run the shadow of risk, Mesdames," insisted the station master in his blandest tones. "The gentleman comes from a country where the men wear petticoats and do not wear trousers." Despite everything, however, which was said in order to claim their apprehensions, the overtimid lady travellers had to be placed in a carriage at a safe distance from that in which the Caledonian stern and wild had taken up his position.

A Too Clever Young Man.

One day Dr. McCosh, when president of Princeton College, came into the mental philosophy class and said; "Ah, young gentlemen, I have an impression! Now, young gentlemen," continued the Doctor, as he touched his head with his forefinger, "can't you tell me what an impression is?" No answer. "What! No one knows? No one can tell what an impression is?" exclaimed the Doctor, looking at the class. "I know," said young Alan Arthur. "An impression is a dent in a soft place. "Young gentleman," said the Doctor, removing his hand from his forehead and growing red in the face, "you are excused for the day."

"If she will, she will, you may depend on't
And if she won't, she won't, and there's an end on't

This may be said of a good many women but of none more appropriately than of Mrs. A. P. Sorenson, of Manistee, Mich. There was a new railroad to be built, and it was to run past Mrs. Sorenson's house. This did not suit the good lady's ideas at all, and she made up her mind that she wouldn't have a railroad track running past her domicile. She was evidently a female Ruskin with both will power and poetry in her composition. She went out to the trackla yers and ordered them to "clear out." Naturally they laughed at her and went on with their work. Her next move was to bring out her rocking chair and her work and plant herself across the right of way. The men picked her up and set her to one side out of the road. She would not stay out of the road, however, but persisted in constantly returning with her rocking chair to the work of obstructing the vandals. Her meals were brought out to her; she ate, drank and slept on the track in devotion to her idea. As the track moved on she moved back, but it was like a retreat of the Old Guard, step by step. She was finally arrested and sent to jail, She brought a verdict against the railroad company for false imprisonment, and got one for $200 and costs, but nevertheless, notwithstanding the road was built. But she evidently has the grit of which heroes and heroines are made.

Hindu Servants.

Indian servants are in many respects like children, in their helplessness, their naivete, their timidity, their readiness to be pleased, their foolishness, their proneness to falsehood, their strong personal attachment, says a writer in the "Cornhill Magazine." Even in their total lack of any sense of humour they resemble children. No Englishman could hear English spoken in the comically barbarous way in which the Hindustani is commonly spoken by the British soldiers without betraying amusement. But the Indian face remains darkly impassive. Not the faintest twitch betokens any lurking laughter. Their love, too, of giving high-sounding titles is childish in its prodigality. Humble-minded as they are, and with deep-rooted respect for all difference of rank, it arises from no vulgar wish to appear other than what they are, and in its exaggerated indulgence savours even of sarcasm, A tailor and a cook both enjoy the privilege of being addressed by the exalted title of "kalipha," or emperor. The water-carrier is always "jemadar," or captain, and the bearer is "sirdar," signifying chief among men, while, as a crowning irony, the sweeper, who ranks but little higher than the dogs he looks after, is invariably called "mehter," or prince. The necessity of keeping a great number of servants, often wondered at by dwellers at home, is caused chiefly by the waste of time involved by caste prejudice. Instead of having one dinner hour for all, and one man to cook for all, there are few who are not obliged to cook for themselves. The table servants cannot eat with the grooms, nor they with the coachman, nor he with sweeper. So each man has twice a day to light his own little fire, draw water from the well, and cook his own bowl of rice—a proceeding which wastes no small amount of time. One servant we had was of the caste of oil sellers, and he told us there was not one of our twenty-four other servants with whom he could eat bread, i.e., if the other cooked the food, and only one who could eat with him if he cooked. We asked him if this distinction had not its drawbacks. He merely replied that it was the custom—what could he do? He himself was the humble recipient of four thin rupees a month, shared doubtless by a wife and many dusky youngsters, and yet he would have cheerfully submitted to be whipped to death rather than eat anything that had been placed on our table. It is strange how uncomplainingly men wear the iron fetters forged by the great goddess custom. They may ridicule her with their lips, but they obey her in their lives, in curious contrast to the many zealots who worship with their lips a god whose precepts they persistently ignore. The table servants are men of infinite resources. Nothing daunts them. If you do not like the way a vegetable marrow is cooked your man will say, "Your majesty has but to give the order and to-morrow it shall be made into French beans!" If they tell you there is beefsteak for dinner, you will ask, quite as a matter of course, "What is it made of?" when the answer will frequently be, "Of mutton, as no beef could be procured." The want of beef was a misfortune, but it could not be allowed to affect the menu.—[Miss H. M. Williams, New Jersey.

Tenderfoot (in new Kansas town)—"Where is the post-office?" Resident—"Over there." "Where?" "D'ye see that man sawing wood? He's the postmaster." "Yes, but I don't see the post-office." "Of course you don't. It's in his hat."

A Snowy Morning.

Cold through the snowy clouds appeared the day,
Morn's red effulgence swept the gloom away!
The broken canopy both gray and blue,
Gleamed where the sunshine found a passage through,
Washing the ragged edges of each cloud
In liquid silver, and each seemed a shroud
Out shaken by the winds o'er Heaven's blue sea
As if to shew the bright embroidery.
All things seemed lovely for the mystic night
Had decked each tree in tinsel, and the light
Shone in the snowy branches, and they lay
Rocked on the breezes and tossing like spray.
A drenching sleet came in an interval
But Winter froze the wet drops as they fell,
And so it was each tree was clothed entire
In silvery ice that shone like rippling fire.
Often by chance within the tangled maze
The shining Morning lost her yellow rays,
While the clustering sunbeams from the bright arch cast
Fell through the tingling boughs and were held fast.
I heard the waters ripple, saw the glow,
And lovely efflorescence of the snow;
Yet ere the noon the feathery plumes were tossed
Dripping from their fair eminence and lost,
As all else that is beautiful, the flowers
That wither and those sweet memorial hours
That die——last night I saw a lover rave,
And fall down mad upon a maiden's grave.

Memories.

In the silent midnight watches when the world is hushed in sleep,
And the noisy busy city rests in silence calm and deep,—
There come back to me blest memories of the friends I used to know,
And again in dreams I visit many a scene of long ago.

Happy as in days of childhood, in the dear old village home,
Once again o'er hill and valley do my careless footsteps roam.
And I hear again, in fancy, shouts of merriment and glee,
As my memory, in the stillness, brings the old days back to me.

Once again I feel the pressure of dear hands clasped close in mine
And the arms that clung so fondly, round me once more seem to twine,
Once again like sweetest music, sound the voices loved so well,
These come back to me at midnight brought by memory's fairy spell.

Hark! I hear it now, the music of the songs we used to sing,
Clear and sweet, the youthful voices with a happy, joyous ring.
'Rock of Ages!" do the angels hush their harpings as they bend,
Breathing out an evening blessing as the words of praise ascend?

Blessed, saintly, hallowed memories of the sweet days long ago,
Time is bearing farther from me, on its never-ceasing flow—
Yet I know as days and hours on its stream pass quickly by,
A glad meeting with my loved ones "in the kingdom" draweth nigh!

BANK ROBBERY IN DENVER.

The Most Daring Exploit on Record.

DENVER, Col., April 10.—The boldest and most successful bank robbery ever reported in the West was perpetrated upon the First National Bank the other afternoon. The morning previous a well-dressed man with light moustache and complexion and of medium height walked into the bank and asked where he could see Moffatt, president of the bank. He was told that he could see Mr. Moffatt, president of the Denver and Rio Grande railway, at the president's office in the Cheeseman block. Next morning the stranger entered the railway office and asked to see Mr. Moffatt on important business. He was admitted to his private room and stated that he had discovered a conspiracy whereby the bank was to be robbed of a large sum. Mr. Moffatt being very busy asked the man to meet him at his private office in the bank at one o'clock. A few minutes after the hour appointed he called at the bank and was shown into the president's office. Remaining standing, he enquired if Cashier S. M. Wood was in and was told that he was at lunch. He then asked for a blank cheque for the purpose of showing how the robbery was to be perpetrated. He laid the cheque upon the desk in front of Mr. Moffatt and said, "I will have to do this myself," and placed it at Mr. Moffatt's head, and in an earnest but unexcited manner said: "I want $21,000, and am going to have it. I have considered this mater and the chances I am running and the consequences if I fail and am arrested. I am a penniless and a desperate man, and have been driven during the past week to that point where I have considered suicide as the only means of escape from the poverty and misery in which I exist. You have millions; I am determined to have what I have asked for. If you make a noise, or call a man, or ring a bell, I will blow your brains out and then blow up the building and myself with this bottle of glycerine (which he at that moment pulled out of another pocket). Now, take your choice."

Mr. Moffatt started to argue with the man, but he was stopped, with the information that it was useless, and that he had but two minutes in which to fill out the check before him for $21,000 if he desired to live. Mr. Moffatt, seeing no other alternative, filled out the check, and was ordered to take it to the paying teller and get it cashed. Mr. Moffatt left his office and with the man behind him with the revolver partially concealed under his overcoat, and with the muzzle almost against Mr. Moffatt's back marched behind the counter up to Paying Teller Keeley with the request that the cheque

BE IMMEDIATELY CASHED.

They then remarched into Moffatt's office, without attracting the attention of the fifteen or twenty clerks who were at work within two feet of where they passed. After they had remained in the private office three or four minutes the robber informed Mr. Moffatt that they were wasting time, and that he had better step to the door and motion his teller to come to him, which he did. Mr. Moffatt instructed the teller to bring the money into his office, and as the teller turned to go away the robber told him he wanted twenty $1 000 bills and a thousand dollars in gold. The money was brought in and handed to the robber, who waiting until the teller had reached his desk, backed out to the front door, making Mr. Moffatt remain standing in his door until he had reached the curb stone. He then raised his hand, walked around the corner and has not yet been heard of. Mr. Moffatt is complete-

Fashion Notes.

It is said that during the last few months two hundred and thirteen clubs of women have been organised in the United States for the purpose of studying political economy.

The girl who possesses an heirloom in the shape of an old buckle which has done duty on the costume of some venerable ancestor is indeed lucky. The fashion for wearing these is now at its height.

Careless Choice of Words.

"Did you; how is he getting along?"

"I have countermanded the order."

"What did you do that for?"

"My reasons were of the very best, I assure you. I asked him whether he had started to work on the picture or not, and what do you think his reply was?"

"Can't guess."

"He replied in the coolest way imaginable, with his imitating French accent: "I have not commenced on the portrait yet. I have on hand a commission which I took to oblige a friend. sand dollars in gold. The money was brought in and handed to the robber, who waiting until the teller had reached his desk, backed out to the front door, making Mr. Moffatt remain standing in his door until he had reached the curb stone. He then raised his hand, walked around the corner and has not yet been heard of. Mr. Moffatt is completely prostrated with the shock. Detectives are out after the man, but no trace of him has been found.

Multiplication vs. Addition.

I picked up one of the daily papers the other day, and read this item: "The Arounder dropped into the post-office yesterday to post a little billet to a maiden, and while buying his stamp saw a boy slowly counting a sheet of two cent stamps. Any ordinary person, to be sure they were the right number, would have counted how many there were in the top row, counted the number of rows, multiplied, and got the result. Not so the boy. Patiently he told over every stamp on the sheet until he had ascertained there was just a hundred, when he sighed for relief and trotted away."

Now, a boy who would waste time like that can never make his mark in this busy world. In doing any work we all want to do it the best way, but we must learn next how to do it the best way in the least time. We must learn to use the multiplication table in everything we do.

One afternoon this week I got into a car on the elevated road going up-town. As I stepped into the car I saw the top of a small felt hat between two of the cross seats; I took one of the seats across the isle. On his knees was a bright-eyed newsboy about eleven or twelve years old. He was busily folding papers. Every paper was folded perfectly even, and carefully creased in the middle; after folding about two-thirds of what he had, he wrapped them in a piece of black oilcloth, but wrapped in such a way that he could easily get at them. The remainder were as carefully creased and folded and laid in a pile outside of the others.

"Why do you not put them inside with others?" I asked.

"'Cause then I could not reach them so fast. I don't want 'em all to get wet. I'll keep the rest dry till these are gone," and he left the car whistling, going out into the fog and rain.

Another thing I noticed; before our train went out of the station, the down train came in with the front platform crowded with newsboys who were pushing and elbowing each other, and left the train yelling like young Comanches. The newsboy in our train looked up with a smile, and said, "Some of them fellows will get lefts."

"Why?" I asked.

"I'll sell most of my papers before them fellers gets theirn. I always get down early. Ye catch the fellers then that leaves their up-town offices early."

I feel pretty sure that boy will be more than a newsboy before he is much older. He was careful, prompt and alert. He would use the multiplication table in business instead of addition.—[Christian Union.

Spoke From Experience.

"Look at that poor little creature," said a traveling man who was looking at a mouse recently caught in a big wire trap "It must be agony to any living creature to walk unsuspectingly nto captivity in that way."

"It is, I assure you," said a friend who was standing by.

"You talk like one who spoke from experience."

"I do; just come around to the store and take a turn with our new storm door, and you'll see how it is yourself."

James Crumb, of Lyons, Kan., dreamed that his brother, who lived in western Kansas, was in some terrible danger. He hastened to his brother's home, and not finding him began a search. He soon found him in a well nearly dead from exhaustion. He had been there three days, and must soon have perished.

Frederick M. Perry and Kate Burroughs of Bridgeport, Conn., were recently married after a courtship of twenty five years. The bride's father died twenty years ago, leaving a will with a proviso that his daughter should forfeit her share of the estate if she married Perry. A year ago the mother died, and Miss Burroughs received her third, and now they are married.

The Railroad Commissitoners of Massachusetts have made a report to the Legislature, in which they strongly recommend the heating of cars with steam from the engine. They were inclined to think that the danger of the pipes bursting, by reason of inability to control the pressure from the engine, was very remote indeed. They believed that the advantages of the system were so obvious that the companies would in time adopt it without compulsory legislation. Some companies, however, are opposing the reform strenuously.

Chicago has recently given another illustration of the ease with which glib tongued villains who promise great things, can make a way in the world, where many honest men fall by the roadside and perish miserably. A "young financier," duped some of the leading merchants of that city of shrewd men, to the extent of several hundred thousand dollars by giving out, and getting them to believe that he had special advantage for making money. His net was carefully spread, and not in vain, in the sight of birds whose greed for money made them blind to the trap. They entrusted their dollars to the plausible adventurer, and in a short time were enquiring of one another, of the wind and stars and the detectives, whither their walking E dorado had fled, the glory and the dreams of sudden wealth, which he had conjured up before them. It seems to be in vain that men are warned against the adventurer who comes with golden promises of gold, and women against the tempter. Again and again the same old bait is displayed, and again and again it is gobbled down in the same reckless fashion by victim who are not long in discovering that its tempting lustre conceals a deadly hook.

THE DUNKIN ACT IN RICHMOND.

For many years prior to the passing of the Scott Act in this county, the Dunkin Act was in force in Richmond. Now that the Scott Act has been repealed, some of the good people of the great temperance township contend that the Dunken Act is still in force and that no licenses can be issued in their district. We are inclined to believe that they are wrong; that when the Scott Act passed it swallowed up the Dunkin Act. It must be remembered that the Dunkin Act was a local option measure, and that the Scott Act was of a similar nature though of a broader scope. Being on the same line, the greater includes the less and therefore swallows it up. No doubt the point will be carefully looked into, but we think that our contention will prove to be the right one.

URIAH'S IDEAS OF ECONOMY.

When the Hon. Alex. McKenzie was in power the highest salary paid to any postmaster was $2,400 a year. Shortly after Sir John secured the reins, he put the postmaster of Toronto on the retired list on an allowance of his full salary per year, and then appointed a political crony to the position at a salary of $3,000. During the present session of parliament a bill was introduced to raise the salary to $4,000 per annum. It will be remembered that the duties of a postmaster are merely routine, his hours regular and easy, his office comfortable and his work pleasant. No special qualification is required beyond political influence with the powers that be. We know of no good reason why these already large salaries should be thus largely increased, especially in the face of the present hard times, and in view of the fact that the Postmaster General recently threatened to raise the postage on drop letters from one to two cents in order to increase the revenue of his department. In view of these facts it is indeed strange that Sir Richard Cartwright's proposed amendment to the bill, seeking to limit the salaries to a sum of $800 less than that proposed by the Postmaster General, was voted down. Knowing that the people of Lennox would be anxious to know how their representative voted on this question, we procured a copy of the votes and proceedings of the House of Commons and find that Uriah Wilson voted against Sir Richard Cartwright's amendment to limit the salaries, and voted for the bill to put another thousand a year on the burdens of the already overtaxed people. The electors of Lennox who have been struggling with hard times, will doubtless appreciate Mr. Wilson's efforts to make

NO CURE NO PAY!

A Fair and Square Offer to Invalids to try The New Method Treatment

By which our success in curing chronic diseases and deformities has been so uniform, that we will now guarantee to treat bad or reputed another thousand a year on the burdens of the already overtaxed people. The electors of Lennox who have been struggling with hard times, will doubtless appreciate Mr. Wilson's efforts to make their burdens light.

When a postoffice was proposed for Napanee it was supposed that the laboring men and artizans of this town would at least have a first claim on the work. Time proved the fallacy of any such supposition, for not only were outsiders brought in to do the stone work but now the plasterers of the town are made to feel that they have no right to expect a share of the Dominion dollars. Some of the local plasterers (and we may say just here that their work cannot be beaten in Ontario) were engaged on the work. The first coat was nearly on, when two plasterers were brought up from Kingston to do the finer work, the rough work or drudgery being considered quite a sufficient sop to throw to the Napanee men. They very properly resented any such treatment and have quit work. Uriah Wilson often boasts that he is the friend of the workingman, but the masons, plasterers and laborers will not soon forget the part he has played in this postoffice job. It is all right for Mr. James Herring to get a position as overseer at $3a day (Uriah was financially interested you know) but the laboring man, who really earns his money, must not expect any favors, no, not even fair treatment.

The member for Lennox has not seen fit to avail himself of our offer to allow him the free use of our columns to give an explanation of his vote on the Jesuit question, so he must stand convicted of having no reason for so voting, other than that he felt it his duty to blindly follow the government. Uriah Wilson was not sent to parliament to blindly follow any government; he was sent there to represent the people of Lennox. If he thinks that he was representing their views in supporting the Jesuit Bill, we ask him to call a public meeting of the electors, regardless of party, and see if his course has found favor with the people. As it is well known that we do not agree with Mr. Wilson politically, we prefer not to condemn him in this matter. Our position is well known, and we can afford to let Mr. Wilson's political friends deal with him this time. They are after him with a sharp stick and if Uriah succeeds in again whipping the Orangemen into line he will have accomplished a marvellous feat. And it is not the Orangemen alone who are condemning his course; prominent Conservatives throughout the riding have withdrawn their support from him, and are ready to support any candidate who will oppose Jesuit aggression. Uriah has made his bed, and he must lie on it. If it does not prove to be a bed of roses he has only himself to blame.

Consumption Cured

An old physician retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East Indian missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering follows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with name, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes 149 Powers' Block Rochester N Y.

Kathbun Company. His position on the Quinte will be filled by F. Hambly, jr., of Belleville.

It is asserted that the Duchess of of Cambridge, aunt of Queen Victoria, has bequeathed to the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge, commander-in-chief of the forces, enormous sums of ready money and considerable land.

Belleville, April 5. A number of farmers have been handed their notes from the bailiffless of its agent. Mrs. Way has laid information before W. Anderson, J. P., Ameliasburg, charging Mrs. Robertson, agent for the speculative cuts, with having obtained her note with intent to defraud. The charge will be heard to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. Foster is great on figures. In his budget speech he announced that at the end of the fiscal year he hoped for a surplus of dominion funds to the amount of $1,000,000. But now he has brought down supplementary estimates which call for $2[illegible],357, with $1,678,127 chargeable to income. Thus the expenditure of the year will total $37,000,557, which is $729,176 in excess of the revenue. The conundrum of the hour is, where is the surplus to come from?

It is announced that the University Federation Act will be proclaimed in the next issue of the Ontario Gazette. Sir Daniel Wilson, the present President of University College, will be selected as head of the new body—a position which he is pre-eminently qualified to hold. Though Victoria College has not given the statutory notice of her intention to federate, there appeares to be an impression that the scheme will be completed by May 1st. The Methodist friends of Federation assert that $100,000 cash will be forthcoming at date, and that $250.000 has been subscribed.

Robert A. Gunn, M. D., Dean and Professor of Surgery of the United States Medical College, Editor of "Medical Tribune," Author of "Gunn's New Improved Hand-book of Hygiene and Domestic Medicine," says over his own signature in addressing the proprietors of Warner's Safe Cure: I cannot be true to my convictions unless I extend a [illegible] and endorse all I know to be good and trustworthy. Your graphic descriptions of diseases of the kidneys and liver have awakened the medical profession to the fact of their great increase. Physicians have been experimentally treating [illegible], and while casting about for an [illegible]ized remedy, their patients have died on their hands."

It is hinted that [illegible] next shuffle of Dominion cabinet [illegible] takes place Mr. Foster will receive "[illegible] promotion." Sir John Macdonald is said to feel so disgusted with his Finance Minister's inability to reply to Sir Richard Cartwright's charges in connection with the lately negotiated loan, that he will send Mr. Foster to the rear and [illegible] for a new financer. Possibly the Finance Minister may endeavor to [illegible] blame and responsibility upon [illegible]es Tupper, and point out that soon after the loan was floated the high commissioner found himself rich enough to accept a baronetcy.

Kingston, April 7—The large tannery of Joseph Carrington was destroyed by fire last night. The [illegible] began in the engine room and [illegible] until the whole building, 1[illegible]eet, was in flames. The contents [illegible] machinery were destroyed, and the oils and other articles used in the tanning of leather caused a blaze which [illegible]ed the whole north end of the [illegible] tannery and stock were valued at $35,000. The insurance is $10,000 in [illegible]ers' & Manufacturers' Association. Mr. Carrington may rebuild if the city give him exemption from taxation.

NO CURE NO PAY!

A Fair and Square Offer to Invalids to try The New Method Treatment

By which our success in curing chronic diseases and deformities has been so uniform, that we will now guarantee to treat bad or reputed incurable cases, for a stipulated price until cured, and in case of failure to refund all the money paid us under such written guarantee. It will cost you nothing to investigate this offer, as consultation at the offices or by letter free. Take no chance—pay no money to a doctor, unless he has confidence enough in his skill to guarantee a cure. No matter what the name or nature of your disease may be, call or write to us, giving age, sex, complexion and symptoms. Send stamps to prepay postage on the NEW METHOD CURE books.

Part I, contains 228 pages, over 200 illustrations, symptoms of diseases and reports of over 10,000 cures; Prescriptions for the cure of acute diseases by Allopathic, Homœopathic and Eclectic remedies; Hygienic instructions for every lady, gentlemen and family. HAVE THIS WEEK COMMENCED A Great Cheap Sale of Carpets, Curtains & Curtain Materials.

1,000 yards of good Tapestry Carpet, nice pattern and colors at 29 cents a yard.

Yard wide Union Carpets, choice patterns, at 40c., 5Cc. and 6Cc.

Our fine Brussels and Velvet Carpets are pronounced by every one to be the nicest Carpets ever shown in Napanee.

We purchased last week at clearing price over 200 pairs of White, Cream and Coffee colored Lace Curtains that are opened to day and are offering them retail at wholesale prices.

Also 175 samples of Lace, Swiss and Madras Muslin Curtains, selling at about one-fourth their value.

Cherry and Ebony Curtain Poles trimmed complete at 40c each.

We fear now that we will not be able to fulfiil the promise we made last week to have another opening as Miss Shannon is selling Hats and Bonnets faster than she can get them trimmed. We want two more trimmers and two apprentices right away and will give them steady employment.

We give below the latest fashion news in Millinery from Paris :

Ostrich Plumes and Millinery Flats.

Milliners are using a quantity of these goods, especially Plumes of the medium size ; also Flats and Plumes attached.

Flowers are in great demand, not a single milliner, either in Paris or London but add Flowers to their Hats and Bonnets. The following are the favorites :—Roses, Primroses, Cowslip, Lilac, Mimosa, Violets, Picotees and Marguerites, mounted in wreaths to go under as well as over the brims ; nothing more than the old styles revived.

Shades for Plumes when Ombre-tinted, or two shades, as follows :—

Cream tinted with a new Nut-Brown.
Ebineer " " Dead-Leaf Shade.
Minuta " " Shrimp Pink.

Also in several shades of the new Greens. These colourings are for tips and mounts only.

The shades for Ostrich Plumes and Flats, plain colours, most in request are Ble, Etna, Colombo, Autumne, Perce, Trefle, Prairie, Tonkin, Minuta, Heron, Sauterelle, Saule, Rose, Euphrate, Oural, Cigale and Camelia.

Shades For Flowers,

Brise, Lezare, Serpent, Crevette, Venui, Nil, Perce, Trefle, Cigale, Oural, Monoreau, and a beautiful shade which should be called Dead Rose Leaf.

Ribbons.

Fancy patterns, also several checks much used on all styles of Hats, mixed with Flowers and Lece, and often with choice little tips dyed to match the Ribbons.

Laces.

These goods will see a big record ere September is with us. Many of the most becoming Bonnets were trimmed with Flowers and Lace and small Egptian tips to match the Lace. We also noticed a quantity of Lace used for Bonnet strings in place of Ribbons, but the latter is largely worn.

Gold Braids and materials of all classes of goods of bullion styles will be largely used.

Jets and Beads.

Bands, Flys, Birds' Wings and Leaves, also several styles in Gold and Jet Grasses.

Beads of all descriptions, with the exception of Jet, quite discarded.

Bonnet Ornaments.

Very few Bonnets or Hats with ornaments, but a quantity of pins, in three different sizes, in gold, steel and jet.

Ladies wanting a new Hat or Bonnet for Easter Sunday are requested to leave their order now as we are sure to have a great rush next week.

Wilton.

Dr. Vrooman, of Yarker, passed through Wilton last week to visit some of his patients.

Rev. W. J. Young, of Odessa, rendered a very interesting discourse in the Methodist church of this place last Sunday morning.

While Mr. James Davy was tearing down a building, lately purchased by him from Mr. Levi Gallagher, part of the building fell knocking him senseless Dr. Meacham was sent for and succeeded in stitching together an ugly gash on his chin. His head was badly bruised.

Odessa.

Chas. Jones, Kingston, spent Sunday at home.

Mrs. Jane Buck has removed here from Almonte.

Nathan F. Snider's store was burglarized on the 3rd.

The election was quiet and orderly. No demonstration.

Farmers report some kind of a distemper among the sheep.

In 1885 the Scott Act majority here was 84; this time reduced to 16.

McIntyre's Corners.

On Monday night one of those quiet little gatherings took place in the empty house of Azel Buck, and I thought it best to let the readers of THE EXPRESS know about it. It was convened for the purpose of getting things in shape with a view to loading up the voters list in true Tory style. But little progress was made, as none of the party seemed to be posted. Doubtless when Henry Davy calls around, certain suggestions will be made to him as the result of the meeting, but Henry is too old a bird to be caught with chaff.

Stella.

A few farmers will begin seeding this week.

There was quite a large crowd at the lecture, given by the Rev. G. S. White in the Methodist church on Sunday evening. The subject was "Canada and the Jesuits."

Quite a lively time in the council chamber on Saturday. Filson was at it again.

The farmers are preparing in good earnest for the spring work, and intend sowing a greater breadth of wheat and less barley than for many years past.

It is reported from Kingston that the Hero will commence her regular trips on Saturday next if the ice is clear on the bay, but at present the ice is holding pretty firm, and has not begun to break up.

Mr. Samuel Hawley, an old resident on the Hay Bay, died on Sabbath morning in the 85 year of his age. Mr. Hawley moved from the States upwards of sixty years ago, and has ever since been a resident of this township. His persevering industry and great rectitude of character secured for him and family a competency of this worlds goods, and the good will and esteem of those who knew him. His funeral to-day (9th) was very largely attended by his neighbors and friends, who thus paid their last tribute of respect to his memory. The Rev. W. R. Young, of Wellington, was requested by the family to preach the funeral sermon, but being unable to attend the Rev. Mr. Forneri conducted the funeral service. Messrs. Wilson and Smith, of Northport, and Mr. Cronk, of Picton, crossed the bay in an open boat, at Thompson's point, to attend the funeral.

Mrs. Daniel Loucks is quite ill.

We are pleased to see Mr. Armstrong able to be out again.

Mrs. Tompkins, of Camden East, is the guest of Mrs. G. Dunlop.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Robt. Pybus is improving in health.

Our school is progressing favorably under the able management of Mr. Glover.

Miss Agnes Jenkins paid a visit to her sister Mrs. Scott one day last week.

Mrs. W. Finlay and three children, of Montreal, are the guests of her father, Mr. Geo. Rook.

Mr. L. Lott has been unable to be among us lately, being greatly troubled with dizziness from which he still suffers.

Mr. H. Armstrong drove clear to Roblin on Thursday to vote for the Scott Act. Although his vote was lost he showed his good sense.

The Old Maid's Taffy Pull on the 5th was a grand success. The lady committee assisted by Messrs. Madden, Dagett and Tompkins deserve great credit for the way the school house was decorated and arranged. Mr. Will Scott very kindly supplied dishes and material for decoration. Miss Lott occupied the chair in a very gracious manner, and read forth the following programme. Music by Messrs. Madden, Hawley, Daggett, Canifton, Pringle, Glover and Clement, and Misses FitzMartin, Scott, Rook Williams Pringle and Boyle. Literary, Messrs. Daggett, Lott, Glover, Hamilton and FitzMartin, and Misses Lott, Doyle, Williams, Davy, Rook, Scott, Stirling, Kelly, McAvoy and U. Lott. The opening chorus by the three little girls, Ida McGuire, Laura Dunlop and Minnie Pybus, was very highly appreciated, as was also the instrumental solo by Mr. Will Scott. The number present may be judged when we state that the pretty door-keepers, Nellie Lott, Libbie McAvoy and Kate McGuire took in $22.40.

The Workman estate has been disposed of, William Henzy, jr., purchasing the eastern and Mr. Jas. Laidley, the western property.

The anniversary of the Methodist Sunday School was a success. The officers, from the superintendent down, are energetic, busy workers. The childrens' field-evening, was Monday, at their concert and they improved the time, too. Mr. J. M. Wemp, Miss Wemp, Henry Hogler and Miss Bain, Bath, contributed largely to the success of the evening.

Any time during the now deceased six months, would have been a pudding for the bonus hunters, but at present we would not give a snap for a railroad. Don't want one; would'nt take it as a gift. We are independent, now that the pike and suckers have appeared on the rapids, and in a month hence will knock the chip off anybody's shoulder, smaller than we are.

Selby.

We welcome the beautiful spring weather.

Sugar making is the order of the day.

Miss Maggie McKim returned to Well's Island this week, having spent a couple of months at her home.

Miss Bertha Cook has returned from a prolonged visit with her sister Mrs. Loyd, of Sidney.

Master Jimmy Rose went to Ottawa this week to pay a visit to his grandmother Mrs. Storr.

Mr. C. Shorey, of Centreville, paid Selby a flying visit last week.

Still the question of the day seems to be,

Who writes the notes for "THE EXPRESS." ?
(It sure must cause him much distress)
By the substance, I can guess,—
Topsy.

Who loses slumber to compose
Some fibs regarding Sweet and Rose, nd hat's and kat's and Fleck and Joe's,—
Topsy.

Who of an ant-hill makes a mount,
And writes of things of no account
And gossips to a great amount?
Topsy.

Who always talks about Joe Brown,
And all the school-marms round the town?
While they contemptuously look down, on—
Topsy.

Who fails to mention things of note
Of him who carried rail and coat,
To see the one on whom he dotes:—
Topsy.

Who likewise fails to mention one
Whose mother vainly sought her son,
But he on railway ties had gone,—
Topsy.

Oh, let us all denounce the one
Who writes such trash and thinks it fun,
And flourishes the nom-de-plume,—
Topsy.

And now to you my verdant scribe
Your pen and ink and paper hide,
And never more again subscribe.—
Topsy.

Elections for the repeal of the Scott Act in the counties of Elgin, Lambton, Oxford and Middlesex will take place on the 9th of May next.

It is stated that the Cabinet has definitely decided to give Mr. Chapleau the railway portifolio, and that the French members claim the vacancy left by Mr. Pope's death for one of their race.

The subject was "Canada and the Jesuits."

Quite a lively time in the council chamber on Saturday. Filson was at it again.

Miss Nellie Miller died on Friday last after a lingering illness. She was burried in St. Paul's burrying ground. A large number of relatives were present: some from Toronto, Belleville and other places. Nearly sixty vehicles were in procession.

We are earnestly looking forward to the time when we will hear the whistle of the steamer Hero.

The Lost Atlantis.

For many centuries there has been a tradition of a long lost island called Atlantis.

The Greek geographers located it in the Atlantic Ocean, west of the northwest part of Africa and the Pillars of Hercules. The sea-kings of Atlantis are said to have invaded Europe and Africa and to have been defeated by the Athanians.

All the legends agree that it was a vast island, of inexhaustible resources, and inhabited by a race of superior people. For ages this island has existed only in legendary lore. But now, when the light of modern reseach is turned full upon the investigation, behold the lost Atlantis at our very doors.

So the bigoted medical fraternity goes groping about in the dark. If they would investigate, they would behold the lost Atlantis at their very door. They experiment and dose with their injurious drugs, and with no person or laws to hold them accountable, they continue their bigoted, unjustified practice, staring into vacancy, imagining that they see in themselves an Esculapius.

Wrapped in ancient bigotry, they denounce any new idea advanced by a layman or an oppositlon school as a fraud.

Why?

Because humanity will not be benefited? Not at all, but because their specialism did not make the discovery.

Yet they concede that there is no remedy known to their materia medica that will cure an advanced kidney malady and the diseases arising therefrom—although many of them know from crowning proof that Warner's Safe Cure will—but unscrupulously treat symptoms and call them a disease, when in reality they know they are but symptons.

A few of the more honest physicians admit that Warner's Safe Cure is a valuable remedy, and a great blessing to mankind, but say, in so many words, when asked why they do not prescibe it, that they cannot, according to their code.

The late eminent physician and writer, Dr. J. G. Holland, published in "Scribner's Monthly," and showed his opinion of such bigotry, and no doubt was satisfied that Atlantis might possibly be discovered in a proprietary medicine, when he wrote editorially, as follows:

"Nevertheless, it is a fact that many of the best proprietary medicines of the day were more successful than many of the physicians, and most of them, it should be remembered, were first discovered or used in actual medicine practice. When, however, any shrewd person, knowing their virtue, and foreseeing their popularity, secures and advertises them, then, in the opinion of the bigoted, all virtue went out of them."

Chicago, April 8.—A letter has been received by the mayor from leading residents of Ouida, Dak., stating that 25 residences, 48 barns, 650 sheep and many horses and cattle were destroyed by the recent prairie fires in Sully county. The letter says that one hundred farmers are homeless, without clothing or seed for sowing, and appeals for help.

NEWS FROM STANLEY.

THE GALLANT EXPLORER'S STRUGGLE AGAINST TERRIBLE ODDS.

A Month of Horror—Starvation and Nakedness—Inflicting the Death Penalty—Light at Last.

A letter from Henry M. Stanley has been received by the Chairman of the Emin Bey Relief Expedition and made public. It shows that the explorer had suffered terrible hardships. It is dated from Bungangeta Island, Aruwhimi River, August 28th 1888. Among other things he says. On August 15th we arrived in the district of Airjeli Opposite our camp was the mouth of the tributary Nepoko. On August 31st I met for the first time a party of Manyema, belonging to a caravan of Ugarrowas, alias Uledi-Balyuz, who turned out to be a former tent boy of Speke's.

BEGINNING OF MISFORTUNES.

Our misfortunes began from this date, for I had taken the Congo route to avoid the Arabs, that they might not tamper with the men and tempt them to desert by presents. Twenty-six of our men deserted within three days of this unfortunate meeting. On September 15th we arrived at camp opposite the station at Ugarrowwas. As food was scarce he had devastated an immense region. We halted but one day near him on such friendly terms as I could make with such a man. I made a trade and left 56 men with him. All the Somalis perferred to rest at Ugarrowwas to continuous marching. Five Soudanese were also left. It would have been certain death for all of them to have accompanied us to the Ugarrowwas. They might possibly recover. Five dollars a month per head was to be paid to this man for their food. On September 18 we left Ugarrowwas, and on October 18 entered a settlement occupied by Kilingalonga, a Zanzibar slave belonging to Tippoo Bin Salim, an old Arab, whose bloody deeds are recorded in the Congo and the founding of its free state.

AN AWFUL MONTH.

This proved an awful month to us. Not one member of our expedition, white or black, will forget it. Our advance numbered 263 souls. On leaving Ugarrowwas, out of the 389, we lost 66 men by desertion and death between Yambuya and Ugarrowwas, and had left 56 men sick in the Arab station. On reaching Killingalonga we discovered we had lost 55 men by starvation and desertion. We had lived principally on wild fruit, fungi and a large, flat, beanshaped nut. The slaves of Abe Bin Salim did their utmost to ruin the expedition, short of open hostilities. They purchased rifles, ammunition, and clothing, so that when we left the station we were beggared and our men absolutely naked. We were so weak physically that we were unable to carry the boats and about seventy loads of goods. We therefore left the goods and boats at Killingalonga, under Surgeon Park and Captain Nelson, the latter of whom was unable to march. After twelve days' march we arrived at a native settlement called Ibwiri, between Kilingalonga and Ibwiri. Our condition had not improved. The Arab devastation had reached within a few miles of Ibwiri, a devastation so complete that not one native hut was standing between Ugarrowwas and Ibwiri, and what had not been destroyed by the slaves of Ugarrowwas and Abed Bin Salim, the elephants, destroyed and turned the whole

LION HUNTING IN ALGERIA.

In Quest of the King of Beasts in His Native Haunts.

The king of beasts in his finest development is still to be found in North Africa. Among the mimosa bushes of yonder sandy plain he rears his majestic crest. Those rocky heights know his presence. From boulder to boulder he leaps with mighty bounds, and at night his awful voice reechoes, rolling like thunder along the ground, and cowing all nature into silence. No other North African country contains so many lions as Algeria; but even there they are growing scarcer from year to year. Gerrard, the first famous Algerian lion killer, upward of thirty years ago estimated them as only 120 in number, and they have certainly not increased since. A successful lion hunt has thus become one of the rarest of rare events. We have known many fashionable chasses-au-lion to be orgaized. No stranger of note who visits the country can well leave it without indulging in one or more of them. They are a picturesque but costly kind of pageantry, always shown off in broad daylight, and forsooth on horseback. Small matter to these amateur sportsmen that lions habitually sleep by day in their almost inaccessible mountain fastnesses, and that the proximity of a large posse of men and horses intimidates them. The native guides know well what they are about. A lion hunt has been ordered regardless of expense, and vast preparations are set on foot forthwith.

At dawn of the appointed day a glittering cavalcade issues from the gates. It is hailed by the acclamation of a motley crowd of natives eager for backsheesh, whose expectations are abundantly gratified, owing to the best of humors engendered by the prospect of such noble sport. A truly magnificent display is made of horses, harness, and picturesque costumes.

BREECH LOADING RIFLES, REVOLVERS, SPEARS, and yataghans reflect the bright rays of the morning sun; and thus, with much shouting, clanking, and jingling, the grand hunt proceeds. Much show, but little wool, for nothing ever comes of it. All day long, through field, sandy plain, and forest, the king of beasts is sought and never found. Some spicy little bit of excitement or other has been prearranged by the guides, who feel that something must be done for the money. A turbaned Arab suddenly appears on the outskirts of a thicket, vowing that a lion is there. With much show of courage the thicket is entered by the guides, leading what seems a forlorn hope, and the uninitiated follow boldly. Every bush is searched, but no! his royal majesty is not at home. His lair is indeed pointed out and declared to be still warm with unmistakable signs of recent occupancy, but that is about all, unless some one in the fever of his enthusiasm should fancy that he has got sight of the lion, of his tawny mane, his tufted tail, or glittering eyes. In that case a rifle, perhaps several, are discharged; and though no carcass is ever found, the readywitted natives are at no loss to account for that: it has tumbled into some inaccessible ravine, and there it lies. Lies, indeed! And so the grand hunt comes to an end before nightfall. A triumphal return and sumptuous feast crown the glorious achievements of the day. In fact, the thing is a sham from beginning to end.

Real lion hunts present widely different features. Free from all ostentatious display, they are spiced with much difficulty, exertion, and danger, and only on rare occasions unqualified success is reaped. Perhaps the most impressive of them is when a whole tribe of Arabs in sheer self-defense issue forth to a man, determined to put an end to height; and every cleft or gully in the rocky wall around bristled with the arms of our spearsmen, barring escape in every direction, a COMPLETE CIRCLE OF GLISTENING STEEL.

We looked carefully to our weapons, and, when all was ready for giving our royal foes a hot reception, loud shouts and clamor were raised to draw them forth, but all in vain. No lion showed as much as the tip of his nose. After brief consultation, one dauntless youth volunteered to creep along the ledge, close to the cave, collect a heap of dry brushwood and fire it, so as to smoke the lions out. The spearmen redoubled their clamor, and we held our rifles in readiness for instant use, while anxiously watching the lad's progress. He pursued his perilous task with great courage. Creeping warily along the ledge, he never paused till he had gained the entrance of the cave. Quickly gathering together the dry brushwood near at hand he soon raised a pile large enough to fill the entrance, and after firing it he made his way back in safety, proud of his daring achievement and warmly greeted by us all. A few moments and the fire blazed up, sending a column of smoke into the cave. The effect upon the inmates was instantaneous and startling. Two mighty roars mingled in one, and lion and lioness bounded forth one after the other. Our doings had goaded them into fury, and they were ready to do battle against all odds in defense of their young ones and their home. At first glimpse of them my companion and I fired, but the movements of the mighty beasts were so rapid and incessant that both of us missed. Our Arab friends were peppering away with their firelocks, but also to little or no purpose.

Suddenly, while the lioness charged down upon us along the ledge, her consort, with one mighty bound, cleared the gully, alighting in the very midst of the Arabs at its brink, and, for the moment, carrying all before him. We aimed carefully this time as the lioness sprang upon us, and both our bullets took effect; but it needed a second dose of lead out of our breech-loaders to stretch her lifeless at our feet. We then hastened to the assistance of our allies. What a scene met our eyes! Bleeding profusely from many wounds, but as yet far from disabled, the furious male was making sad havoc among the crowd. Cracking a skull there with one mighty sweep of his paw, and smashing a shoulder with another, he had already strewn the ground with slain and wounded, as we drew nigh to finish him with our rifles. At that very moment the spearmen were also upon him. While he was scattering his assailants in front, more and more men had drawn near from behind, and half a dozen lances were now plunged into him simultaneously, bearing him to the ground at last. The short but fierce struggle was over, our terrible antagonist lay breathing his last, with his victims around him. He had killed five Arabs outright, and wounded fourteen more, among whom, to our great regret, was the young hero of the day, the same brave lad whose perilous exploit we had admired so much. A great broad gash from neck to shoulder will henceforth bear witness to his prewoss in the eyes of the whole tribe. We were.

for our modest share in the glory of the day, and he informed us later that he deemed victory cheap at the price, considering that thirty or forty victims often fall in such encounters. Two young cubs, scarcely 6 months old, were found inside the cave half smothered by the smoke. We afterward learned that they had been sent to Algiers for sale, and, for all we know, they may be inmates of some zoological garden or men-

The Arab devastation had reached within a few miles of Ibwiri, a devastation so complete that not one native hut was standing between Ugarrowwas and Ibwiri, and what had not been destroyed by the slaves of Ugarrowwas and Abed Bin Salim, the elephants destroyed and turned the whole region into a horrible wilderness. But at Ibwiri we were beyond the utmost reach of the destroyers. We were on virgin soil in a fertile region abounding with food. Our suffering from hunger, which began on August 31, terminated on November 12 Ourselves and men are skeletons. Out of 289 we now only numbered 174, several having no hope of life left. A halt was ordered for the people to recuperate. Hitherto they were sceptical of what we told them.

THE LAND OF PROMISE.

On December 1st we sighted the open country from the top of the Gidge, connected with Mount Pisgah, so named because it was our first view of the land of promise and plenty. On December 5 we emerged upon the plains, and the deadly gloomy forest behind. After 160 days' continuous gloom, we saw the light of day shining all around, making all things beautiful. We thought we never saw grass so green or a country so lovely. The men literally leaped and yelled with joy, and raced over with their burdens. Ah, this was the old spirit of former expeditions successfully completed, and all of a sudden revived. Woe to the native aggressor whom we may meet, however powerful he may be. With such a spirit the men will fling themselves like wolves on sheep, numbers not considered. It had been the eternal forest that had made abject and slavish the creatures so brutally plundered by the Arab slaves.

features. Free from all ostentatious display, they are spiced with much difficulty, exertion, and danger, and only on rare occasions unqualified success is reaped. Perhaps the most impressive of them is when a whole tribe of Arabs in sheer self-defense issue forth to a man, determined to put an end to the ravagers of their flocks and herds or die in the attempt. It is indeed a question of life or death for the Arab. The amount of damage done to the herds of a tribe by a single family of lions in a month has been estimated at 10 per cent. and, remember, his herd is the Arab's all.

We were on a visit to one of the hill tribes when such an emergency arose. Our hosts were poor, but to the best they could offer we were made heartily welcome. There is no lack of hospitality among the much maligned Ishmaelites. Many an act of genuine kindness was shown us, and we should have been cravens indeed had we refused to aid our dusky friends in their need. A lion family had taken up their abode in a cave difficult of access among the hills close by. Night after night dire havoc was wrought by these fierce marauders, and the time had come when a determined stand must be made to avert utter and irrevocable ruin. While the mountain Arab is by no means deficient in courage, perseverance, or physical strength, his weapons are of a most primitive kind.

THE LONG, LIGHT FLINT LOCK GUN

e handles bears no comparison with our modern arms of precision. Deprived of that comfortable sense of safety and self-assurance which the possession of a trusty breech-loader affords, the Arab endeavors to make up for it by an accumulation of numbers. It can scarcely be said, however, that the old proverb holds good on such occasions. Face to face with an angry North African lion, there is no safety in numbers; he has been known to rush upon hundreds of men.

A glorious morning it was among the hills; the sky all aglow with purple tints, and through the veil of mist which hung round the shoulder of the great granite heights far off the summits were glistening like so many black diamonds bathed in sunbeams. Nature in its most rugged form lay before and around us. In the pure azure above, moon and stars were paling before the sun's return. We were surrounded by a motley crowd of Arabs in their picturesque costume. Young and old, all indeed capable of bearing arms, had turned out: some few were handling their long, slender, smooth-bore guns but by far the greater number had only spears and yataghans. The venerable chief beside us gave his orders briefly but distinctly. The exact location of the lion's cave was well known. At imminent peril of their lives the scouts had found it, tracking its mighty denizens to their very lair. A large circle of spearmen was now formed, and the men received instructions to converge gradually toward a rocky ledge in front of the cave, whose entrance was faintly visible from the elevated position of our trysting place. Presently the "battue" commenced. Amid much shouting and clash of arms the lines were drawn closer and closer, while all of us who had firearms made as straight as possible for the cave. Before we had got within range an enormous male lion showed himself for an instant, shook his mane, and vanished, to appear again when we had arrived at a distance of about 1,000 yards.

A brisk but harmless fusilade was opened upon him by our Arab friends, and with a roar of defiance he withdrew once more into his strong-hold; nor did he show himself again as we drew nearer and nearer until we came to a halt about 200 yards from the cave. The narrow ledge leading up to it was separated from the hillside on which we stood by a deep gorge more than forty feet wide. Above the ledge towered a precipitous counters. Two young cubs, scarcely 6 months old, were found inside the cave half smothered by the smoke. We afterward learned that they had been sent to Algiers for sale, and, for all we know, they may be inmates of some zoological garden or menagerie. Our work was accomplished. Probably for many years to come the tribe would be exempt from similar infliction. With high hearts we held our triumphal entry into the village, amid shouts of victory, blended with lamentations over the many wounded. Our young hero of the fire met with his reward. They carried him along in triumph, and, as he lay on his roughly improvised couch, faint from loss of blood, but elated with the consciousness of his achievement, no mortal could have been happier than he. The whole tribe, young and old, paid grateful homage to him as he lay there, for "honor to whom honor is due" remains the rule with these unsophisticated gods of the wilderness, and long may it continue so.

Such, then, has been our experience of lion hunting in North Africa. Furnished with the best arms of precision, and well supported by the indomitable pluck and ripe experience of our dusky allies, we had found ourselves face to face with the king of beasts, and, after all, had but little right to boast of our encounter with him.

Encouraging Home Industry.

Fond Mother—"Doctor, what seems to be the cause of Willie's trouble?"

Doctor—"Some foreign substance in the stomach, I should say."

Fond Mother—"Oh yes; those dreadful Irish potatoes! I will tell our grocer to-morrow that he positively must bring us some of home production."

We have just discovered why there is such a struggle among leading Samoans to be king—that office pays $20 a month.

When a man prints an essay he has written, or a political speech he has made, or some other form of mental effort which he deems worthy of wide dissemination, and appends a picture of himself to the same, such an illustration of the matter may no doubt, be regarded as a symptom and exhibition of personal vanity; but it is a vanity which is simply amusing, and ought to offend nobody. It is in the nature of an appeal to the sensibilities and imagination of the beholder, an attractive bait, it is fondly hoped, to lure him on from the mere looking at the printed matter, to a careful perusal thereof, the rising from which perusal it is earnestly expected will be co-ordinated with largely increased respect and admiration for the talent of the writer.

President Harrison has chosen a strong team to represent the United States in the Berlin conference for the settlement of the Samoan troubles. Mr. Kasson was Minister to Austria in 1877 and to Germany in 1884; Mr. Phelps is a politician of some note, and, as an exchange says, a robust exponent of the "American idea"; and Mr. Bates is an astute lawyer who was one of the commissioners previously sent to investigate into Samoan affairs. Diplomatic, political, and legal skill are thus happily combined. The two secretaries, also, are well fitted for their positions, one of them having been at one time Consul-General in Samoa, and the other having taken part in the negotiation of the existing treaty.

How the Romans Enjoyed Life.

The lavish expenditure of the Romans on the cœna, the great meal of the day, was often fabulous. Vitellius is actually reported to have squandered 400 sestertia, about £3,228, on his daily supper, though surely this must be a monstrous exaggeration! The celebrated feast to which he invited his brother Lucius cost 3,000 sestertia, or £40,350. Suetonius relates that it consisted of 2,000 different dishes of fish and 7,000 of fowls, and this did not exhaust the bill of fare. His daily food was luxurious and varied beyond precedent. The deserts of Lydia, the shores of Spain, and the waters of the Carpathian seas were diligently searched to furnish his table with dainties, while the savage wilds of Britain had to bear their part in replenishing his larder. Had he reigned long Josephus says that he would have exhausted the wealth of the Roman Empire itself. Ælius Verus, another of these worthies, was equally profuse in the extravagance of his suppers. It is said that a single entertainment, to which only a dozen guests were invited, cost 6,000,000 sesterces—6,000 sestertia, that is—or nearly £48,500. History relates that his whole life was passed eating and drinking in the voluptuous retreats of Daphne or at the luxurious banquets of Antioch. So profuse, indeed, was the extravagance of those times that to entertain an Emperor was to face almost certain ruin; one dish alone at the table of Heliogabalus is said to have cost about £4,000 of our money. No wonder these imperial feasts were lengthened out for hours, and that every artifice, often revolting in the extreme, was used to prolong the pleasure of eating, or that Philoxenus should have wished that he had the throat of a crane with a delicate palate all the way down. One does not like to associate the name of Julius Cæsar with habits of low gluttony that would disgrace a prize fighter, and yet, if our memory does not play us false, even he did not disdain to take emetics to return to his banquets with a keen appetite.—[The National Review.

HEALTH.

The Care of The Feet.

There are three things necessary in order to secure the most healthy condition of the feet; they should be kept warm, dry and clean. The first requisite is obtained by wearing suitable stockings. In selecting the material we should remember first, what fabric is the best non-conductor of heat, and second, which is the most comfortable to the wearer. Experience has taught us, that woolen is the most perfect non-conductor, therefore it is more generally used for winter wear than cotton or silk. Care should be taken to use only one kind during the season; it is not wise to wear cotton to-day and woolen to morrow, and thus alternate from one to the other, as in this way it is very easy to catch cold. But the choice of either material must be left to the wearer. The natural heat of the body caused by the activity of the circulation will suggest which is best for his own individual use. Thus for one who has a large amount of natural heat, woolen retains this surplus of heat, profuse perspiration is induced which soon becomes condensed by the cold which comes through the boot or shoe, and the feet are thereby kept clammy, damp and most disagreebly cold; but if cotton or silk hose is worn, the extra heat is conveyed away, still leaving enough to keep the feet comfortably warm.

The dryness of the feet depends largely upon the kind and quality of the boot or shoe worn. Shoes are better for ordinary every-day use than boots, especially for those people who walk. For riding or when obliged to stand or travel torough the deep snow, boots are the best. A cheap pair of shoes is dear at any price. It pays in every way to get a good shoe; it looks better, wears longer and gives better satisfaction. A recent writer has given tie following directions for the preservation and utility of boots and shoes: "Take a pound each of tallow and resin and put in a pot on the fire; when melted and mixed, apply hot with a painter's brush until neither the sole or upper will soak any more. It it is desired that the boots should immediately take a polish, dissolve a ounce of wax in a teaspoonful of turpentine and lampblack; this should be applied a day or two after, but not before the fire. Thus the exterior will have a coat of wax alone and shine like a mirror, at the same time affording antiseptic protection to the tallow and resin which will prevent them from rotting the leather." Another important consideration is not to wear a shoe after the outer or first sole is worn through. It is conducive to both health and comfort to get it tapped. Rubber boots, overshoes or rubbers should be worn only while riding and walking, and not when in the house, the store, or in church.

As to the matter of cleanliness, it should be remembered that the pores of the soles of the feet are much the largest in the whole body, it is therefore of special importance that they be kept open. At least once a week during the winter, the feet should receive a good soaking in warm water, and if convenient twice or even three times a week is none too often.

Perhaps no class of men suffer more from cold feet than those who are obliged to remain out in severe winter weather who from the nature of their work are compelled to stand or sit in one position most of the time, as for example, horse-car drivers, conductors, hackmen, teamsters, etc. To such and others, the following method of warming the feet may be of practical service.

It is one of the rules of what is known as the "Swedish movement system," and is as follows: Stand erect, and very gradually

WINDFALLS FOR SAVAGES.

Thriving on the Misfortunes of Shipwrecked Sailors.

A few weeks ago the British vessel Anglo India was wrecked on the Formosan coast, and the natives who, on about a third of the big island, are still thorough savages in spite of the Chinese occupancy, flocked to the beach to collect their booty. Fourteen of the crew, fearing to fall into the hands of the savages, put off to sea in a boat and were lost. The others were taken captive, deprived of their clothing, and terribly maltreated. The plundering of the vessel was in progress when a Government boat came along, drove the natives into the forest, and killed three of them as a warning to the other pirates.

It is a lucky day for many a savage tribe when a wrecked vessel gives them a chance to exercise their thievish and murderous propensities. The fierce natives of the Andaman Islands have only just been taught through a long and bitter series of reprisals, that shipwrecked sailors are not providentially thrown in their way as targets for their arrows.

One of the greatest prizes ever taken from the ocean by uncivilized men, fell a few months ago into the hands of some of the Gilbert Islanders, and they have thus far been left in possession, as their good fortune involved no crime. The British ship Rock Terrace was abandoned about a year ago by her crew in the Pacific. She was supposed to be in a sinking condition, but, strange to say, she floated about for several months and finally brought her cargo of oil and general stores to one of the Gilbert Islands. The joy of the islanders knew no bounds when they found that the winds and waves had wafted them so bountiful a treasure. They unloaded the vessel, enriched themselves with the cargo, and the insurance company which meanwhile has paid $125,000 to the owners will hardly look to the islanders for reimbursement.

The United States Government sent agents thousands of miles to reward the Chookchees of Behring Strait for their hospitality to the unfortunate crew of the burned steamer Rodgers, and those other dwellers by the Arctic ocean who saved the lives of a part of the Jeannette expedition. Thus the recognition of services rendered by uncivilized peoples to seafarers in distress, as well as the retribution visited upon others, is lessening the perils of sailors who are cast away in savage lands.

Probably the Eskimos of King William's Land do not know to this day what a chance they lost to win the world's favor and substantial rewards when they destroyed almost every vestige of the Franklin expedition, and used to kindle their fires the precious records that would have given us the story of that tragical voyage.

the feet may be of practical service.

It is one of the rules of what is known as the "Swedish movement system," and is as follows: Stand erect, and very gradually lift yourself upon the tips of the toes so as to put all the tendons of the feet at full strain. This should not be done spasmodically, but slowly and gradually, the slower the better, and remain standing in that position as long as possible, then return slowly to the natural position. Repeat this several times until a sufficient and lively circulation is set up.

In closing, we would offer a word of caution to mothers, and that is, do not allow your children to go to bed with cold feet; see to it that their feet and legs are warm and dry. This will not only make them comfortable and serve to ensure them a good night's rest, but also may prevent suffering and perhaps a serious illness.

Odors of the Body.

A certain odor is natural to the body, and it is not necessarily a disagreeable odor. Indeed, that of a clean baby is positively pleasant. It is rarely agreeable later in life, because few persons have perfect health and the full, normal action of their eliminating organs.

The lungs and the skin are the chief eliminaters of what offends the sense of smell. Every one is familiar with the disagreeable odor in the breath of persons who have been eating onions. Other kinds of food and alcoholic drinks also produce an offensive breath, and so do various digestive derangements or effete matter circulating in the blood, and being eliminated by the lungs. The emanations from the skin often receive a disagreeable odor in consequence of the skin being required to do work that has been imperfectly done by overburdened or diseased kidneys, or by constipated bowels. In the case of overburdened kidneys the help given by the skin serves to prevent serious harm. In the case of diseased kidneys, it greatly aids in prolonging life.

Whatever the origin of the disagreeable odor from the skin may be, it is most marked in those parts of the body—the arm-pits, for instance—where the sweat glands are most numerous. It will be seen that, in all cases of this kind, the removal of that odor must come from improving the general health, as well as from frequent bathing.

But besides these causes of disagreeable odor, there is another still more marked—the derangement of the functions of the skin itself. There is what is called chronic hydrosis. Its characterized by an excess of perspiration which, moreover, has an offensive acid smell. It is most frequent in the feet, hands and arm-pits. When the feet are affected, the soles are generally burning hot, red and exceedingly tender.

If there is any nervous debility in the case—and this is often the case—the diet should be nutritious and generous, and tonic remedies should be administered.

Sir Erasmus Wilson, the highest authority on skin diseases, says that the affected parts should be washed with juniper—tar-soap, and sponged from time to time with a lotion consisting of one part of liquor ammonia to three of water.

When the feet are affected, let the patient have two pairs of stockings, and interchange them daily, hanging the pair not in use out to dry, preferably in the sun. This will answer every purpose.

In the case of women "sleeve protectors" should be used.—[Youth's Companion.

HOUSEHOLD.

The Dearest Ties of Home.

"The Hand that rocks the cradle," a power that rules the world,
The voice that sings its sweetest songs in loving lullaby,
The banner, bearing child-love, in flowing folds unfurled—
A hand, a voice, a banner, whose memories never die.

The heart that beats in unison with child-like faith and fear,
The eye that marks child-coming, and grows brighter when they come,
The ear that opes to childhood charms and holds them ever dear—
The heart, the eye, the ear that know the Dearest Ties of Home.

Choosing a Husband.

Don't be afraid to marry a poor man; but be sure that he has something besides poverty to commend him. Be sure that he has two strong hands, not only skilful, but ready for hard work. Be sure that he has an occupation, or a position, which may reasonably be depended on to yield a good comfortable living. Be sure that he is industrious, and not self-indulgent; be sure that he is steady, working six days in the week, and about 52 weeks in the year. A good, true, faithful young woman ought to have no "Yes" for answer to a proposal of marriage from a lazy man, or a man who has no fixed occupation, or a man who has lived half his life off the hard earnings of his mother or sister, going about the streets meanwhile with his cane and his cigarette and his fine clothes, playing the gentleman.

Choice Recipes.

CIDER VINEGAR.—Put the barrel on its side and fill it with good cider to the bung, that the pomace may be thrown out as the cider ferments. Fill up the barrel twice a day while fermentation is in progress. At the close of fermentation the cider should be racked off carefully and put into another clean barrel, or the same one after it has been well washed out. If there are enough barrels, it is better to fill them only half full after fermentation is finished, as this exposes a greater surface to the air. The more air the better the vinegar will make. Hence, a darkened, airy outhouse is better than a close cellar for the storage of the barrels. The cider will be converted into vinegar in about 12 months, and will steadily increase in strength.

SUET PUDDING.—Chop finely seven ounces of good kidney suet. Put this into a basin, and mix with it half a teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, half a nutmeg grated, half a teaspoonful of thin lemon rind cut small, four ounces of flour, and three ounces of bread crumbs. Mix the dry ingredients thoroughly. Whisk two fresh eggs till they are light and frothy, add gradually a quarter of a pint of milk and stir this into the pudding. Let it stand half an hour. Put it in one lump into a well-floured cloth, plunge it into boiling water, and boil quickly for three hours. Serve sweet sauce with it.

TOMATO SOUP WITHOUT MEAT.—Fry an onion, sliced, in a tablespoonful of nice dripping in the soup pot. When they are of a reddish-brown, add a quart of tomatoes and stir all up until very hot, when put in one quart of boiling water and a tablespoonful of chopped parsley when obtainable. Stew half an hour, and strain through a colander. Return to the pot, season with pepper and salt and a teaspoonful of sugar, stir in two tablespoonfuls of butter rolled in

THE LONE SNAKE HUNTER.

A Queer old Man in the Catskills Who Catches Live Rattlesnakes.

In a little hut on the side of the great Storm King Mountain, in the Hudson Highlands, far above the river, and about an equal distance below the loftiest pinnacle of the towering hill, lives old Zachary Archer, who supports his wife and himself, the only inhabitants of the cabin, by catching snakes. The cottage is not visible from above or below in Summer time. The thick foliage of the trees, and the dense undergrowth which arises almost to the level of its low roof, effectually conceal it; and as the old man has an insurmountable objection to a fire in the kitchen in the warm weather, and makes his wife walk two miles every day to a small cave to cook their food, which is always eaten cold, no floating smoke betrays the presence of their dwelling. But at this season, when the mountain trees have partly withdrawn the curtains that covered it, while the gorse and brushwood are cowering close to the ground as if for warmth, the desolate little building is very conspicuous. No other house is near it, and it is a picture of loneliness.

The venerable snake catcher does not like it in the Winter months, and passes as much time as he can away from it, leaving his wife and the snakes to keep each other company. They hibernate together, the serpents sleeping in the cold back room and the old woman dozing before the wood fire, which burns night and day when the snow is on the ground. Old Zack, as he is usually called, is generally pursuing his slippery trade or doing his share of slumbering before a barroom stove in one of the numerous small villages or settlements at the foot of the mountain. He was engaged in the latter avocation a few days ago, when the reporter aroused him and asked him how he felt. He said he was well, but rheumatic, and added that the reptile business was brisk.

"It's always a sight safer in Winter than in Summer," he said, when he had taken something to wash down his sleepiness, "and though I don't get as many snakes I like it better. In Summer the rattlers and the copperheads stand a chance of catchin' you instead of your trappin' them. You see, they're always wide awake, and keepin' their eyes peeled for danger. I can find them ready enough, but to get them into the leather bag I carry is a horse of another color. I have all sorts of ways of catchin' them. Sometimes I set traps for them, and that's a heap the safest way. The trap is only an open basket, with a lot of red flannel inside. Snakes, unless they're disturbed, will always go back to their old sleepin' ground when the sun is high. When I find a snake track I follow it until I come either to the serpent or his bed. If it's the serpent, I try to pin his neck to the ground with a forked stick that I carry. That's mighty dangerous work if he's a rattler, for I must go very close to him, and if I miss him at the first jab I'll be apt to be closer in a second. However, I never missed yet, and I don't suppose I ever will, now I'm that experienced. When I have him down I take him with my hand, close behind the fork, so that he can't turn his head to bite me and drop him into the bag. But if the snake hasn't gone to bed and I don't find him I go back about fifty yards along the track and lay the basket down with the lid open. Then I hunt more serpents. When I come to the basket again, in two hours or so, I creep up from behind and slam the cover shut. The snake is generally inside, mixed up with the flannel. He's found the place too comfortable to get out of it in a hurry. The serpent may be the wisest beast of the field, but he's a luxurious cuss, and he don't value his life ful of chopped parsley when obtainable. Stew half an hour, and strain through a colander. Return to the pot, season with pepper and salt and a teaspoonful of sugar, stir in two tablespoonfuls of butter rolled in flour, and when this has been smoothly mixed, add a small teacupful of hot boiled rice. Simmer ten minutes, and serve.

GATEAU OF APPLES.—Stew five or six apples, peeled and cored, with ¾ lb of sugar, grated rind of a lemon and its juice. When they commence to get soft, keep on stirring them until they form a thick, dry marmalade, then turn it into a mound and leave till cold. Serve with whipped cream or a well made boiled custard. The gateau will keep good for some days.

A QUAINT OLD SWEET.—Make some good custard flavoured with vanilla and stiffened with a little gelatine, and when properly thickened over the fire pour this into a glass dish (an old, or for that matter a new, Japanese punchbowl looks best), and let it set. When set firm, whip the whites of two eggs to a stiff froth with two ounces finely-grated chocolate a la vanille, and pile it up in the centre of the bowl. If liked, jelly can be used instead of the custard, and the whip of egg can be coloured and flavoured to taste. It makes an exceedingly pretty supper dish, as does also Ben lane, a Manx version of curds and whey, served in large bowls. In fact, for suppers, these large bowls seem to be coming in greatly.

OMELETTE FOR ONE.—One egg, one tablespoon of milk, one teaspoon of sugar and a pinch of salt; beat all together and fry in hot butter; roll it up as it sets and do not burn.

The Opium Habit in Washington.

One of the leading physicians of the American capital remarked the other day that if a brand was on the forehead of every woman who used opium in some form, society here would go to pieces. He attributes this frightful condition of affairs to the dissipated life led here by the women of the upper tendom. The endless round of balls and receptions is such a strain upon them that they must seek relief in some way. They begin by taking a soothing syrup, as a rule, to put them to sleep, this after a while fails to act, then paregoric is resorted to. From this it is only a step to pure opium and absolute ruin. Sometimes people buy the crude gum and eat it regularly every day, while others buy laudanum and drink it in quarter-ounce, half-ounce and even ounce potions. And then there are Dover's powders and morphine pills, both of which act rapidly, and especially the latter. The habit seems more of a disease than a vice, for the whole nature of the victim undergoes a complete revolution, moral, mental and physical. After a short time the victim will sacrifice honour, friends and family for the fatal drug. There is no cure, for even the asylums fail to effect a permanent cure except in rare instances.

The fears entertained up to the begining of February that the ice crop would be very short have been dissipated. February was very cold, one of the coldest Februaries on record, and good solid ice formed abundantly and was harvested in sufficient quantity all over Eastern Canada and the Northern States to more than supply the demand. The price of ice during the summer should therefor not be any higher than usual.

Capt. Dawson, editor of The Charleston News and Courier, who was shot and killed on Tuesday by Dr. McDow, made himself famous by the stand he took against duelling. He was the first editor in the South to oppose the code, and for his manly work in this direction he was knighted by the Pope.

HOW IT FEELS TO BE EATEN.

Three Eminent Men Have Asserted That it is Not Painful.

Sir Lyon Playfair recently related that he knew three men who escaped with their lives after being partially devoured by wild beasts. The first was Livingstone, the great African traveler, who was knocked on his back by a lion, which began to munch his arm. He asserted that he felt no fear or pain, and that his only feeling was one of intense curiosity as to which part of his body the lion would take next. The next was Rustem Pasha, now Turkish Ambassador in London. A bear attacked him and tore off part of his hand and part of his arm and shoulder. He also said that he had neither a sense of pain nor of fear, but that he felt excessively angry because the bear grunted with so much satisfaction in munching him. The third case is that of Sir Edward Bradford, an Indian Officer, now occupying a high position in the Indian Office. He was seized in a solitary place by a tiger, which held him firmly behind his shoulder with one paw and then deliberately devoured the whole of his arm, beginning at the end and ending at the shoulder. He was very positive that he had no sensation of fear, and thinks that he felt a little pain when the fangs went through his hand, but is certain that he felt none during the munching of his arm.

A Good One on Dr. McCosh.

They tell a good story on Dr. McCosh, the venerable ex-President of Princeton College. Horace Porter, who graduated at that college some years ago, says that he was lying in his room one day when there was a knock at his door. "Who's there?" he shouted. It's me—Dr. McCosh," was the answer, in a hard Scotch brogue. "You're a liar," retorted Porter, who really thought it was a class mate. "If it were Dr. McCosh, he would say 'It is I.'" There was no answer to this, but the sound of feet shuffling down the corridor. Young Porter ran to the door, cautiously opened it, looked down the hall and saw the back and tall stooped form of Dr. McCosh disappearing. The President of Princeton never spoke of the incident, nor did Porter until he had his sheepskin.

It is estimated that electric wires have killed more than two hundred persons during the last two years.

He's found the place too comfortable to get out of it in a hurry. The serpent may be the wisest beast of the field, but he's a luxurious cuss, and he don't value his life nowhere as compared with his comfort.

"When I find a hole with snake marks about its mouth I just hang a running noose of cat gut over it and fasten the single end to a stick like a fishing rod. Then I put a lump of soft bread soaked in milk before the hole and goin' back I hold the rod in my hand. Nearly all snakes are dead set on milk and the smell of the bait is pretty sure to draw the one I'm after out of the hole. He must pass his head through the loop to reach the bread, and when he does that I jerk the rod, tighten the noose, and I have him. It's just like fishin.'

"Then there's my dog Viper. He catches a lot of snakes and helps me to catch more. In the Summer, when he finds a snake, he'll walk around him until he makes him dizzy trying to keep his ugly eyes p'inted at the danger. At last he'll either drop his head or make a turn the other way to take the kinks out of his body. Then Viper is on him as quick as a wink. He grabs him by the back of the neck, out of reach of his fangs, and brings him to me without hurting him. In the winter he can't catch the snakes himself, but he leads me to holes in the trees and other snug places where they lie. Just to be on the safe side, I push a stick into their bedrooms first; but they're always as good as dead, they're so sound asleep, and I can pull them out with my hand, covered with a thick cloth glove. I have to use a good deal of ether to stupefy my snakes when I'm movin' them from one box or bag to another.

"Who buy my serpents? Well, I'll tell you. Circuses and small museums, as well as old fossils of naturalists, are always wantin' curiosities, and when I catch a snake with two heads, or two tails, which I do about three times a year, I get a good price—often as much as $100—for him. The common reptiles are worth only a few dollars each. Hello, here's Viper. Where have you been, sir? There's no snakes down here, you know."

An ill-looking dog, with only one eye, trotted up to the stove and lay down before his master. His worth as a serpent chaser may have been above estimate, but his market value was clearly below par.

Stanley and Emin Well.

LONDON, APRIL 4.—A letter from Henry M. Stanley, dated Smuputuri, September 4, 1888, which has reached a friend of the explorer in Edinburg, says he is well and in good spirits. He met Emin Pasha on the shores of Albert Nyanz. They were together for 26 days. When Stanley left Emin, the latter was enjoying good health.

Sir Francis de Winton, president of the Emin Bey Relief Committee, says the letters will make five newspaper columns; that they will be published shortly and that the Government is ignorant of their contents.

THE FATE OF AN AFRICAN KING.

The Downfall of Mwanga the Bloody.

The fate of King Mwanga, recently the bloodthirsty tyrant of Uganda, shows that speedy retribution can overtake cruelty and injustice even in the heart of pagan Africa. Almost the only person in the world to give him now a helping hand is the missionary Mackay, whom Mwanga often threatened with death and kept a prisoner for many months after he had slaughtered his Christian subjects and murdered Bishop Hannington.

This fallen king, who, a few months ago, numbered his army by many thousands and his subjects by millions, was, at last accounts, 300 miles from his country, virtually a prisoner in the hands of Arabs. He feared the Arabs would send him back to Uganda to be murdered, and so sent a message to Mackay, imploring him to come to Magu and take him away. "Take me anywhere you like," he said "or slay me if you like." He added that he would go to Europe if Mackay would take him there, for he had heard that a big king in great trouble (meaning Napoleon III.) had once been welcomed to England when driven out of his country.

Mr. Mackay, when he wrote, was about to start for Magu, in the hope of getting the fallen king away from the Arabs and removing him to a place of safety. "If the English send an expedition here," Mwanga used to say to Mackay. "I will kill you." "It becomes me," writes Mackay now, "to do all in my power to return good for evil." What a remarkable opportunity to show forth the teachings of his Master, and how nobly this humble missionary is improving it!

HEAD TO THE NORTH.

Why We should Sleep With Our Bodies Lying North and South.

Scientific investigation proves that there is the best possible foundation for the belief that we should sleep with our bodies lying north and south, says the St. Louis "Globe-Democrat." Each human system has magnetic poles, one positive and one negative. It is true that some persons have the positive pole in the head and the negative pole in the feet, and others the reverse. In order that the person sleeping should be in perfect harmony with the magnetic phenomena of the earth, the head, if it possess the positive pole should lie to the south, or if the feet possess the positive pole the head should lie to the north. The positive pole should always lie opposite to the magnetic equilibrium.

The positive pole of the person draws one way, but the magnetic pole of the earth draws the other way and forces the blood toward the feet, affects the iron in the system, tones up the nerves and makes sleep refreshing and invigorating. But if a person sleeps the wrong way and fails to become magnetically in sympathy with the earth, he will then probably be too magnetic, and will have a fever resulting from the magnetic forces working too fast; or he will not be magnetic enough, and the great strain will cause a feeling of lassitude, sleep will not be refreshing, and in the morning he will have no more energy than there is in a cake of soap. Some persons may scoff at these ideas, but the greatest scientific men of the world have studied the subject.

What She Knew About Him.

"What do any of you know about Washington, children?" asked a teacher in the school on Thursday.

One bright-faced youngster put up his hand.

"What do any of you know about Washington, children?" asked a teacher in the school on Thursday.

One bright-faced youngster put up his hand.

"Well, Willie, what do you know about Washington?"

"He was the first President of the United States," replied the boy.

There was silence then for quite a minute. This seemed to have exhausted the stock of information until at length a triumphant smile about a little girl's mouth broke out on the general area of perplexed faces, like a splash of sunshine on a muddy pool. A little hand went up.

"Well, Annie, what can you tell us about Washington?" said the teacher, with an encouraging smile.

"Please, ma'am, he's dead," answered the little girl.

Female Beauty.

It is a fortunate thing that all men do not have the same taste in female beauty, for otherwise they would all fall in love with the same woman, which would be awkward. Although the preferences of men for different style of form and feature vary greatly it is, undoubtedly, a fact that an appearance indicative of health is pleasing to all alike. A woman may be without regular features yet, if healthy, she will be beautiful to someone and pleasing to all. A sallow complexion, a dull eye, a system debilitated by unnatural discharges, in short, all the ills attendant upon the irregularities and "weaknesses" peculiar to the sex, can be banished by the use of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. Ask your druggist.

Diamond eardrops, in antique style, are being revived.

Curability of Consumption.

This has been a vexed question among physicians, opinions, even in the same school, being strangely divergent. Of this, however, the public are convinced it is a terribly prevalent disease, and the average doctor meets with but scant success in treating it. Consumption is in reality scrofula of the lungs, and is liable to attack any whose blood is tainted. For driving out the scrofulous humors, and thus removing the predisposing cause, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a sovereign remedy. It purifies bad blood, heals scrofulous ulcers and, whatever difference if opinion exists as to curing advanced cases of consumption, it remains that many pronounced "incurable" have been by it brought back from the brink of the grave to restored health and vigor.

What's the sense in saying that Catarrh cannot be cured when Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy is so sure and positively certain that the proprietors offer $500 reward for a case of Catarrh which they cannot cure. Marriage Licenses

Issued by Ogden Hinch at Cheapside, (application strictly private and confidential.) 2288ly

Chas. Lane,

Issuer of Marriage Licenses. Front of Grammar School, Bridge Street, Napanee. 2288ly —Abundance of good fruit at Bruton's.

—Feathers cleaned and renovated by steam. Terms low. Apply to W. C. Bruton. adv.

—Old feather beds and pillows made like new by the steam revovator. Satisfaction guaranted. Apply to W. C. Bruton. adv.

—Mr. A. R. Davis has been offered a position on the engineering staff of a government railway in the Maritime Provinces and will likely accept. We trust that the pay will be commensurate with his deserts.

—W. D. Madden is the only authorized agent of the C. P. R. in Napanee and if you are going to Manitoba, British Columbia or in fact any point on the C. P. R. you will find a great advantage if you purchase tickets from the authorized agent. Call or write to W. D. Madden for maps, folders and all reliable information. adv.

—A large and varied stock of choicest wall papers have recently been received at Gallaghers book store and are attracting a a great deal of attention. The stock comprises a large assortment of gilt and other fine papers which are being sold at extremely low prices. Gilt papers as low as 15c a roll. If you want your rooms to look fresh and neat get your paper at Gallaghers.

—On Menday last the following persons left for Manitoba and other points in the Northwest: Mrs. Evans, of Ernesttown; Miss Hattie Maines, of Napanee; Mr. M. C. Shorey, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Martin, Mr. W. J. Hinchey, Thomas Hinchey and Frank Breault, of Camden; Mr. B. C. Martin, of Richmond, and Daniel Gleason John Gleason and J. S. Miller, M. P. P., of Napanee. Thus the exodus continues.

—Last week we chronicled the death of Mr. John Fleming, of Mill Haven, and now it is our sad duty to announce the death of his daughter, Mrs. W. D. Forward of Ernesttown station. Mrs. Forward was only 24 years of age and her untimely death is greatly regretted, as she was a general favorite. That fell destroyer, consumption, was the cause of her death. We extend our heartfelt sympathy to Mr. Forward and the sorrowing friends in their bereavement.

—On Friday last the barn and stables of J. Kenny of Camden were burned to the ground, together with sixteen head of cattle and nearly seventy-five tons of hay. Mr. Kenny was watering his horses, and left a lantern standing on the stable floor while he went out to the pump. One of the horses kicked at him, and, breaking away, rushed into the stable, upset the lantern, and in a few minutes the whole structure was in flames. Mr. Kenny has $1600 insurance on the buildings and contents which will only partially cover his loss.

—The high school boys held a meeting on Monday and organized a foot ball club. The following are the list of officers elected. Mr. Cortez Fezzenden, honorary president; Mr. N. Wagar, honorary vice president; Mr. Ryerson Sills, honorary 2nd vice president; Mr. Marcus Sexsmith, President; Alex. Pruyn, vice president; W. Anderson, secretary; Mr. Libby, general overseer; T. Warner, Treasurer. A challenge has been issued to the Young Ironsides and the ball will be faced at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon on the high school ground.

—Dr. Kergan, of Detroit, Mich., who with members of his famous International Medical Council, are now in Kingston, will have selected members of the staff in Napanee on Wednesday and Thursday April 17th & 18th. Their opinion and advice may be secured regarding any disease or de-

LICENSES.

WHISKEY SELLERS ANXIOUS.

High Licenses and Lots of Them.

Since the repeal of the Scott Act, the would-be whiskey sellers have been extremely anxious about the number of licenses to be issued. It is generally conceded that there will be eight hotel licenses granted in Napanee, but there has been a great difference of opinion about the shop licenses. At first it was supposed that only two could be issued, but on looking up the by-law it was found that the number could be four. This caused great indignation in certain quarters, as it was felt that, should four licenses be issued, the profits would be greatly lessened, in fact the great would-be-leader of public opinion in Napanee, pronounced against four shop licenses in unmistakable terms. He thought his friend's profits would be seriously diminished, hence his indignation. We are told on good authority that four shop licenses will be granted despite the Doctors' wrath.

Another cause of anxiety was the fact that both hotel and shop licenses have been increased $270 each. The old licenses were only $200, but the government have recently imposed the additional amount.

We think that the commissioners will be justified in issuing all the licenses possible. By an unmistakable vote the people have said that they want license and revenue, and by all means let them have what they wish.

—Davis is making a fine line of home made bread. Try it.

—The rumor is current that a paper mill will soon be started at Tamworth.

—When you want horse bills printed call at THE EXPRESS office. Prices and work to suit the times.

—The Napanee, Tamworth & Tweed railway are pushing their road. Last week they paid out about $6.000 for right of way.

—N. F. Snider of Odessa lost an overcoat on Monday last on the York road between Napanee and Odessa. The finder will please return it to him. Adv.

—Mr. B. Murphy, of Erinsville, has secured a settlement with his creditors and has bought back the stock, notes and book debts. He will continue to carry on business at his old stand in Erinsville.

—On Monday last a dog belonging to Mr. Melvin Taylor ended its life rather suddenly by running in front of a G. T. R. locomotive. After the cowcatcher had pushed it aside it again ran, between the wheels of the engine, where its head was severed from its body.

—George I. Ham has made extensive preparations for supplying the people of Napanee with first class ice during the coming summer. Ice will be delivered every morning. Parties wishing to contract for a season's supply, or even for a shorter term, will do well to place their orders at once. adv.

—On Sunday last a fire broke out in one of the rooms of the Rankin House but was seen in time to be checked. The wall was damaged a little, some brackets and clothing being burnt. Mr. Rankin intends painting the hotel all over new, and is having the office counter extended across the front room.

—The following are the officers of the Young Ironsides foot ball club. Treasurer and Captain, Mr. G. Reed; Secretary, E. W. Thomas; Field-Capt., E. W. Grange. Committee:—Mr. G. Reed, W. Aahley, H. —In last week's Beaver, Edward Baird seeks to give himself "a higher character" and says that he has no need to apply to those who swore that they would not believe him under oath, to establish his reputation. He is quite right. He himself has settled that matter beyond dispute. In giving his evidence in Curl vs Baird where it was proved that he had indecently assaulted a poor defenceless woman, he was forced to admit that he had recently given $200 to settle a similar case. Self convicted once, and a second time convicted by a jury despite his plighted word, surely such a man has not a character that would give him a very high standing in the community.

—On Friday of last week as a couple of school boys were playing near the G. T. R. crossing on Thomas street, they discovered the body of a male baby underneath the sidewalk. The body was wrapped in a Globe and an Empire, both of the date of January 5th of this year. The child was fully developed,,but as no inquest was held it is not known whether it was born alive or not. Appearances went to show that the body had been placed under the sidewalk shortly after the first snow storm in the latter part of January. The County Attorney and Reeve Lapum decided that it was not necessary to hold an inquest and ordered the body to be buried. The general supposition is that some unfortunate has taken this means of getting rid of her shame, but there is not the slighest suspicion as to who the guilty party is. We understand that an inquest was not held on the ground of the expense to the county. We believe that this is establishing a dangerous precedent. For the sake of a few, or even a great many dollars, crime should not go untraced or uupunished. The very fact of an investigation being held, might, and probably would, deter anyone else from attempting to perpetrate a similar crime, even if the criminal in this case was not brought to justice.

—The Christian Endeavor Society of the Eastern Methodist church gave a Topic social last Friday evening, and a fair sized audience were attracted by this novelty. A list of topics were announced, and five minutes conversation on each formed the chief part of the program. Other features were not lacking however, as good music was furnished by the Glee Club, and by Misses Richardson, Rose and Daly. Mr. Jewell contributed "Not Ashamed of Christ" and "Margamite," in his usual happy style. He always deservedly receives a warm welcome. Readings by Miss N. Chambers and Miss Maines, and a recitation by Miss Price were very good and were well received, after which cake and coffee were served. The young people succeeded in making everybody enjoy this their first Topic social. We wish to say just here, that a number of young people succeeded in making themselves general nuisances to the rest of the audience. This same clique manage to be present at nearly every public entertainment given in Napanee and by their giggling, laughing, whispering and boisterous conduct generally, are fast earning for themselves an unenviable reputation. It is high time that this sort of thing was stopped. If repeated again where we have the opportunity of procuring the names of these disturbers we shall certainly publish them.

—Spring has come and so have the Gipsies, quite a brigade took their westward flight through the town yesterday.

—We are glad to hear that Rev. W. W. Miller is recovering. He has had a severe attack of malaria fever, —Rev. E. N. Baker, M. A. B. D., is preaching a series of sermons on the commandments. The subject for next Sunday evenihg is the "Marriage Tie."

—Navigation opened yesterday, the first arrival being the schooner L. D. Bullock in tow of the tug Rescue. Captain Ab. Eccles is again in command of the Bullock.

—M. K. Elliott's Improved Medicated Electric Battery. Headache, Hay Fever, Catarrh, Asthma and Neuralgia cure. Perry & Co., agents, Napanee. adv.

—Perry & Co. have succeeded in securing a large amount of Prince Edward clover seed, better than the choicest western seed, and are selling it 25c less on the bushel than any other dealer. Call and see it before you buy.

—In the supplementary estimates brought down last week, there appears the item of twelve thousand dollars to complete the Napanee Post office This makes a total of thirty-seven thousand dollars thus far voted for our Postoffice.

—The Town Council met on Monday evening to discuss the license question. The By-Laws were produced and found to be all right, so the Council adjourned. E.J. Hooper acted as town clerk in the absence of Mr. Embury, who is still very ill.

—Perry & Co. have a car of 500 bushels of Minnesota Southern Sweet Ensilage Corn to arrive to-day. They will sell it for less money than it can be laid here for, from Toronto, in small lots. Call and get some, $1 per bushel, usual price, $1.25 and $1.50.

—Messrs Carscallen & Bro. have procured a large stock of beautiful wall papers and window curtains, which they are offering at extreemly low prices. Their establishment is at the corner of Mill and Centre streets, and parties wishing to decorate their walls will be repaid by inspecting the wall paper display of this enterprising firm. They assure us that they are selling papers for less than any other house in town. adv.

—Mr. Samuel K. Miller of Ernesttown is very low and his life is despaired of. His physicians have pronounced his case hopeless. Mr. Miller has been an active worker all his life, and it is said that overwork has much to do with his present condition. While there is life there is hope, and Mr. Miller's many friends still cling to the hope of seeing him around again.

—Luke A. Carscallen is engaged in another bout with the L. & A. Division Grange. This time he has tackled the grain committee and has sued them for the modest sum of twelve thousand dollars. The action will be tried at the Belleville assizes which open on Monday, April 22nd. S. H. Blake Q. C. is Mr Carscallen's solicitor and a red hot fight is looked for. If "sticktoativiness" will win, Luke is sure to get there.

—The rumor is again revived that Gilbert Bogart will be superannuated, and that Uriah Wilson will be made postmaster here. Doubtless Uriah would prefer taking a comfortable position at a fat salary rather than again face the electors, but a little bird tells us that Uriah can't have the postmastership even if he wants it. Gilbert Bogart has served his country for twenty-seven years and has done it well. As he is still capable and willing to do the work, it would be an outrage to oust him for the sake of making room for a man afraid to meet the justly indignant elector-ate.

TO THE LADIES,

There are a great many things that save labor and make home a happy place. Now, there is no such thing as a person being good-natured and pleasant unless they have a comfortable bed to sleep on, and as house-cleaning time is drawing near, with all its change and hard work that must be done, this will be the time when the good man of the house will be wondering where his Sunday boots have gone. Now give him a surprise by purchasing one of my Adjustable Spring Bed Bottoms, and if he does not be good-natured while you are house-cleaning there is no help for him. As we are very busy and cannot call on all, you can order by mail, giving width of bed, and we will deliver them. Beware of imitations, as there are other parties selling what they claim to be a head-raise spring bed bottom. Be sure that my name is on each bottom, as every one of our manufacture is guaranteed. We are selling a $7 spring bed for $5.50, and a $6 bed for $4.50.

THE RACES.

RAIN CAUSES A POSTPONEMENT.

Wednesday's Races Adjourned Until Thursday.—Good Sport.

On Tuesday night everything looked favorable for fair weather for the foflowing day, but during the night one of the heaviest rainstorms of the season set in and lasted up until nearly noon on Wednesday. All through the day showers kept falling so that it was out of the question to start a race.

Yesterday, however, broke clear and fair; the sun shone bright and warm and encouraged the committee to such an extent that they decided to hold the races yesterday and to day. Punctually at three o'clock the following programme was started:

Named Race.—R. H. Potter, Napanee, br g Little Fred; W. W. Reid, Shannonville, b m Bay Mag; W. Hatch, Napanee, ch m Maggie H.; T. Stewart, Deseronto, b m I. X. L.; H. G. Milling, Napanee, gr g Jim Barber.

2.40 Class—Trotters.—S. Clark, Picton, br m Goldie. A. Church, Kingston, g. g. Little Rock; John Purdy, Kingston, ch g J. B. Park; D. Lake, Belleville, br g Orman; H. G. Milling, Napanee, g g Little Tommy.

Free-For-All—Running. — Wm. Watts, Belleville, blk g Slap Bang; P. McLaughlin, Kingston, ch g Warlock; Allen Wilson, Prescott, b g Cal. Owens; W. J. Carson, Kingston, ch g Bolander.

The first race resulted in a comparatively easy victory for Hugh Milling's "Jim Barber," he taking three straight heats. Time 3.04¼, 3.03 and 3.07. W. Hatch's "Maggie H" second, and Mr. Potter's "Little Fred" third.

The second race was well fought out, no less than five heats being trotted. The Belleville horse, "Orman" did some good square trotting in the first two heats, and succeeded in capturing them both in 2.48 and 2.45 respectively. It was a close race between Milling's "Little Tommy" and Church's "Little Rock," in the first heat the Kingston horse taking second place and the Napanee horse third, but this order was reversed in the second heat. Then came a surprise.

In the third heat Orman went off his feet and dropped so far to the rear that he came nearly being distanced. This heat fell to Little Tommy after a very close finish with Little Rock. Goldie continued to act badly and was at the tail end of the procession the most of the time. In the fourth and fifth heats Little Tommy managed to hold the lead and captured both heats and the race. Time—2.48; 2.45; 2.47 and 2.43¼. The track was very heavy and fast time was impossible.

The free-for-all running was the event of the day and a better race was never seen in this part of Ontario. The first heat Bolander carried eight pounds over weight. The start was a beautiful one and as the four

WATERWORKS.

Now Or Never.

Yesterday M. D. Hanover, C. E., of New York, and F. A. Hinds, C. E., of Watertown, were in consultation with Mr. Northey with a view to buying out his contract with the corporation and at once proceeding with the work of putting in waterworks in this town. Negotiations have gone so far that they will take over the contract provided the town will extend the time for the completion of the works until the first of November next. As we want waterworks we hope the council will not stand in the way of the contract being assigned. It is quite evident that Mr. Northey cannot finish the works by the first of August and it is equally evident that Napanee badly needs better fire protection. True it is that Mr. Northey is liable to a penalty of five dollars a day for non-completion of the works by the time specified in the contract, but the corporation don't want to go to law to recover any penalties. What is wanted is a first-class water supply just as speedily as possible. Messrs. Hanover and Hinds are men of high financial standing and if they guarantee to complete the works by November 1st, they will undoubtedly have the work done by that time. Some of the council are of the opinion that if the time is extended a forfeit ought to be put up. Well! the corporation now have a very substantial forfeit practically within their power. Mr. Northey has expended upwards of $9,000 on the East street works, and that of course can not be removed. Surely this is sufficient security. If the time is extended, and the above-named parties take an assignment from Mr. Northey, they will stand precisely in the same position as he does. The $5-a-day penalty would then apply to them after November 1st, and all the time the corporation would have $9,000 worth of plant as security. In conversing with Messrs. Hanover and Hinds, they assure us that unless the time is extended they will have nothing to do with the matter. That means that we will have to go for another year if not for a much longer period, without adequate fire protection. We cannot afford to do so, and as the extending of the time will not cost the coroporation one cent, we would strongly urge the Council to make the concession asked for.

Wedding Bells.

Miss Maud Rose, sister of the bride, and Miss Hattie Davis, of Kingston, were bridesmaid while little Edith Fraser acted as maid of honor. Mr.

CHANGES IN THE WESTERN.

THE REV. E. N. BAKER TO GO TO PORT HOPE.

Rev. J. B. Clarkson Appointed to Napanee West.

When we announced two weeks ago that Conference had decided to leave Mr. Baker in Napanee for another year, we thought that the matter would not be re-opened. Rev. J. B. Clarkson has been at Port Hope for three years and right ably has he performed his work. This year he was put down for Lindsay, but as Rev. Wm. Williams had only been there for one year his congregation insisted on his coming back again. The President of the Conference, wishing to please all parties, asked the Official Board of the Western Methodist Church, Napanee, to consent to Mr. Baker going to Port Hope and then Mr. Clarkson could be appointed to Napanee West. The Board met last Saturday evening and after very carefully considering the matter decided to give their consent. This was done, not because the Board wanted to lose Mr. Baker, but rather that the work throughout the conference might go smoothly. Owing to the terrible affliction that has befallen President Burwash, the change has not yet been definitely made, but it is expected that Mr. Clarkson will take charge of his work here in about two weeks. Mr. Baker will go to Port Hope when he returns from his European trip. In the meantime, Rev. Mr. Adderson who has been supplying for Mr. Baker so satisfactorily, will remain here until Mr. Clarkson's arrival and will then go to Port Hope. Rev. J. B. Clarkson is one of the ablest men in the Bay of Quinte Conference and stands in the front rank of pulpit orators. While the congregation of the Western deeply deplore the severance of their connection with Mr. Baker, they congratulate themselves on procuring so able a man and such an earnest worker as Mr. Clarkson has proved himself to be.

The Bishop of Ontario confirmed eighty-five candidates in Christ Church, Belleville, on Sunday.

Crops in the southern portion of Russia are in a very bad condition, owing to the hot weather.

Rev. William Henry Beecher, one of the Beecher brothers, of whom Rev. Henry Ward was the most famous, died in Chicago on Sunday, 87 years of age.

Daniel Wilson, of the fourth concession of Tyendinaga, broke his leg recently in three places. He had been engaged lifting a stone, when it fell on him.

While in England the Bishop of Ontari declined the position of Superintendent of Chaplains of Northern Europe, with a cathedral in Paris, but he declined it, preferring to remain in Canada.

A despatch from Dublin says that the fast time was impossible.

The free-for-all running was the event of the day and a better race was never seen in this part of Ontario. The first heat Bolander carried eight pounds over weight. The start was a beautiful one and as the four raced around the back stretch, with Cal. Owens and Warlock neck and neck and Bolander lagging behind, the excitement grew intense. On the second round Bolander began to close up the long gap between himself and the leading horses, and as his rider bent low in his saddle and urged the gallant chestnut to his top speed, a perfect yell went up from the crowd. Steadily, inch by inch, the chestnut gained, and as he turned into the home stretch one blanket would have covered both Owens and Bolander. Down the stretch they came at a mighty clip, and amid the wildest enthusiam Bolander won the heat by a head, Owens second, Slap Bang third and Warlock last.

The second heat was fully as good as the first. Mr. Carson had put Johnnie Ellison on Bolander, as he was just the right weight, and Johnnie rode a beautiful race. Again the start was a good one, and again every horse was pushed for all there was in him. Coming down the home stretch both whip and spur were applied unsparingly, but it was Bolander's day, and he won the heat and race. Time—1.59 and 1.57¼.

NOTES.

The sport was first-class.

No gambling and no drinking allowed on the grounds. With these obuoxious features removed the day was a success.

Hugh Milltng captured two races yesterday, and wore a smile a yard wide.

A large number of ladies were present, and added tone to the proceedings. They enjoyed the ru ing race hugely.

CHAPTER I.

Antony Blake left the office of Rumrill & Co. a good deal disappointed. He was himself a shrewd and intelligent fellow. He had secured the patents on his new invention and was ready to proceed with the manufacture. He had carried the papers, the drawings, his model machine to Rumrill & Co., and they had them in consideration. They now offered him $800 for the whole thing if he would turn it all over to them. He had proposed one and another scheme by which he should go into business as a partner with them. These had been referred by the managing partner to the Mr. Jorkins behind the scene, who was an imaginary person created for the purpose of saying no when the managing partner was ashamed to. Practically all these schemes had been refused, and Antony was now to take the $800 or nothing.

This was not his first experience in such business. He knew by this time that the people who bring things before the public, be they inventions, be they books or be they ideas, generally expect to be well paid for doing so, and he knew that the system of co-operation, which people are hoping for and praying for, was by no means yet established. With some bitterness of feeling, it must be confessed, though he was a good natured fellow enough, he walked down the street of Tamworth considering whether he would take the $800 and be done with it, or whether he would go to Pittsburg and see if there were better chances there.

Antony Blake did not believe in debt, and he knew how to live on a very little money, but for all that he had very little money in store, and he certainly did not have the $10,000 which would be necessary for him if he were to equip a little machine shop of his own and make his own automatic car coupler. But as it happened, he was a person well esteemed in the whole community of Tamworth, as he deserved to be.

I should like to know, however, how much of this esteem he owed to one queer circumstance. While he had to start in life with absolutely no property, it happened that he did hold, as trustee for his mother, some bonds, which he considered worthless, in the second issue of the Cattaraugus and Opelousas Railroad. These bonds had long since been taken off all lists known to brokers, and it was long since any coupons had been paid. Still the Cattaraugus and Opelousas existed, and there were sanguine people, among whom his mother was one, who supposed that at some time payment would be resumed. Antony, being her trustee, had to keep these bonds somewhere, and he had been notified by legal advisers that he must keep them in one of the security vaults which are now established in all the considerable cities. He had hired a modest safe at the Amicable of Tamworth, and at the Amicable you have the facilties of a charming reading room, where are all the new magazines, where you can wash your hands if you need, you can make an appointment with a friend, you can write a note on the Amicable's paper. These facilities are thrown open to you because you have hired, perhaps for only $10 a year, a safe in that bank. Antony had found that here was by far the best club room in Tamworth. In that city they have what is known as the "Strangers' Rest" well developed; you can go in and pay ten cents an hour for all the comforts of a club room, and then go out again. But Antony found that, in the long run, $10 a year was cheap him that the day is fine, or that it is rainy as it may happen, and pass on till you come to another gate and another warder. You tell him that it is fine, or that it is rainy, as before. He also calls you by name, and says that you are looking well, and you enter a second passage. This passage is provided with little catacombs or columbaria, precisely like those under or near the city of Rome, except that these are much smaller and that these catacombs have now no doors, but in the security vaults each catacomb has a little iron door, and these doors are numbered.

You remember, by mnemonic processes known to yourself, what is the number of yours; the number of Antony's was 4 927 You meet in this passage a smiling, gentlemanly friend who also calls you by name, expresses his hope that you are well, and tells you what the weather is. You also tell him. These are not passwords, but they are the civilities of the occasion. You then mention to him, in a whisper, if you please, the number of your box. He affects to remember— does remember, perhaps —and with his key adjusts the lock of your catacomb. But, please to observe, he cannot open the catacomb because he has not your key. Your key has been given to you long since when you hired your catacomb. You then open the catacomb with your key, which you cannot do till he has first turned his key in the lock. In the catacomb you find a long, narrow tin box, unless you should be a very great don. In that case you have a large catacomb and you have a large tin box. But Antony was a very little don, as the reader knews, and he had therefore a box long enough for any coupon bond, but not large enough to contain many.

He drew out his box, thanked the courteous attendant, passed warder No. 2 again, who asked him if all was right, and then in the passage between Nos. 1 and 2 selected a little room like that in which you eat oysters in restaurants of some cities, when it is supposed that you are ashamed to eat oysters and wish to have a separate cell assigned for the purpose. You go into this cell, which you find lighted. There is a little table for you, with a pen and ink and blotting paper and a pair of large scissors. These scissors are there that you may cut off the coupons from your bonds.

Observe with admiration that both the requirements which have been referred to are fulfilled. You are here as lonely as Robinson Crusoe was before Friday came. All your wealth is in your hands; you can do with it what you choose. A minute before this wealth was in a safe which nobody excepting you could open, and a minute hence it will be in that safe again.

On this occasion Antony Blake found some difficulty in opening his box. His key seemed to be out of order; but, being an ingenious person, it happened that he had a little skeleton key with him, and with this he threw open the lock of the box. He saw in a moment that it was not his box. The securities in it were those of the C., K. and W., C., B. and Q., B., C. and D.— securities, many of them, absolutely "gilt edged" in the market of the moment. There were one or two United States bonds, and, in short, if a good fairy had touched his mother's bonds and changed them into bonds of the very best she could not have done better for him than had been done here.

Antony Blake was amazed and dazed. He lifted the bonds out one after another to see by what process of evolution the Cattaraugus and Opelousas had been thus changed, and with a vague feeling that he should find his two fifty dollar notes at the bottom. The fifty dollar notes were not there, but there was a little parcel of five or six manuscript notes tied up with a white ribbon. Antony had no disposition to get at other him to sea in his canoe. Then poor Robinson looked at his retreating island—the island which he had always called a prison—and wished that he might return to it, because it was his home. So poor Antony, who had always despised the Cattaraugus and Opelousas, now wished that he had them in his hands. In point of fact, he put back the box into the cell from which he had taken it, and he went at once to his lawyer cousin. But the lawyer cousin was not in. Antony did not like to tell his queer story to a stranger; he therefore borrowed a hundred dollars from the lawyer cousin's clerk and went that night on the train to Pittsburg.

CHAPTER IV.

This is not one of those stories which torments the reader by refusing to tell him all the writer knows.

Once for all, let the reader understand that the bonds and the letters which Antony Blake found in his box belonged to a very nice girl whose name was Edith Lane. How it happened that they were all in this box shall now be briefly told.

It was some six months before Antony Blake found them that Edith Lane's father called her into his own room. He then explained to her that she was so old that she must learn to take care of her own affairs. "I do not mean," said he, "to turn over to you now the whole of your mother's property, but I do mean to turn over to you so much that you shall not have to come running to me when you want to buy a shoestring and a paper of pins. I have placed in this envelope a number of bonds; I am going to show you how to cut off the coupons from these bonds. You will have to do this twice a year; you will then have to carry these coupons to the Waverley Bank, where I have opened an account for you. When you want money you will write a check on the Waverley Bank, and you will go for the money yourself or send for it. You can do as you please about keeping an account of these things. If I were you I would keep a little cash book, but I shall ask no questions. If you come to me at any time for money I shall then ask questions. But it is a great deal better that you shall learn to take care of your own affairs before I die."

Poor Edith was distressed and pained to hear her father talk of dying. She said as much; she said that she knew nothing about business, and she had a great deal rather go on as they were. But he was flint. He told her that his precise object was to teach her to draw a check and to keep a bank account, and to teach her something of her interest in the community, not to say her duties in the community. He had begun with thirty or forty thousand dollars of her fortune, which he had put into these bonds.

Edith was frightened, and said she did not know where she would keep the bonds, and she was afraid they might be stolen.

"That," said her father, "is the second thing that you are to be taught. You will not keep these bonds; I do not keep mine. I have brought these this morning from my own safe to give them to you. I have ordered the carriage, and I am now going to take you down to what is known as the Amicable Safe Company. I am going to hire a little safe there in your name and you will keep your bonds in that safe. When you want to cut off the coupons you will go down to the Amicable, you will have the safe opened and you will cut off what you need."

This frightened Edith more than ever. She almost cried, but in her distress she referred to an old joke of the family borrowed from "Georgia Sketches." It is the story of a young man whose father was urging him to marry and said to him, "Where would you be if I had not married?" The young fellow replied, between his sobs developed; you can go in and pay ten cents an hour for all the comforts of a club room, and then go out again. But Antony found that, in the long run, $10 a year was cheaper for him then the Strangers' Rest at ten cents an hour, and what I should like to know is whether his standing in that community had not materially risen since the old dons and widows and railroad trustees and other such persons who had their safes there found that he was one of the habitues of the reading room of the Amicable.

He suspected himself that it gave him these advantages, and he was careful not to presume on them. He took care not to sit there writing letters in times when a business man would be at his counting room; he only looked in there at the hours when the most prominent of the dons were there; he took care not to appear to it as the only loafing place which he had. In proportion as he was cautious in these regards the dons began to respect him as one of themselves; that is to say, as a person who did not have to work very hard for his money, and who had in the chamber adjacent the secrets by which a quarterly revenue comes to the initiated, without much cracking of their finger nails or griming of their hands.

On this particular morning Anthony was obliged to break his rule. It was just the hour when he should not ordinarily have gone to the Amicable. It was seldom indeed that he had any occasion to look at his mother's bonds in his safe, for they were as worthless one month as they were another. But to preserve the respectabilities of the place it had been his habit to have his safe opened for him once a quarter—about the 1st of May, August and the corresponding quarters—which he observed to be "coupon quarters" for some very distinguished dons.

He would retire into one of the little cells provided for the occasion, open his box and then carry it back that it might be deposited in his safe again. The last time that he had done this, Anthony had placed two fifty dollar bills in his little tin box, to guard himself from spending them. He knew that he should have enough money for his current expenses besides, and he had not cared to make a permanent investment of this sum. But if he were to go to Pittsburg he must have these two fifties in his pocket, and he walked down to the Amicable, gave the number of his safe, and his box was given to him.

CHAPTER II.

It is possible that there are one or two of the humbler readers of this little story who are not accquainted with the careful machinery of a security safe company, and as the story hinges on that machinery it may be well to explain it. You see you are to have the double combination, patent, absolute security that is given to the largest corporation in the world—say the Bank of England—and at the same time you, who are as poor as Antony Blake was, are to have your own little separate cell in which your own property is kept, and nobody else in the world may interfere with it. All this is arranged by a very ingenious system of policemen, attentive clerks, doorkeepers, gilt pickets of iron, iron floors below and above, so that fire cannot burn your securities nor water drown them, nor theives break in nor rust corrupt them.

The most honorable and virtuous warders are selected by the most ingenious and highly approved competitive examinations. You present yourself at the gate, and you are personally known to the warder, who speaks to you cordially and opens the gate to you, as he would not do if you were one of those unknown loafer who have no safe in the security vault.

You pass through this prison gate joyfully, for you know it is no prison to you; you tell his two fifty dollar notes at the bottom. The fifty dollar notes were not there, but there was a little parcel of five or six manuscript notes tied up with a white ribbon. Antony had no disposition to get at other people's secrets, but he did want to know how these things came into his box, and he looked at their addresses, as he could do without opening them. Three were to Evelyn Haddam. Three were to Fergus MacIntire. Antony had never heard of either of these people. The letters were numbered, and the date of each was written on the envelope. Antony observed that the last two were written on the same day, May 29. "It is a romance, I think," said he, and he thought so because of the ribbon. But clearly the most curious thing in the romance was that the letters were in his box.

CHAPTER III.

If young Blake had gone at once to the head centre of the wonderful combination of warders, guardians, clerks and assistants who made up the hierarchy of the Amicable, this story would never have been written, and the reader would at this moment be seeking other occupation than that he has in hand. "Before a story can be told," says Mr. Anthony Trollope, "there must be a story to tell." All that follows on these pages spring from Mr. Blake's aversion to take the head centre into his confidence, or indeed, any other of the guardians in the hierarchy.

In the first place, he knew none of them personally, though, as has been seen, they all knew him professionally. That is to say, it was the professional business of each of them to know Antony Blake by sight and to see that he always had the box in No. 4,927 when he wanted it and that no one else ever had it, and also that he never had any other box than his own. But all of them had been imported from New York to carry on the Amicable, which was a new enterprise in Tamworth, so that he had not made their acquaintance other than officially. In the second place, as occurred to him now for the first time, he should have gone to the head centre before if he meant to go at all. He should have gone when his little key did not open the bond box. He should not have picked the lock of a box, which, as he now knew, was not his, with his little skeleton key. In the third place, he was not sure whether he should best advance the ends of justice by going to the head centre. He could say that his $100 were not in his box. But here were securities of three or four hundred times as much worth; and, as he well knew, there was not any one outside an idiot asylum who would steal Cattaraugus and Opelousas bonds. It might be that the head centre and some of the others were engaged in a common fraud, of which he had in his hands a little clew. These considerations passed through his mind and determined him, wisely or not, to make no complaint to the head centre till he had taken the advice of a lawyer friend.

Meanwhile his first business was to go to Pittsburg and to get the $100 which he needed for his journey. There was no money in the box, and of course Antony could not have taken it if there had been, seeing it was not his. "Greenbacks," says an eminent legal authority, "are the currency of thieves." But even had Antony been a thief he had no opportunity to steal.

There were the six letters, tied up with the white ribbon. Antony did look at the addresses, as had been said.

But at the moment his only wish was that his despised Cattaraugus and Opelousas bonds were in his hands. He remembered, as he often had remembered before, the pathetic grief of Robinson Crusoe, when the great current of the Orinoco was sweeping rowed from "Georgia Sketches." It is the story of a young man whose father was urging him to marry and said to him: "Where would you be if I had not married?" The young fellow replied, between his sobs, "Yes, dad, but you married mother and I shall have to be put out to a strange gal." Edith said she did not want to be put out to any Amicable Safe Company or any Waverley Bank. She wanted her father to take care of her money and to give her what she wanted to spend.

But he was perfectly firm: the carriage came to the door, and Edith had to go up to put on her hat and sacque and gloves to go down for her first lesson. What she was taught the reader already knows. She was taken through the gates, she was introduced to the attentive warder, and she had assigned to her one of the smallest safes, exactly such a safe as Antony Blake had, and as it happened the number was next to his No. 4,928. The reader now has a partial notion of what mistake had occurred.

In point of fact, about a month before Antony Blake had met his disappointment, it had been so ordered by those minor powers who, under orders, overrule this world, that he and Edith Lane went nearly at the same time to the Amicable. Antony had gone simply to show himself, that he might keep up the reputation which he had acquired as a don among dons. Edith had gone, on her second visit, to cut off some coupons, which she had done successfully, and which she had carried to deposit at her bank. But it had so happened that when she brought back her little box, to place it in her safe, Antony Blake was already in that corridor of the columbarium and was opening his safe to put his box away. The lock made some little obstacle and he had laid his box on the floor that he might have both hands in handling the key. Edith had to wait a moment for the operations to be finished, and, as it happened, she laid her box on the floor as she stood by him, being, in fact, if the reader is curious, putting on her gloves at the same moment. Antony touched his hat to her, stooped, picked up the box and put it into his own safe, without any thought that he had made a transfer. He passed out the door, saluted the warders and was gone. Edith put the other box into her safe, and as the reader sees, the change was completed without a thought from either party.

It was not till Antony Blake was well in Pittsburg, dealing with the various sons of Tubal Cain, who make that city one of the richest and loveliest in the world, that Edith one day ordered the carriage, drove down to the Amicable, took out what she supposed to be her box and found in it Antony's Cattaraugus and Opelousas bonds and his hundred dollars.

Of course Edith knew she had made a mistake, and she instantly supposed, as she usually did, that everything which was wrong was her own fault. This, then, was the first result of her father's training her to business—that she had lost all her own property and had stolen some other property of vastly more value. For the girl knew nothing of the worthlessness of the Cattaraugus and Opelousas, and it was easy for her to see that whereas she had left in her box only thirty or forty thousand dollars worth of bonds, she had under her hands two hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth of the second issue of that unfortunate road.

She did not do what Antony did, however. She took the whole parcel, hundred dollars and all, and put it into her little satchel. She put back the box into her safe, and as quickly as she could escape the eye of the warders, all of whom she thought looked on her with suspicion, as if she were a detected thief already, she rushed to her little coupe and bade William drive her directly home.

Her only thought was to tell her father all that had happened, and to confess that she was a fool.

Of course, this would have been the true thing for her to do; but there was, unfortunately, a delay. Her father was in Chicago for two days, and Satan had all that time to inspire her with other counsels. Now, although Satan might have done his worst before he could make Edith Lane do anything wrong, it was easily in his power to make her do something very foolish. For, as Henry Kingsley well says, when the devil cannot achieve his purposes by sending a knave he does the same by a much easier process and sends a fool. For the more she brooded over the matter the more the poor girl persuaded herself that she had better not, at first, speak to her father. Besides the feeling that she was a fool and had made a horrible mistake there was a little side trouble which increased and increased as she thought of it till it at last became a giant Afrite, destroying all her peace. It was the recollection that she had put in her box the six letters which had been intrusted to her by her cousin Evelyn.

Now this Cousin Evelyn had had a horrible love passage with Fergus McIntire. I have no right to call it disgraceful, though I am very glad that none of my readers was ever so compromised. It was a very bad business, and Evelyn had been pulled out of it only with great tact and difficulty. All the compromising letters had been brought together and should have been burned up. Instead of burning them Evelyn Haddam, when she heard Edith had a safe of her own, had begged her to take care of them, and at her second visit to the safe Edith had put these letters with her bonds. The reader knows what had become of them.

Now this was the only secret which our poor Edith had ever had from her father. She did not want to have these letters brought to light by any investigation which should be made. The poor child instantly fancied herself before a police court as a thief; she fancied the discovery of her box opened by a judge and these letters of Evelyn's and Fergus' read aloud and printed in all the Sunday newspapers. She cried over it; she wrote a note to Evelyn which she destroyed; she wrote another note which she destroyed also, and finally said to herself that she had rather lose all her own property which was in the safe than have any revelation made as to what was in the box. If she could only be sure that whoever had the the bonds would burn those hateful letters, it seemed to her that she should be perfectly happy.

In all this, of course, Edith Lane was quite wrong; but as the reader will see, she was in a false position, which she had stumbled into really from no fault of her own.

Poor Antony Blake is the person who deserves the most consideration and sympathy from the reader. He was most hospitably received by old friends whom he had known at the Polytechnic Institute. He saw all the marvels of gas distribution, of glass making, of ironfounding and, by Mr. Westinghouse's kindness, he was taken through the wonderful machine works from which that exquisite apparatus is produced which preserves every year the lives of I dare not say how many thousand people in this world. He saw some of the Tubal Cains whom he had gone to see, he showed to them the plans of his machine, which were cordially commended. He had one and another suggestion made to him as to the ways for putting it upon the market. But it was clear to him, as it had been in Tamworth, that the destruction of the poor is their poverty and that he was in no way to get any decent return for the very exquisite

STEALING FROM JUGGERNAUT.

A Curious Yarn Told by an Indian Army Officer.

The tale which I am about to relate was told to me many years ago by a distinguished officer of the Madras army. For obvious reasons the names have been altered, but to this day by the camp fires of the great festival held every year is told with bated breath the terrible tale of the jewels of Juggernaut and of the vengeance of the great god.

"Many years ago," said my friend, "I was quartered at Fuzurabad, an important military station about 150 miles from the Madras coast. There were a large number of troops there of all descriptions, and certainly for half the year the life we all led was gay and high enough.

"Unfortunately, at the time I was there gambling and betting were much in vogue, and many men plunged and came to grief over their debts of honor. Of all that gay company nobody was more popular and better liked by both men and women than young Fitzroy; but, unfortunately, he lost money at the races, tried to recover himself at the whist table, but failed, got into the hands of the Mawarees, and got deeper and deeper into the mire of debt. You could see by his careworn and troubled expression of face that the poor young fellow was in a real bad way. I was not surprised, then, when one day he came to me and said: 'Major, I'm done for. I'm utterly broke. I can't get any more money in the bazaar, and they'll run me in unless I can get away for a bit. I must get to England and see if I can raise the wind there, but goodness knows,' said the young fellow bitterly, 'how I can dare ask my poor old governor. Major,' continued he, 'I must get away; it's simply killing me. You were a great friend of my father, and promised to help me. I wish I had stuck to your advice, but it's too late now. Will you come away with me? Give out that we have taken ten days' leave for some shooting, and see me down to the coast. If I go off alone I shall be stopped by those cursed Mawarees.'

"After some hesitation I agreed. He sent in his application for leave to Europe on private affairs, and I gave out that I was going on a ten days' shooting expedition. A week later, with a couple of tongas, we had started on our long and wearying journey to the coast, where my poor young friend hoped to pick up a steamer to take him to Europe. On the second day out we met crowds of people tramping along—men, women, and children—and the next day still greater crowds. In reply to our inquiries we were told that they were returning from the great festival of Juggernaut held at Puri, now only some three days' journey from where we were. The tonga wallah kept us interested with a graphic description of the festival and of the great god, which was especially remarkable for the wonderful jewels it possessed—two emerald eyes of inestimable value, its lips formed of the finest rubies in the world, and a necklace of priceless pearls.

The sun was sinking as we neared the town of Puri, and we could see the pinnacles of the temples rise above the trees which surrounded the place. Half a mile the other side of the town stood the Travellers' Bungalow, where we intended putting up for the night. During the last twenty-four hours my young companion had kept silence, and was moody and almost sullen whenever I tried to rouse him. A more uncomfortable meal I never ate than the dinner which was served up to us that evening, and I was quite thankful when the poor lad said he was dead beat and would go off to bed. My own room was on the other side

IN GREENLAND.

Dr. Nansen's Trip on Snow-Shoes.

Since Dr. Nansen's return to Denmark he has added very interesting details to the story of his trip across Greenland which was briefly told in the letter he sent to Europe last fall. The fact that his party, after leaving the ship within twelve miles of Umivik, where they expected to begin their land journey, drifted many miles south in the ice and were over three weeks reaching their destination on the coast, shows the immense difficulty of penetrating the ice barrier that the prevailing winds kept constantly packed against the eastern shores of Greenland.

Some of the isolated natives, unaccustomed to the sight of white men, though Capt. Holm's sojourn among them during one winter should have taught them better. Probably no tribe were ever so thoroughly introduced to the public by means of the camera as these natives, of whom numerous photographs appear in Capt. Holm's recent book.

The six men of the Nansen expedition were a spectacle worth seeing as they gained the lofty summit of the inland ice, all tied together with a rope, as though they were climbing the Matterhorn. It was a wise precaution, for the snow concealed not a few gaping crevices in the thick ice, and now and then the fragile bridge gave way under some member of the party. It was heavy sledging in the soft snow of the Arctic summer, but the party, on their snowshoes, dragging five little sledges, made fifty miles in the first twelve days. They were steadily climbing toward the summit of which, as we have learned within the past few years, is higher than any other extensive plateau in the world except those of the Pamir and some parts of Tibet.

The party occupied over two weeks in crossing this almost level expanse of ice, 9,000 feet above the sea. It was now September, and at the enormous height of nearly 3,000 feet above the summit of Mount Washington, it is easy to understand that the Greenland tourists were impeded no longer by soft and yielding snow. The temperature, however, was seldom lower than 20° below zero, but many snow storms and great drifts impeded the progress of the travellers.

At last they reached the eastern slope of the frozen sea, and, hoisting their sails, they found that much of the time it was no longer necessary to haul on the sledge ropes. Often they travelled behind their sledges to hold them back, and rattled down the long slope at a splendid rate. Now and then, however, they were face to face with as once, when they paused on the edge of a great crevice which seemed like the mouth of a bottomless abyss. They had other narrow escapes, and once nearly lost their lives through the breaking of a snow bridge. Earlier travellers on the inland ice of Greenland have found that the need of making long detours to get around crevices was one of the greatest obstacles in their way.

At last the fiords of the western coast were reached. In forty days the little party had travelled 300 miles from sea to sea. We do not yet know what scientific value attaches to this expedition; but it is likely to add interesting facts to our knowledge of this stupendous ice mass, which, moving very slowly towards the coasts, finds some outlet for its accumulations through the fiords. Contemplating this tremendous ice movement, it is not difficult to believe that we see in the Greenland of to-day the conditions that, in a past geological age, tore great boulders of trap from the [illegible] rocks.

for putting it upon the market. But it was clear to him, as it had been in Tamworth, that the destruction of the poor is their poverty and that he was in no way to get any decent return for the very exquisite contrivance which everybody admitted he had in hand, unless he himself could invest $10,000 or $15,000 in the complicated machinery which was necessary for producing it.

A Philanthropist's First Bargain.

The late Mr. John Rylands, the Manchester cotton spinner, who bequeathed $25,000 to the Balla Independent College, would often humorously narrate the history of his first bargain. One day, soon after he had left school, in passing through a street of St. Helen's his eye was caught by an auctioneer's placard announcing the sale of the stock-in-trade belonging to the father of one of his school fellows. He went to see what was going on ; and, as he had saved a little pocket money, he bid for one of the lots, a drawer full of trinkets, which was knocked down to him at a low price. These on reaching home, he found to consist of different pieces of jewellery, much tarnished and carroded. He pulled them to pieces, cleaned and polished them, and sold them separately realizing a good profit. A former nurse of Mrs. Ryland's heard of the lad's successful purchase, and being herself with her family very handy at the loom, said to him, "Supposing, Master John, you spend this money in a little yarn, and let us weave it for you." This was done, the calicoes were returned "beautifully woven," were soon sold, and all concerned made a handsome profit. The process was repeated on a continually enlarged scale, for about two years, and the youth who was diligently helping his father, became already a miniature capitalist. At the expiration of this time his oldest brother, Joseph, proposed to join him, and the two lads initiated business on their own account, John undertaking the post of traveller. The father, himself a shrewd and capable man of business, perceived what his sons were doing on their own account, and proposed to join in partnership with them, contributing a larger capital than they could muster. Thus the well-known firm was originated.

Women's Heads and Waists.

The Venus de Medici's head measures around the temples 20½ inches ; allow for the wavy hair a half inch and call it 20 inches. I make the waist 27 inches, but as the figure is bending slightly forward it may vary accordingly as the measure is applied. The neck is 13 inches. A lady friend was so kind as to measure several other ladies for my benefit, and I do not find such a marked difference. The heads are generally larger and the waist smaller, it is true, but take one instance :—Head, 21½ inches ; waist, 24⅜ inches ; neck, 12¾ inches. A young girl of 16 measures 21½ inches head and 24⅜ inches waist. Another lady measured just 20½ inches head. The measures were taken over the waist of the tunic. One would suppose the measures would be less if taken after classical manner, but by some mysterious dispensation of Providence the waist of the modern woman is acknowledged to measure more when untrammeled.

Hard on Early Risers.

Charles Dudley Warner was complaining to one neighbour of another neighbour's donkey, which rose with the lark, but was a poor musician, and woke him up at daylight. "Well," said the friend, "why don't you rise at daylight, as I do ! The donkey doesn't disturbe me." "We see now," said Mr. Warner, "what kind of people get up early in the morning."

ate meal I never ate than the dinner which was served up to us that evening, and I was quite thankful when the poor lad said he was dead beat and would go off to bed. My own room was on the other side of the bungalow, and I took my pipe and sat smoking on the veranda. The moon was just rising, when I thought I saw the figure of a European stealing along the wall of the compound. Strange, I thought, and wondered what other European could be here at the same time. An idea struck me, and I went across to my companion's room. There was nobody in it ; the bed was undisturbed. I threw down my pipe and rushed out into the moonlight.

"A few second later I was out in the road, and turned instinctively in the direction of the town. Running down the road, I soon came to a sandy lane, which went outside the village walls in the direction of the temples, their pinnacles standing out clear and distinct in the moonligh . In the distance I thought I saw the figure of my poor lad, but soon the turnings and twistings of the lane, with its thick cactus hedges on each side, shut him out from my view. In a few minutes I was close by the big temple compound. Running up to the wall I looked over, and this is what I saw : An enormous courtyard of paved stone, on which were lying a number of priests, their white garments wrapped around their heads and bodies. In the background was placed temple after temple, but in the centre stood one solitary shrine raised on three separate flights of steps, and inside I could see the great black god raised on three other smaller flights of colored marble steps. The moonbeams shone directly on the god and lit up the emerald eyes and ruby lips, while the pearl necklace glowed on his huge black bosom. Not a sound was to be heard except some distant tom-toming. The festival was over and Puri had lapsed into solemn silence. To my unutterable horror I saw my companion walking right across the courtyard.

"Not a living creature moved, until a pariah dog rose up from near the wall, gave one howl, and then slunk away and crouched down again. Still no one stirred. My tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. I dared not shout even if I could have raised my voise. A ghastly horror took hold of me as the idea struck me that in his madness my poor friend intended to save his honour in the greater dishonor of robbing the idol. Speechless I saw him mount step after step, and the next moment I saw him enter the sacred shrine and cross the threshhold which no other foot but that of the Brahmin has ever passed. Nine steps led up to the god—one, two, three, four, five, six. He paused. I tried to shout, but no sound would come. He raised his hand as if to tear off the pearl necklace. It was still above his reach. His foot then touched the seventh. Can I ever forget the sight ? In the moonlight flashed out two arms covered with a hundred—nay, two hundred—daggers and clasped the daring youth to the black god's breast. At the same moment the sound of a gong broke the stillness of the night, and in one moment the priests had cast off their coverings and were rushing to the shrine. Two minutes later I saw the amazed and horrified priests carrying out the lifeless body of the dishonored Englishman, and I turned and fled."

Princess of Wales.

It takes the Princess of Wales two hours to dress every day. Despite her increase in years, there are courtiers who declare that she looks handsomer than when she first arrived in England, and they take as the reason the fact that the style of dress suits her so much better than what is now considered the dowdy dress of a quarter of a century ago. Nobody knows where the Princess gets her gowns from. It is generally supposed that her maid makes them from patterns supplied. However, the Princess cannot pose as a leader of fashion, except to women of a certain age. For instance, she cannot wear the gaudy flower-crowned hats that are coming into season this spring, and yet these hats will be what is known as "fashionable" nevertheless. Who makes those pretty fringes ? Some say that her barber shifts his lodgings every week. Others declare that this hair-dresser supplies the material and that a maid makes it up. Really the Princess of Wales has very little hair. It amounts to nothing more than what women know as a "wisp." At Sandringham there is a room just like a huge hatter's shop. All around it are little receptacles, varied by pier glasses, and these receptacles contain the hats and bonnets of the Princess. When she is at nome she wears two or three different hats every day, but she always wears a bonnet when out visiting. For a princess her bonnets should not be considered extravagant. She generally gives about $7.50 for a hat or bonnet, not at all an extravagant price.

Old Bank Notes.

The oldest bank notes are the "flying money," or convenient money," first issued in China 2697 B. C. Originally these notes were issued by the Treasury, but experience dictated a change to the banks under Government inspection and control. A writer in a provincial paper says that the early Chinese bills were in all essentials similar to the modern bank notes, bearing the name of the bank, date of issue, the number of the note, the signature of the official issuing it, indications of its value in figures, in words, and in the pictorial representation in coins or heaps of coins equal in amount to its face value, and a notice of the pains and penalties of counterfeiting. Over and above all was a laconic exhortation of industry and thrift : "Produce all you can ; spend with economy." The notes were printed in blue ink on paper made from the fibre of the mulberry tree. One issued in 1339 B. C. is still carefully preserved in the Asiatic Museum at St. Petersburg.

Well, partly ; but I was thinking of the cozy little room we will fix up for mother after we return from our wedding trip.

THE BALLINGTON GHOST.

When it was known that the Welfords had purchased "the old Ballington place" and would move into the great house which had been standing empty for years, there was head-making in the community, and more than one lady was heard to say, "Well, I'm not superstitious, but I'd hate to live in that house."

The Ballingtons had, for several generations been one of the wealthiest families in the neighborhood, and it had been a part of the family policy to marry wealth. It was generally understood that the marriage of the last representative of the name—or rather the last one who had reached man's estate, for he had a little son—had been founded on this consideration, and had been of his father's making rather than his own.

His young wife, a pale, quiet, dreamy-eyed lady, never made any effort to cultivate friendly relations with her neighbors. She returned the calls which she received, but her visits were always brief and formal and her conversation confined to the more elegant commonplaces. It was remarked by those who visited her, that she always received them in a loose white wrapper, in summer, made of muslin or some light wool material; in winter of cashmere or flannel trimmed with velvet or satin.

Though she was never heard to complain of invalidism, and she was always scrupulously neat—even elegant—in her attire, she always presented the appearance or at least suggested the idea, of having just arisen from some place of invalid-like lounging. She had two children, a boy, a sturdy little chap much like his father, who carried the child with him everywhere he went, as soon as he was large enough to take out of the house so much, and a little girl, the miniature of her mother, and like her, always clad in white.

It was rumored that the conjugal affection existing between Bernard Ballington and his wife was not very strong, and that the poor lady did not receive the kindest treatment from her husband. Certain it was he had seemed moody and restless ever since his marriage, and there seemed some truth in the assertion of the gossips that his affection was centered on his boy. The mother was left to console herself with her little girl, of whom she seemed very fond, in a listless sort of a way.

When this child was two years old she sickened and died. After this, the mother looked paler and more dreamy than ever, and it was averred, by the ever-busy gossips that her husband gave her not a particle of sympathy in her bereavement. Within a few months she, too, died, suddenly and mysteriously. This event caused no slight sensation in the neighborhood, and it was whispered by some that the poor lady died of poisoning; by others, that she was addicted to the opium habit and her death had ensued from an overdose of the drug.

Whether the one or the othor of these reports was true, no one ever knew. The family physician, in learned terms, gave an explanation of her death which the sensation-loving utterly refused to believe.

Immediately after the funeral, Bernard Ballington left for parts unknown, taking with him his little son, and report said he had another companion in the person of a beautiful and fascinating lady of a neighboring city.

Since then until the purchase of the Ballington place by Mr. Welford, through Mr. Ballington's agent, the house had been unin habited; but rumor declared that a nocturnal visitant, clad in a long white robe, was frequently seen wandering about the [illegible] slowly moving its hands up and down answered his wife, "and perhaps it would be better for some one to be at the old place to-night, to see that nothing is disturbed."

And you think you won't be afraid of the ghost, with nobody here but Mollie and the children?" laughed Mr. Welford.

"I am not at all afraid of the ghost. I think we have already changed the interior of the house so much that she would fear to enter it; and besides I don't think ghosts ever care to visit persons of my temperament," replied Mrs. Welford.

"No, I don't think they do," answered Mr. Welford, looking at his handsome blooming wife, and mentally congratulating himself that few women were so "smart" and independent as she.

The horses were soon brought out and hitched to the wagon, and the father and sons were speeding off over the crisp snow which sparkled in the bright moonlight.

By ten o'clock the inmates of the Ballington house were snugly ensconced in bed. Mollie the cook, was not so courageous as Mrs. Welford and insisted so earnestly that she, Mrs. Welford and the three little girls all sleep in the same room, that such an arrangement was made.

Mrs. Welford had slept she knew not how long, when she was roused, she fancied, by a step coming slowly down the stairs which led up from the hall. It was a heavy light step, if so paradoxical a description might be given, a lingering, languid, and withal, stealthy tread. The steps came nearer and presently the door was pushed noiselessly open and a white-robed female figure glided into the room. Terror-bound and unable to move Mrs. Welford lay and watched it. It passed slowly up and down the room, moving its hands up and down and uttering dismal, sepulchral moans. It approached the trundle-bed in which two of the children were sleeping. With horror the agonized mother, still unable to move a muscle or utter a sound, gazed upon the ghoulish creature as it bent over her darlings. It breathed upon their faces and suddenly the change of death came over them. There they lay upturned in the bright moonlight, pale and rigid with eyes as blankly staring as those of her who had breathed upon them.

The destroyer turned from them and resumed her pacing up and down the room, tossing up and catching something which looked like a ball of coagulated blood.

Watching her with the fascination of horror as she moved about, Mrs Welford observed that her hands were peculiar, round, fingerless members, like nothing else in the world so much as waffles. At length, as she continued her movements in the moonlight, which seemed to grow brighter and still more supernaturally bright, Mrs. Welford noticed that the thing which she first thought to be a ball of blood now appeared to be a pickled Indian peach, such as had been on the table for supper. Whatever it was, the horrible apparition dropped it and slowly approached the bed where the terrified woman lay. She, or it, bent over her and clasped its clammy, waffle-shaped hands about her throat. Just at that moment the child who lay beside her cried out and pulled at her arm, and Mrs. Welford started up, her brow covered with cold perspiration. She glanced about the room. A patch of moonlight was still shimmering on the floor, but not so bright as it had appeared a few moments before, and the ghostly visitant had vanished.

"Mamma," cried the child, "I am sick and my head aches, and I want a drink of water."

Mrs. Welford rose and hastily lit a lamp There lay her two children in the trundle bed, sleeping sweetly, the rosy flush of life

BESIEGED BY SIOUX.

The Thrilling Experience of Some Black Hill Miners During the Gold Fever of '76.

"In the summer of '76, when the Black Hills' excitement first began in real earnest," said Mr. Coats, to a reporter of the Chicago Times, "I was the owner of a fine farm in northwestern Nebraska and in addition was doing a good business as a surveyor. One of my neighbors, named Bell, was an old California miner. He at once became infatuated with the idea of going to the new El Dorado, and I, too, soon caught the fever. Against the advice of my wife and friends, and even against my own better judgment, I determined to seek a fortune in the hills. Hastily arranging my affairs I set out, accompanied by Bell. We made our way by steamboat to Fort Pierre, where we joined a heavily armed company of forty gold hunters.

"The journey to the foothills was without incident, although the country was alive with murderous Sioux. We reached a camp on Spring creek in the southern hills the 20th of July, where we found fifty others already ahead of us. The first comers had staked out claims and built a very strong fortress upon a rocky knoll. They were so harassed by the Indians that they scarcely dared venture outside their fort. Being reinforced by our company they felt able to defy the redskins and determined to begin active mining operations. Yet so pressing was the danger that the entire company was divided into four equal parts which were to alternate week about in the various labors. The first division was to hunt at a safe distance from the fort. This was an important duty, for our only provisions were the game brought in by the hunters. Only a small supply of food had been brought from civilization, and of course there were no means of getting more.

"The second division did garrison duty at the fort; the remaining half of the party worked the mines; that is, one-half of the squad acted as sentinels while the others plied pick and shovel. It was very slow, very hard work. In the hills all the places mines are in dry gulches instead of beside the streams, as in California. All the "pay-dirt" had to be wheeled a quarter of a mile to get to water. Our best exertions only yielded $4 or $5 per man per day. Divide this amount with the three others who were guarding or hunting for the miner and you can see that no one had much prospect of getting rich.

"Bell and I were thoroughly disgusted in less than a week. We had come to make money and not to toil and starve for a pittance that a section-hand would scorn. Wonderful stories were told of the richness of the mines on French creek, twelve miles south. There we determined to go, though we were told it would be equivalent to walking into our graves. In all that company of fearless pioneers not one would entertain the idea of accompanying us for a moment.

"Nothing would daunt us, however, and waiting for a dark night, so as to escape observation by prowling Indians, we placed the scantiest of outfits on a mule and set out, after having secured careful directions from an old scout who was thoroughly acquainted with the country.

We reached French creek safely at daybreak after an exhausting march in the darkness and over the fearfully rough hills. After a scanty breakfast we moved up the creek a short distance and came to a place Bell said had a good appearance. I mounted guard while Bell sank a prospect hole. He found bed rock at a depth of two feet. Scraping up a panful of dirt he took it to the creek, and to our infinite delight it

Ballington's agent, the house had been unhabited; but rumor declared that a noc turnal visitant, clad in a long white robe, was frequently seen wandering about the ... slowly moving its hands up and down ... unprecedented vent to the most piteous and fal... moans. This it was which led so ... unsuperstitious ladies to declare a prejudice against living in the Ballington house. But Mrs. Welford was not only unsuperstitious, but unprejudiced also, and being an affectionate and dutiful spouse, and having the utmost confidence in the financial sagacity of her husband, when he represented to her that the purchase of the Ballington property would be a good investment, its unpopularity having brought the price down very low, she consented without demur to take up her abode in the "haunted house."

The Welfords took possession of their new home in midwinter, Mr. Welford, the energetic, declaring that he did not want "a moving scrape" on hand in the spring at the time when he ought to be pushing the farm work. He would take time by the forelock, and spend the remainder of the winter in getting everything in readiness for vigorous work during the "cropping season." The day on which the ever-to be dreaded moving took place was clear but cold, and the earth was covered with a glittering sheet of snow.

The great old house was dank and dratty, and discomfort reigned supreme.

But by dint of unremitting labor, tugging, tacking, hammering, arranging and "fixing" generally, by evening several carpets were put down, curtains hung, furniture arranged and cheerful fires burning in sitting-room, dining-room and kitchen. Still, it was not until almost eight o'clock that the family, very tired and very hungry, seated themselves around a bountifully spread supper table. Said Mrs. Welford, "I was determined to have something good for supper as we had to put up with a cold dinner."

Something good! She did have "something good" indeed. It was such a supper as might have made a dyspeptic shudder. There were hot biscuits, fragrant coffee, waffles, light and hot, with tender, crisp, curled edges, the loveliest of golden butter and the richest of cream, scarcely the worse for having been shaken and frozen on the way, cold boiled "old ham," the best of fried sausage, clear, delicate-flavored honey, fried potatoes, pickled pig's feet and sweet-pickled "Indian" peaches.

"This is something like comfort," said Mr. Welford, as, after a hastily said "grace" he conveyed to his plate a steaming forkful of waffles. "This does not look much like a place that a ghost would care to come to," he added, glancing over the well-filled table and around the cozy room.

"I don't think her ghostship will intrude upon us," said his wife, smilingly.

"I aint afraid of no ghost," asserted Fred, the second hopeful son, cutting a "pat" of sausage in two and cramming half of it into his mouth.

They really did not look like persons with whom a ghostly personage could have much in common, that healthy, ruddy faced family, with their faces, rendered still more ruddy by the day's exposure to cold and the subsequent basking by the glowing fire. The family consisted of the father, mother and five children—two boys, aged respectively twelve and fourteen, and three little girls.

After supper Mr. Welford said to his wife, "I believe I'll just take the boys and go back to the old place and stay all night. We can make it, easy, by ten o'clock, and in the morning we can get up and load up the things that are left there, and be back here in time for breakfast, if you don't get it too early; and I don't think you will feel much like rising very early."

"No, I shall not be anxious to rise early, and my head aches, and I want a drink of water."

Mrs. Welford rose and hastily lit a lamp There lay her two children in the trundle bed, sleeping sweetly, the rosy flush of life and health upon their cheeks, and Mollie was snoring away comfortably, on the lounge at the other side of the room.

For the first time in her life, since childhood, Mrs. Welford felt a nervous fear of going into a room alone, and roused Mollie to go with her to get the water for the child.

Her dream had been so horrid, so vivid, she was trembling in every limb; and it was not until she had related it to her husband, and laughed over it at the cheerful breakfast table, that she was able to shake off the disagreeable impression it left upon her.

The Ballington ghost has never been seen since the Welfords took possession of the place; but Mrs. Welford says that she thinks she could get up a supper which, if liberally partaken of, might conjure it up, at any time.—[Good Housekeeping.

'Twouldn't Work.

He was a plain, farmer-like man, and he was in charge of a young man with his head bound up and otherwise injured. After one of his trips to the water cooler to give his patient a drink, one of the passengers inquired:

"That young man met with an accident?"

"That's exactly what he met with, sir. Gosh durn him!"

"Relation o'yours?"

"My second oldest boy, Bill. I'm taking him home to be nursed up. Liked to have had his empty head knocked off."

"Careless, eh? How was it?"

"Wall, a young feller up our way tumbled off a train on this road and broke a leg and got $2 000 damages. It sort o'give our Bill sunthin' to think of, and after getting a good ready he starts out to go up to Rochester. What does he do after riding a ways, but stick his noodle out of the window, and purty soon along comes a switch board and flattens his face until you can play marbles on it. He's mending fast, but he's going to carry a phiz around with him which'll scare a yaller pup out of a year's growth."

"And the company refuses to come down?"

"Of course it does. Bill went agin the rules and regulations, and he's left. If he'd had his head knocked off I might have got a few hundred on a compromise, but as it is he'll have to grin and bear it. That is if his grinner wasn't smashed all to flinder along with his nose. Hey, Bill, how you feeling now?"

"Purty weak, father."

"Shouldn't wonder, but its all right. Boy of your age, who hain't got no'hin' but marsh hay in his head, deserves no pity. Jist lay back and take it easy and reflect on whether you are going to hire out to a dime museum or hunt a cave in the hills."—[N. Y. Sun.

One Thing Forgotten.

Pfeiffer: "Are you sure you brought everything we need?" Heoffer: "Yes, I've a dozen bottles of wine, the same amount of beer, a pint of brandy, a whole lot of things to eat, and games of all kinds." Pfeiffer: "And the fishing tackle?" Heoffer: "No, by George, I forgot that. Well, that doesn't matter."

A Sad Case.

Mrs. Jones (who is reading the morning paper)—A prominent coal dealer was paralyzed in his office last week.

Mr. Jones—Paralyzed, was he? Probably the driver forgot to weigh himself before he drove off with 1,600 pounds of coal.

Bell said had a good appearance. I mounted guard while Bell sank a prospect hole. He found bed rock at a depth of two feet. Scraping up a panful of dirt he took it to the creek, and to our infinite delight it yielded at least $5 in very coarse gold. You can judge the value of our find when I tell you that dirt that will yield 3 cents to the pan, under ordinary circumstances, is worth working. Throwing prudence to the winds we both began to dig and wash, never stopping until dark. We were utterly exhausted by that time and were glad to roll ourselves in our blankets and go to sleep without a morsel of supper.

Next morning while Bell hurried out to shoot something for breakfast, I examined our surroundings. We had stopped just below a point where the creek burst through a narrow cleft in the mountains and made a sheer descent of some twenty feet. At the base of the ledge and almost directly underneath the waterfall I noticed a hole in the rocks that seemed partially lighted from the rear. I could readily enter it by crawling on my hands and knees. I found the hole was the entrance to a passage about twelve feet in length that, after an abrupt turn, ended in an irregular chamber 10x20 feet in its greatest measurements. It was clean and fairly lighted beside the creek above the falls. It was a splendid stronghold, furnished right to our hands. One man could have held it against 100.

"When Bell returned we moved our few effects into the cave and considered ourselves secure. For a week we worked hard together, not even taking ordinary precautions against surprise, so greedy were we for the yellow dust. Looking back at it now it seems nothing less than miraculous that we were not surprised and killed and I can not comprehend how we could be so careless. Our buckskin bags filled rapidly and we were talking one morning just outside our cave of returning to Spring creek to tell of our good fortune when a score of bullets came whizzing from the rocks and trees around us.

Bill was struck in the thigh and I received slight wounds in the leg and arm.

"We darted into our hole with the Indians yelling right behind us. One savage fiend seized me by the heels and had nearly dragged me back in reach of his companions' tomahawks when Bell sent a bullet through his brain. Before I could be caught again I was inside and out of danger. The Indians poured a perfect storm of lead into the mouth of the cave for a time. As we made no sound in reply they concluded we were killed and crowded up to get our scalps. Three of them were good Indians before they could realize that we were not in scalping condition and could get out of range. Then they began their howls and their shooting anew, but their bullets simply flattened against the angle in the wall.

"Finding this useless they began to look for other means of dislodging us. They soon discovered the fissure and began shooting down it with renewed yells. Presently they tried the effect of their fusillade by waving one of their headdresses before the entrance on the end of a pole. As we did not shoot at it they felt certain they had finished us and crowded up to the hole again. It cost the lives of two of them to find out their mistake that time. After this they settled themselves for a regular siege.

"We then had to dress our wounds as best we could and consider our predicament. We were safe from the bullets of the savages, but we had not a mouthful of food nor a drop of water, and our wounds already began to make us thirsty. How we cursed our improvidence then. We would gladly have given all our gold for a single day's rations of food and water. Besides, it was chilly in the cave, even in that August weather, and our wounds were very painful. Our situation was one of hourly increasing horror, while death, frightful and inevitable, loomed in the background.

"All that day we could hear the Indians prowling around outside, but they made no further demonstrations. Toward evening our sufferings from thirst became something awful. We licked the damp stones for moisture. About dark the Indians tried to smoke us out by dropping a great heap of burning wood in front of the entrance from the ledge above. The smoke went straight up, however, instead of coming into the cave. After that they let us alone until next day noon. We were getting weak from hunger, thirst, and loss of blood, and had nearly given up hope.

"It must have been about 1 o'clock when we noticed a little stream of water trickling through the crevice. We tried to shout a prayer of gratitude as we licked up the precious fluid, but our parched throats uttered no sound. Soon the stream increased until we were standing knee deep in cold, spring water. Then we understood that the Indians had damned the creek so as to turn it into the cave. Our previous suffering were nothing to what we now had to endure. We were soon numb with cold and in our weakened condition it required our greatest exertions to keep from sinking down into the water and drowning. How we ever lived though that long afternoon I do not know. We determined to make a dash for our lives as soon as it became dark.

"Fortune favored us in our attempt for a heavy downpour of rain began at sundown and kept up nearly all night. An hour after dark we dropped on our knees and crept out. The water so nearly filled the entrance that we almost strangled. The night was inky black and the heavy storm had driven the besiegers to shelter, so we were not discovered.

"We followed the creek for half a mile and then started out in the direction of Spring creek. Once out of immediate danger nature asserted herself and we both sank utterly exhausted before we had proceeded another mile. Luckily Bell chanced to drop down near a young rabbit which we caught and tore to pieces and devoured while the flesh was yet quivering. This revived us somewhat and after resting a while we got up and struggled on again.

"About noon the next day we crawled into the camp at Spring Creek more dead than alive. Some of the men were just preparing to return to Fort Pierre and I was permitted to stretch my pain racked bones upon the top of a load and in this way reached home. I had a raging fever all the way and was delirious part of the time. I kept my bed for six months afterward and have been disabled by rheumatism ever since

I returned to the hills five years later and have accumulated some property, but for all the wealth of the Black hills I would not again endure the horrors of those two days and nights in the cave"

The Accumulation of Interest.

From the National Economist, Washington, D.C.]

Some conception of the accumulative power of interest, and its effect upon the producing industry of the nation, may be had from the following calculation. Not only does this example show the burden put upon the people through interest, but also the enormous gains to the National banks through their control of the currency, and makes clear the reason of the growing poverty of the industrious masses and the enormous accumulation of wealth in the hands of the speculative few.

This estimate is made from the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1887, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

YOUNG FOLKS.

THE BEACON LIGHT.

"When I was a boy," said old Walter Winwick, "there was no light on yon headland, and many a good boat and ship went to her doom among those rocks.

"I well remember the first time I went to sea. How proud I felt! My uncle owned a fishing boat, and he took me for his 'sea-boy,' to my infinite delight. Grandfather (with whom I lived, for I was an orphan) was pleased and proud too. 'It's in the blood, Watty,' he said to me,—'in the blood! We are all born sailors, and I hope you'll find the sea as good a friend as I've done. If you keep off the rocks, and see that you sail in a well found vessel, and go by your chart, and compass, you'll be all right.'

I did not pay as much attention to grandfather's words as I should have done, for I was young, and my head a bit turned with excitement.

"The old man stood on the shore and watched us sail out from the cove. As we got fully under weigh I waved my cap to him, and he nodded to me.

"I had often been out sailing, of course, before that day; but never 'at sea' as a 'hand'; and you may be sure I was eager to help and prove my skill at pulling ropes, reefing, and steering.

"That first night was all but my last, for a storm came on very suddenly, and it grew so dark we could not see ahead. We tried to make our own harbour, but the villages straggle for miles along shore, and we could not distinguish the lights of East Linga from those of West Linga. Some of the rocks rise in precipices of fearful height; some run out in straggling reefs across the bay. When it is light any man of us can bring a boat safe to land, but in the darkness it is a difficult matter, and in a storm it means daring death. The open sea is to be preferred.

"On the night I speak of it was impossible to remain out, and we made for home with anxious hearts, hoping to steer clear of rocks, yet doubtful of our course.

"Uncle said once, 'Perhaps the old man will think of lighting his beacon on Linga headland. Ah, poor old father! many's the time I've helped him drag the broken timbers to the top of the headland to make a light for them at sea; and many a good boat's crew has blessed him for it. I hope he'll think on't to-night.' I answered that the boys of the village were always ready to lend grandfather a hand in getting up his bonfire. And by and by, as we were peering through the darkness, hearing the roar of the surf upon the rocks, and being confused by the many lights along the bay, we saw—high up on our right—the merry blaze leap towards the lowering clouds, and I shouted hurrah! for grandfather's beacon.

"So we were guided safely to our harbour. Grandfather died at a good old age; and the last thing his eyes looked upon was the new lighthouse on Linga headland, and he said, 'Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace.' He was a devout man, and had been a light among his fellows all his days. He had set an example to those around him, and as I watched him die I thought, if every boy and man would show their light as he had done, many "'Sailing on life's solemn main,

A forlorn and shipwrecked brother
Seeing may take heart again.'

I've tried, in my small way, to follow in his footsteps; and I never look at the lighthouse yonder that I don't think of the good old man and his beacon fire and his exemplary life.

FIGHTING STRENGTH OF THE U. S.

The Weakness of the American Army Shown by the "St. James Gazette."

You have recently drawn much attention to the attempts which the Americans are making to develop a powerful navy, and you have hinted that in a few years an addition may be made to the great potential fighting States of the world. I have passed a good many years in America, and from what I have seen there I have come to the conclusion that you, in company with most Englishmen, entertain much too high an opinion of the possible offensive power of the United States.

Now for one improvised cruiser that the Americans could put on the ocean or the lakes, it is certain that we could put at least twenty and better ones at that. Their "cruisers" would be simply cargo steamers armed and manned anyhow, just as they were during their civil war. The army of 300,000 to 500,000 would be composed of our old friends the "new men with muskets," totally "unamenable to discipline," to whom plenty of good excuses for mutiny would be supplied by the army contractors.

The overgrown republic is always, from differing and jarring interests, naturally disposed to split into halves and quarters, and the "shaking up" which a foreign war would give its rather crazy institutions would be an excellent opportunity for malcontent States to "get loose" from one another. The vast Southern and Western ci devant seceding States have not forgotten what followed the war, or the fact that they have been bled ever since for the benefit of the Northern capitalists and manufacturers who conquered, plundered, and trod them down. Then there is the large and increasing negro population, who feel that the end is not yet, and live in alarm and uncertainty, dreading the final issue, perhaps re-enslavement, perhaps massacre and deportation; anything in such a country and such conditions being on the cards. Again, the agricultural population, two-thirds at least of whom are foreigners from every nation in Europe—Germans preponderating—would not admire being conscripted to fight the English in order to please the politicians and oblige their Irish patrons.

Then the Indians (reinforced by considerable numbers half breeds and "Indian white men" who have married squaws and become affiliated with the tribes or adopted into them) would be very likely—they are all well armed with repeating weapons—to take to the war path, having been mercilessly swindled for the past thirty years or so, in violation of the most solemn treaties. Some people maintain that the cowboys—who, as Gen. Sheridan remarked: "Fight pretty well when they are drunk," and are regular nomads, as averse to discipline as a Kurd or Bedouin—would hold the Indians in check: but this is doubtful. The interests both of cowboys and Indians are identical, as are their pursuits. Both hate the 'Grangers," or agricultural squatters, who continually pour in from the Eastern States, encroach upon and break up cattle runs and reservations, and are a growing danger and menace both to red men and cattle owners. A big foreign war would leave the latter a free hand, and the Grangers might possibly—as they say in Texas—"hear something drop."

The Future of Canada.

[From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, June 5.

The apprehension that the monarchies of Europe felt, a little over a century ago, regarding the establishment of a great republic on this continent was justified. England, with its Canadian possessions, naturally feared for the loyalty of its subjects to the speculative few.

This estimate is made from the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1887, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

This document reports the total number of National banks on October 5, 1887, to be 3,049, and that these banks had out on loan at that time $1,580,000,000.

For banks which discount paper, make short loans, and take all the advantages interest gives, 10 per cent. is not an unreasonable rate. The amount they are officially reported to save out on loan, with interest calculated at ten per cent., and compounded only every ten years, would yield in fifty years an aggregate of $50,560,000,000; which amount is far in excess of the total valuation of the entire property of the whole nation, such total valuation being $44 645 000,000

In one hundred years (which is as nothing in the life of a nation), by compounding only every ten years, the aggregate would reach the incomprehensible amount of $1,617,920,000,000, or nearly forty times the total of all present values—an amount beyond the possibility of any race of people being able to pay or create in a hundred times that length of time.

Do Not Sign Specious Contracts.

It would seem that the Bohemian oat swindle will never come to an end. In the Madison County, Ia, court, ten suits were lately decided in favor of the "innocent purchasers" of the notes. The court held that the notes were given in consideration of a bond executed and delivered to the maker of the notes, and as such were not gambling contracts within the meaning of the statutes. The court denounced the original transaction as a fraud, and said that the notes as between the original parties would have been void, but having been sold to an innocent purchaser before maturity, were protected by the rules of commercial law, and were collectable. The Supreme court has not passed upon any of these cases, though there have been various decisions in the lower courts of this and other states.

There is an easy way not to be taken in by travelling frauds. Buy your goods of regular and well-known firms, who advertise their wares legitimately. But so long as the cupidity of ignorant men exists—men who think themselves smarter than those whose business is fraudulent misrepresentation—we suppose that the courts will have plenty of business to untangle the meshes by which deceit lives and thrives. We have often advised farmers not to sign contracts with men who were not known to respectable business men of the vicinity whose word was known to be good.

Had Lost His Ground.

In Scotland the topic of a sermon or discourse of any kind is called by old-fashioned folk its "ground," or, as they would say, its "grund." An old woman, bustling into kirk rather late, found the preacher had commenced, and, opening her Bible, nudged her next neighbour, with the inquiry, "What's his grund?" "Oh," rejoined the other, who happened to be a brother minister, and therefore a privileged critic, "he's lost his grund long since, and he's just swimming!"

To Encourage Informers.

Over a bridge at Athens, Ga., is the following—"Any person driving over this bridge at a pace faster than a walk shall, if a white man, be fined five dollars, and, if a negro, receive twenty-five lashes, half the penalty to be bestowed on the informer."

old man and his beacon fire and his exemplary life.

"As I stand by the shore and watch the boats go out and in, with merry boys and stalwart men abcard,—as I think on the long voyage of life I've made, and how I've been kept off the rocks by God's spirit,—it has seemed to me that yon beacon on the height is the symbol of that which has been my guiding light. His word, the tower; His spirit, the lamp. And I pray that every boy who launches upon the ocean of life amid the rocks, and storms, and darkness, and wild waves of a troublesome world, may be led safely to their desired haven by that heavenly beacon.

JESSIE M. E. SAXBY.

The Boy Had the Best of it.

The master of a school in a certain village bore the reputation of being a very clever calculator; but upon one occasion he almost forfeited his reputation. The rector of the parish and some friends paid a visit to the school to note the progress of the children. A little rogue of whom no question had been asked, and who had therefore missed the opportunity for distinguishing himself, which he greatly desired, made up his mind to question since he was not questioned, "Master," he said, "will you do me the kindness to answer me something? "Ask whatever you please," replied the master; "you know I always tell you to ask anything you do not know. He who asks makes no mistakes." "My father is three times my age. Will the time ever come when he will be double mine?" "That is not a question," said the master; "it is a joke. To bring that about the clock must stop for him and go on for you.' "But it is quite possible," continued the boy; "I will prove that what I say is true. I am twelve years old; my father is thirty-six. In twelve years I shall be twenty-four and my father forty-eight. Consequently my father, who is now three times my age, will then only be double." The visitors laughed heartily.

Indian Corn as Food.

One of the interesting features of the Paris Exposition is the exhibit of Indian corn and the food products made from it. As yet corn is very little used as food by Europeans, and it is to prove to them that it is both palatable and healthy that this exhibit is made. Boston brown bread, Indian pudding, Johnny cakes, hominy, and the other viands that are familiar to everyone in America, will be dispensed free to all who care to partake, and it is hoped enough of an appetite for the food products of corn will be created to considerably extend the export of corn to Europe. Certainly, if the people of Europe realized the value of corn as food, it would speedily take the place of the bitter black bread and poor wheaten bread that constitutes the chief cereal food of the working classes in some sections of Europe. The exhibit is a very commendable piece of enterprise, both from the standpoint of trade and of increasing the quality and variety of the food of the poorer classes. All hail to the Paris crusade in favor of King Corn.

The apprehension that the monarchies of Europe felt, a little over a century ago, regarding the establishment of a great republic on this continent was justified. England, with its Canadian possessions, naturally feared for the loyalty of its subjects to the north of the United States if this republic were firmly planted. It is a matter of history that the English Government tried, by every effort, to secure a foothold on the southern limits of the original thirteen States, and thus hem in the new republic on all sides; but the gracious Providence which planted the American Republic, as a seed that should in time spread republicanism throughout the world, fostered the institution of American liberty, and has preserved it until this day.

The recent agitation in Canada in favor of commercial union, closer reciprocal relations, and even annexation with the United States, is significant. It is predicted that the triumph of the Liberals in Canada at the pending election would be the triumph of those who favor separation from the Mother Country, and separation would inevitably lead to secession, and next to annexation. So critical is the situation, it is said that Sir John Macdonald shortly expects to visit London and consult with her Majesty's Ministers upon the subject of Canadian relations with the United States.

The building of the Canadian Pacific railroad, at enormous expense to the Imperial and Dominion Governments, the strengthening of the fortresses at Halifax and other points on the Atlantic coast, and the statement that it is the intention of the Imperial authorities to make improvements in the defenses of the Pacific seaboard, all reveal the perturbation of the Home Government as well as of the loyal followers of the Crown in Canada. Meanwhile various questions agitate and divide our Canadian neighbors. Closer relations afforded by the facilities for travel and the cheap rates of transportation have inspired in our neighbors on the north a feeling of kinship and friendship, and have drawn them farther away from the Mother Country. It is inevitable that this relationship, in a social and business way, must continue to grow warmer as the benefits of our republican form of Government are more and more appreciated, and the spirit of unrest which has taken possession of a large part of the Canadian people will increase until the cry for separation will become so general that it must be heard.

It would be indeed singular if, one hundred years after the thirteen colonies had torn themselves loose from the Mother Country, their example should be followed by the remaining British colonies of the American continent. In the event of a revolution in Canada against the Imperial Government, the sympathy and aid of the United States would be manifested for the rebels to such an extent that the triumph of the secessionists would be assured.

A Successful Struggle.

"Charlie stayed pretty late last night, didn't he, Lil?" asked sister Kate next morning.

"Yes," said Lil, sleepily, "we were trying the pigs in clover puzzle till nearly eleven o'clock."

"And did you get the pigs in the pen, Lil?" asked Kate, eagerly.

"No, we didn't; but I got my finger in this solitaire diamond ring."

The Empress Eugenie, moving about England now, attracts very little attention. In Birmingham recently she and her companion, the daughter of the duke di Bassano, and their courier visited a hotel and a restaurant in the town without their identity being suspected. The empress' ebony walking-stick and darkened eyebrows are noticeable features. She seems in excellent spirits.

Last year the Dominion Government divided up $82, 929.54 among the lawyers who supported them. This was for so called legal services although there is a Minister of Justice and his expensive department to look after the legal affairs of the government. The farmers are heavily taxed in order to raise money to hand over to Government favorites. Uriah Wilson voted to pass the above. What do the yeomanry of Lennox think about it :

Our Camden correspondent writes to say that on Tuesday "a few of the faithful" met to nominate a candidate to fill the vacancy in the Camden council caused by the death of the late Edward Hinch. W. J. Dulmage was nominated and declared elected. No sooner was the election over with than it was discovered that Mr. Dulmage was one of the bondsmen of the treasurer of the township and therefor disqualified. His election is of course void. Another election will have to be held and of course this means additionol expense to the ratepayers of that long suffering municipality. Surely such bungling will not much longer be put up with.

NUMBER 6 AND SECTION 40.

No. 6 of the resolutions adopted by the anti-Jesuit Convention reads as follows :

6. We record our approval of our national system of public schools in this Province, and we insist that every ratepayer should be deemed a support of the public school, unless he himself of his own free will signifies his desire to be ranked as a supporter of separate schools, and that the act should be so amended as to be explicit on this point.

Section 40 of the Separate Schools Act R. S. O., 1887, reads as follows:

40. Every person paying rate, whether as proprietor or tenant, who, by himself or his agent, on or before the first day of March in any year, gives to the clerk of the municipality notice in writing that he is a Roman Catholic and a supporter of a separate school situated in a municipality, or in a municipality contiguous thereto, shall be exempted from the payment of all rates imposed for the support of public schools and of public school libraries, or for the purchase of land for the erection of buildings for public school purposes, within the city, town, incorporated village or section in which he resides, for the then current year, and every subsequent year thereafter, while he continues a supporter of a separate school; and the notice shall not be required to be renewed annually.

Now in the making up of the collector's roll every person whose name appears on the assessment roll for real or personal property or taxable income is put down to pay school rates in proportion to the amount of his assessed value of property or taxable income. There is no escape excepting in the case of certain exemptions, and unless a man is at his own request put down as a supporter of separate schools, he is put down as a supporter of public schools. The law is now what the anti-Jesuit Convention would have it, and no words can make it more explicit than it now is.

The following letter from the old country which was published in the Mail on Saturday shows the manner in which Hon. Mackenzie Bowell endeavored to humbug the Oarnge brethern of the old country. He was dealing with men however, who looked at the question as a matter of principal and the thin disguise with which he endeavored to cover his acts was easily seen through. The letter reads:

Sir,—The Orange brethern have had their minds greatly disturbed by the report that the Government of the Dominion of Canada had allowed the Pope to settle a question of endowment of the infamous Jesuite order by refusing to disallow the bill for settling their estates in the Province of Quebec, I wrote for an explanation to Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, M. P., and got a full letter of explanation as to this question being one of politics and constitutionality rather than of morality or religion. I read this letter to the Grand Lodge of the Metropolitan Province on the third instant at Newport, Isle of Wright. The brethren were astonished that Orangemen supported this bill, and on the ground that all men are equal before the law in Canada. They thought they saw a violation of that principle, as their is no State Church in Canada, and they wondered at Jesuits, the treason mongers of the world, being put on a level with loyal Protestants, Orangemen and Wesleyans, at the bidding of the Pope of Rome, and they cannot see the use of a Dominion Parliament if it must register all such decrees of Provincial Legislature. With this they do not desire to intefere, but they unanimously passed the following resloution to be sent on to Grand Lodge, and they deputed me to communicate their views to the brethren in Ontario through the Toronto Mail.

I am, dear sir,
Yours very truly
S. G. Potter, D.D.,
Immediate Grand Chaplain.

The following is the resolution :—The question of the position of the Jesuit Order in Canada having been brought forward by Bro. the Rev. S. G. Potter, D. D., I. G. C., this provincial Grand Lodge of the Metropolitan Province expresses its hearty sympathy with the brethren in Canada in their opposition to the Jesuit Order in that portion of Her Majesty's dominions ; and, with due regard to the constitutional arrangements in the Government of the Dominion and the several Provincfal Legislatures, desires to express its opinion that the principals of the Act of Settlement of 1687, and the Act of the British Parliment of 1829, commonly called "The Roman Catholic Emacipation Act," and the general principals of the constitution of "this Protestant kingdom," ought to be strictly adhered to in all portions of the Sovereign's dominions and dependencies in order to safely guard the liberties of all her Majesty's subjects.

As the high priest and chief priest were their natural leaders, one might think that the Jews would have been perfectly justified in following their guidence, but we find that these men were selfish and deceitful, they crucified the Prince of Life to sustain own power among the people. (We might be deceived likewise.) In 1689 there were only "thirteen" young men who dared to shut the gates of Derry in the face of the Tyrant James II., and his ally the Pope of Rome. Just two hundred years later in 1889 only thirteen members of the Dominion Parliament had backbone enough to vote against an unjust act (grievously oppressing the minority in Quebec) though the majority bowed their knee in humble submission at the instance of Sir John. We hope and trust that noble thirteen will be as successful in the present instance as in 1689.

The writer seems to think that the services rendered by his jaw might be compared to those rendered by a gatling gun, but I feel confident the people can distinguish the bray of a donkey from the report of a gatling gun. He is quite candid in admitting that there are "rags, tags etc.," belonging to both political parties. I infer from his remarks that Sir John has been in the habit of buying up such strings and that there is no hope of an advance in "such stock" the old price will do. I think when election comes the people will decide that wax dolls, figure heads and automata need not apply.

Spencer Hill.

Some time ago, I noticed a few items in your newsy paper from a Spencer Hill correspondent, and later there has popped up a correspondent for the Beaver, calling himself "Sing Song Joe."

Now dear sir, their is a good deal of inquiry where Spencer Hill is, and why it is called Spencer Hill. Ninety-two years ago there lived a young man near Napanee by the name of James Spencer, and like the young men of this day, he fell in love and was married to a daughter of Jacob Fretz, Esq, and they started life together on lot six in the forth concession of Richmond. On this lot is a beautiful hill and there they pitched their tent. It required a strong arm and a firm true heart to succeed in those olden days when every field had to be chopped over before the forrest would give place to the meadow, stern old days then, and the latter half of the century is wearing the linen the first half wove. What a unique honeynoon their's must have been in a log shanty around which the wolves cried to the moon at night, and their only visitor's being neighbors living five miles away. But James Spencer and his wife are dead, and in a few years time will have covered them over with that mantle which forever veils commers place lives; and yet their lives were not altogether ordinary, they were two of the pioneers comprising the van of the army of Canadian civilization. Could James Spencer arise from the grave now how surprised he would be at the world he left behind a number of years ago. He ceased to act; not so creation for ever in a state of evolution it has brought to light facts which a century ago were philosophic dreams. No need to enumerate them, the telephone, the phonograph, the electric light all are so simple to even the mind of a child now, and we are wondering where the twentieth century will find us in the

The council met Monday, cleaned up a grist of business and adjourned for two months, unless something of great importance turns up.

High Court Ranger, A. R. Milne, and other Kingston gentlemen were present and participated in the inaugural meeting and election and installation of the officers of the Independent Order of Forresters Tuesday evening: C. D. H. C. R., Byron Derbyshire; C. R., A. P. Booth; V. C. R., Geo. Denyes; R. Sec'y, S. H. Mabee; Fin'l Sec'y, J.A. Timmerman; Treas., Robt. W. Aylsworth; S. W., Thos. W. Milsap; J. Through Prof. Ketchum's instruction the art of singing in this community has has made rapid strides. Old voices have greatly improved and new ones especially have come to the surface, the benefits of which cannot be over estimated in church work, etc. The chorus of forty voices under the directorship of Mr. Ketchum will give a rich musicale in the town, hall Tuesday evening next, July 2nd. Solos, duets, trios, quartettes and rousing full choruses of sparkling, comic and sentimental selections, with the Odessa orchestra, will make up a grand programme. Popular prices. Don't miss dot music.

Violet.

It is with deep regret we learn that Rev. Mr. Myers is to leave us this year.

On Saturday last as Mr. Herbert Clark was on his way to Union Factory with his load of milk, the front axle broke and threw some cans off, frightening the team which began to run. Mr. Clark soon got them under control, but received some severe bruises from the falling cans.

Mrs, Crosley has returned to her old home.

Mr. W. Storms and wife have returned from Prince Edward.

Levi Snider is soon to leave us. Success.

We hear that the excursion is not to pass off in talk as we predicted. Violet and Fourth Concession Schools are to unite and take a trip to Thousand Isles about the middle of July.

Mr. and Mrs. F. Vanluven, of Napanee, spent Sunday in Violet at Mr. D. Wright's.

The lawn social at Mr. J. Denyes' was a decided success. All seemed pleased with the music given by the Yarker band and by the members of Mr. Denyes' family.

I saw something in the Beaver last week "anent the Jesuit Bill." Judging from the agony of the effort the writer must have taken a strong emetic. In a sentence consisting of over twenty lines he asks whose opinions the electors are to take as a guide in the coming election. I think the electors will not find it necessary to consult any source but their own good sense in this matter. It should be a matter of common justice that the minority should have equal rights with the majority; that they should light all are so simple to even the mind of a child now, and we are wondering where the twentieth century will find us in the realms of discovery. But Spencer Hill with its pretty little Methodist Church on its summit seems not to mind the march of time. It is just the same little hill it ever was, and now dear sir I hope this historic sketch will ease the minds of the many readers of your valuable paper.

Now dear sir the next question is who is Sing Song Joe. Did the great Johnstown flood drift him down to Spencer Hill or did he break loose from the Deseronto new production of Uncle Tom's Cabin, or is he some of our own home talent aspiring to the editorial chair of the Beaver ?

This community regret to learn of the sad death of Anson Russell, Esq., of Pretrolia.

The Army corps of Deseronto stormed the foot of Spencer Hill and captured Milo Ben and family.

Miss Gibson, of Morven, is visting at the home of David Martin's, Esq.

Mrs. David A. Martin and daughter are visiting at Deseronto this week.

Mrs. Henry Finkle, of Newburgh, is spending a week with her brother Mr. Geo. W. Shibley.

Master Willie Cleworth, late of Albert College, Belleville, is visiting at John Russell.

Peter Gould is building a fine addition to his barn.

The roads are being repaired this week, and the young men can now drive their young ladies around with comfort. Willie you must drive more carefully. Don't run into anyone again.

Miss Emma Cline has returned from the Ladies' College, Whitby.

Crops good, beautiful weather. I remain as ever yours.

HOUSEHOLD.

Pictures For The Children.

It is to be presumed that in each house in which Good Housekeeping is a welcome visitor, are found many other periodicals and papers, and consequently in these days of beautiful illustrations, many pictures. Granted then that this be true, our housekeeper has a source on which to draw for many beautiful things. Perhaps I can best illustrate and suggest by giving examples of collections of pictures, brought together from many different sources, and made useful and attractive by means of paste. I enter a drawingroom. On the table is a collection of portraits of authors, neatly mounted on pieces of cardboard about the size of an ordinary cabinet photograph card. Holes have been punched in the cards and they are fastened together by means of narrow ribbons tied in pretty bows. On a small table are some large scrap albums, but instead of containing the usual scrap pictures, the first one is filled with portraits of prominent men and women, most of them being full-page pictures. Harper's illustrated papers furnished many of these. Under it is another album of miscellaneous pictures of general interest. On an easel in one corner of the room is a collection of pictures illustrating the noted cathedral buildings of Europe. You would scarcely believe that these were not printed upon the cardboard instead of being simply pasted there, Scattered about the room everywhere are pictures, some in portfolios resting in any convenient place. There are beautiful steel engravings in some of the illustrated magazines, as well as exquisite wood cuts. What a fund for the entertainment of one's friends, and how charmingly pictures help to furnish a room.

To mount pictures is not difficult provided we have good paste. An excellent way to make it is as follows. Take equal parts of flour and starch. Wet thoroughly with cold water and then pour on water that is boiling and cook for a few minutes, being careful to use water enough so that it will not be too thick. Distribute it evenly over the surface of the back of the picture, putting on as little as possible. Lay the top of the picture first upon the cardboard and smooth it downwards with a clean cloth. Dry it under pressure with paper more or less porous next the picture to absorb the moisture. The cardboard may be obtained at a printing office, where you can have it cut into the desired size, or you may obtain at an art store beautiful tinted boards with edges. With what a dainty gift may you present your friend by mounting a beautiful picture or the portrait of some favorite author upon such a card. Better far than any Christmas or birthday card you may buy, for it is not only a work of art but is the result of loving labor. The Christmas number of "The Book Buyer," published in New York, contains beautiful little works of art suitable for such purposes, and during the year 1888 each number contained a portrait of some author.

In a family where there are growing children let them collect all the pictures they can find illustrating any subject, such, for example, as the subject of geography, and make a scrap-book of them. It will prove a very instructive book, and pleasant and profitable work for the long winter evenings.

One other hint. Don't forget the little ones. They will find something interesting in almost any picture. Keep a box for them and put into it all pictures especially adapted to children, or any that you do not want for anything else, discarding only poor ones and those that are sensational or portray scenes of violence. (The sooner these are potatoes all chopped. Boil until the vegetables are tender, then add to two quarts of soup, one-half cup of rice, one-half teaspoonful of pepper; add salt and one tablespoonful of butter. Boil until the rice is soft and then serve hot.

STUFFED ONIONS—Parboil half a dozen large onions, then drop in cold water; take out the centre and fill with a dressing made of stale bread crumbs, a little chopped cold meat, the yolk of an egg, salt and pepper; cover with thin slices of fat bacon, sprinkle the top with a little salt and sugar; put in a baking pan with soup stock to cover the bottom; put in a slow oven. When the onions are tender take up, remove the bacon, strain and skim the gravy, pour over the onions and serve.

STRAWBERRY SHORTCAKE.—Make a puff paste with one cupful of butter, cold and hard, and cupful of lard, one cupful of cold water and four and one-half cupfuls of flour. Rub the lard into the flour as you would for any paste. Cut the butter up in small pieces; throw in and mix with a knife. Roll out and bake in two oblong tins. Serve on an oblong dish with strawberries between the layers, sprinkled heavily with powdered sugar, and strawberries on top also sprinkled with sugar. Whip a pint of sweetened cream to a stiff froth and put over the cake nd around the sides.

PORK POT PIE.—Cut in small pieces one pound of clean fresh pork, or if only salt pork is obtainable soak it until well freshened, which will take about twenty-four hours. Place in a kettle with water to cover; add a scant teaspoonful of pepper, one sliced onion and one sliced apple. Boil until the pork is tender, then cover with crust made as follows: Two cups of flour in which has been thoroughly mixed two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and two tablespoonfuls of butter; mix to a stiff dough and roll into a sheet to fit the kettle; stew half an hour and serve hot.

AT THE ANTIPODES.

The Marvellous Growth of Victoria—Something About its Early Days.

It is doubtful that if in all the world, the United States not excepted, any community has ever progressed with a swiftness and expansion so phenomenal as has the colony which Her Gracious Majesty permitted to take her own name when she granted it a separate existence in November, 1850. It had been but fifteen years earlier that the first settlers—the brothers Henty, one of whom died only a few months ago—came across Bass Straits from Van Diemen's Land in their little Thistle. In 1837 the town of Melbourne was laid out, and one hundred allotments were then sold on what are now the principal streets. The aggregate sum which the 100 allotments fetched was £3,410. Last summer the same allotments were carefully and it was calculated that, exclusive of the buildings erected on them, they could now be sold for nineteen and a half million pounds. Before 1851, when the gold discoveries were made, Victoria prospered in an easy gentle fashion. Its scanty population, outside its two petty towns, were wholly engaged in stock-raising; almost its sole exports were wool, hides, and tallow. The gold find upset as by a whirlwind the lazy, primitive social system of the bucolic era. From all the ends of the earth, gentle and simple, honest man and knave, hurried swarming and jostling to the new El Dorado. And yet it was wonderful how small was the actual crime of a serious character, when the utter disintegration of restraining institutions is

VALUED BY EXPERTS,

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

Another War Cloud in the Continental Sky —Matters in the Balkans the Cause of Alarm.

A new war scare has been born this week. At this moment Europe is taking it very seriously indeed, and the war scare is the only talk. The "Standard," which makes a specialty of alarmist news, is quite hysterical with worry, and the "Daily News" and other newspapers follow suit, all in a very doleful, pessimistic tone. Russia has shown an unusually pronounced desire to gobble up the little Balkan States which act as buffers between Austria, Turkey, and Russia, and hence the row. The Servian Regents, instead of looking after the interests of their nominal master, King Alexander, Milan's little son, have been openly coquetting with their real master, the Russian bear, and listening favorably to Russian proposals for a military convention. A military convention in this case would mean simply the military annexation of Servia by Russia, the control of the Servian troops by the Czar, the elevating to the Servian throne Karageorgevich or the Prince of Montnegro, the deposition of the Abrenovitch dynasty, and a very uncomfortable state of things for others whose interests demand Servia's independence.

Another minor occurrence in a different part of Europe may at any moment assume the dimensions of world-wide interest, and may also turn out to be not altogether unconnected with the Balkan embroglio. Germany has fallen foul of little Switzerland over the treatment which a Berlin police spy received upon being detected inside the republic, and has secured the cooperation of Russia and Austria, and it is reported, of Italy as well, in demanding that Switzerland shall cease to offer an asylum to the political offenders of other countries. The only answer the Federal Assembly has yet made to this demand is unanimously to pass a vote of 17,000,000f. for the purchase of repeating rifles for the army of the republic. The Germans say they only desire that the Swiss Federal Government should take over the jurisdiction in this matter and no longer leave it to the authorities of the various cantons, but in England this is recognized as an attack by the empires on the principle of the right of asylum, and there will be a tremendous outcry here if Lord Salisbury declines to back up brave little Switzerland in a refusal to comply.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S DAILY LIFE.

A Peep at the Inner Scenes of the Queen of England's Household.

The inner life of the court has little in it to tempt a Sybarite—simplicity, dutifulness, conscientious performance of work are its characteristics. At 9 Her Majesty breakfasts alone, unless some of her children, grandchildren or personal friends are staying in the palace, and she is rarely without them. In Summer, at Osborne, Windsor or Balmoral, this meal is generally served out of doors, in some alcove, tent or Summer-house, after which the Queen either drives in a small pony carriage, accompanied by one of the Princesses, or she walks attended by a lady-in-waiting or maid of honor, with whom she converses with friendly ease, and followed by two Highland servants and some favorite dogs.

all pictures especially adapted to children, or any that you do not want for anything else, discarding only poor ones and those that are sensational or portray scenes of violence. (The sooner these are burned the better.) This box will furnish you with material for picture books whenever on occasions of birthdays or Christmases you wish to gladden some little heart with a picture book. No matter if you have no little ones of your own, don't waste the pictures. There are many homes where there are children but no pictures. If you have no time to make picture books, interest some of your boy and girl friends and show them how to make books from paper cambric or this cheap holland used for window shades, with pinked edges, and how to arrange the pictures, and see how they will delight in doing that which will bring a gleam of brightness into the life of some unfortunate child, and lessen the care of some burdened mother.

Little Girls' Dresses.

Mothers who have asked hints about making little girls' wash dresses are advised to get plain Chambery, or else the ombre striped and plaid ginghams, in rose or blue or red for plain colors, with yellow or green for stripes and plaids. The full round skirts have a deep hem, and are gathered to the belted waist; these are of medium length, instead of the extremely long skirts worn last year. Baby waists gathered to a belt of white embroidered insertion and to a similar band at the top of the low round neck are on the pretty guimpe dresses of piuk, blue or red Chambery made for the smallest girls; the sleeves are a short, full puff gathered to an embroidered band. For larger girls are plain waists slightly pointed in front, cut high in the neck behind, and pointed in a short V in front, and worn with short sleeves. Embroidered edging nearly two inches wide is set its whole width in the back of the neck, and tapered very narrow to the point of the V in front; similar edging is set in the front of the armholes, and tapered thence to the slight point at the front of the waist. The short sleeves are high-shouldered, opening in an upturned V on the outside of the arm, and are worn over full muslin guimpe sleeves. The yellow ombre stripes on white, green stripes with pink, and brick red with white stripes or plaids are being made up in these little dresses of French zephyr or Scotch gingham; and the designs are also suitable for embroidered white muslins.

Larger girls who do not wear guimpes have every-day dresses of ginghams, prints or lawn made with high belted waists with a yoke, or with the shoulders quite plain, or else gathered there on a band like the full Russian blouse. The sleeves are full, and there are turned-over cuffs and collar, or else pleated frills form the finish for neck and wrists.

Choice Recipes.

TOMATO SOUFFLE—Skin a dozen tomatoes, cook and stew untill thick, strain to remove the seed, mix in the yolks of two eggs, then the stiffly-beaten whites: add a little salt. Fill a baking dish and set in the oven tin it rises and begins to set; serve immediately.

CHICKEN SOUP.—An old fowl is used best in a broth or soup. Give it time enough and boil slowly, season with salt, pepper, and a few sprigs of celery top. Serve hot. The chicken can be made very palatable by frying in salt pork drippings or butter, after it is taken from the broth.

RICE SOUP.—For this use the liquor in which the beef has been boiled, after skimming it free from fat. Add two chopped onions, one turnip, one carrot, and two honest man and knave, hurried swarming and jostling to the new El Dorado. And yet it was wonderful how small was the actual crime of a serious character, when the utter disintegration of restraining institutions is taken into consideration. In January, 1852, when daily shiploads of were being thrown in to Melbourne, only two of the city constables remained at their duty. The chief constable himself had to go on a beat. In the country the rural police to a man had forsaken their functions and made haste to the diggings. In the first rush the capital was all but depopulated of its manhood; there remained behind but women and children who had to shift for themselves. An advance of 50 per cent. of salary did not avail to retain at their desks the officials in the public offices. Servants had gone. Gentlemen and ladies had to carry water from the river for household purposes, for the water cart supply had been arrested by the departure of the carters. It was said that poor Mr. Latrobe himself, the amiable but weak Lieutenant-Governor, had to black his own boots and groom his own horse. In the wholesale absence of workmen no contract could be insisted on. The squatters shuddered too, as the shearing season approached, knowing that all the shearers were in Forest Creek, or on Mount Alexander. It was then that Mr. Childers who at the time was an immigration agent, made his famous bull. 'Wages of wool pressers, 7s to 8s a day; none to be had.' To such an extent did prices rise that there was the danger lest Government could not afford to supply food to prisoners in gaol. A contractor for gaol necessaries claimed and got 166 per cent. over his price of the year before, and, notwithstanding this stupendous increase, had to default. In April, 1852, fifty ships were lying useless in Hobson's Bay, deserted by their crews. Carriage from Melbourne to Castlemaine was at one time £100 per ton."

Didn't Remember the Name.

She—"I hear that you went as far as Constantinople, Mr. Smythe. Then you must have seen the Dardanelles." He—"H'm! Don't remember the name. But I saw the Willards at Trieste, and young Spoopendyke, who was travelling with them."

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the forumla of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. one of the Princesses, or she walks attended by a lady-in-waiting or maid of honor, with whom she converses with friendly ease, and followed by two Highland servants and some favorite dogs.

Luncheon is served at 2, the convives being Her Majesty's family or royal guests. Until this hour, from her short after-breakfast exercise, the Queen is diligently occupied with official correspondence and business of various kinds. Long training has made her a politician of no mean ability and breadth of view, her natural common sense forming an admirable basis for such a superstructure. It assists, too, in enabling her to choose her friends well and wisely, though the court surroundings are not calculated to help royal personages in forming a just judgment of character. Human nature puts on a somewhat too angelic guise, where everything may be won by amiability and nothing by the reverse.

In the mornings the maids of honor (they are nine in all) in waiting for the time are with the Princesses, reading or practising on the piano, singing or playing lawn tennis with them, as any young ladies, companions together, might. The lady-in-waiting accompanies the Queen in her afternoon drives and visits, which are most frequently to the poor and to humble workers, often to simple gentry or any one in trouble. Afterward this lady reads aloud to Her Majesty in her private sitting room.

The royal dinner hour is 8.30, and that meal is shared by those of the royal family then residing with the Queen, by distinguished visitors and some of the household in rotation, viz lords and ladies in waiting, maids of honor, equerries and grooms in waiting, this latter officials holding a considerable lower position than the equerry, though to the uninstructed it sounds like a distinction without a difference.

The Queen is a woman of strict business habits and study application. The amount of correspondence she gets through is enormous. In the private portion of this correspondence Her Majesty is assisted by her private secretary, a lady-in-waiting, and a maid of honor, especially the Dowager Marchioness of Ely, one of the ladies, who is a valued friend.

When the court is at Windsor the members of the household in attendance are one lady-in waiting, these ladies are always peeresses), two maids of honor, a lord-in waiting, two equerries, one groom-in-waiting, also the keeper of the privy purse, the private secretary, assistants in both department and the master of the household. The attendance is the same at Osborne and Balmoral, with the exception of the lord in-waiting.

To attend to Her Majesty's toilet and wardrobe there are five maids, viz., three dressers and two wardrobe women. The senior dresser, who has been many years with Her Majesty, is specially charged with the task of conveying orders to different tradespeople — jewellers, drapers, dressmakers, &c.: one dresser and one wardrobe woman are in constant attendance on the Queen, taking alternate days.

Dress is a matter in which, even in her young days, Her Majesty does not appear to have taken much interest. At present her perpetual-mourning allows of no crude color combinations. Some of us elders have a pleasant, if vague, recollection of Victoria Regina a good many years ago, say forty or forty-three, in a very simple and becoming bonnet tied beneath the chin, a wreath of wild roses under the brim framing a sweet, kindly young face. Ah, me! sorrow and experience have writ their cruel marks on hers and ours since then.

He Hadn't Been Playing.

The little boy had come in with his clothes torn, his hair full of dust and his face bearing unmistakable marks of a severe conflict. "Oh, Willie, Willie!" exclaimed his mother, deeply shocked and grieved, "you have disobeyed me again. How often have I told you not to play with that wicked Brooklyn boy!" "Mamma," said Willie, washing the blood from his nose, "do I look as if I had been playing with anybody?"

HEALTH.

Timely Hints on Health

Many brain workers and others of highly nervous temperaments are troubled with insomnia, nervous twitchings and starting from sleep, and sensations of falling. These symptoms indicate weak nerves. The victim can very often indeed cure himself by dietetic means alone. The best diet is milk, and for a time it would be wise for him to limit himself to that. The quantity required by an adult to support him well is one pint at a meal, and four meals should be taken daily. The milk used should be up to the standard; if it is not cream should be added to it. People with weak nerves, as a rule, drink but very little water, whereas they usually require a larger quantity than those whose nerves are strong and not easily shaken.

TREATMENT FOR COLD IN THE HEAD.

There are a number of ways of aborting a cold in the head, but most of them are by the means of quite powerful drugs, which a person unfamiliar with their use is never justified in taking on his own responsibility. The Swiss method of treatment is one of the simplest and most efficacious. It is applied in this way: Half fill a jug with boiling water and into that put a teaspoonful of well-powdered camphor. Fashion out of writing paper a funnel, with which cap the top of the jug. The camphorated steam should be inhaled through the nose for ten or fifteen minutes, the inhalation being repeated, if required, every four or five hours. If, in spite of its unpleasantness, the inhalation is persisted in, it is said that three repetitions will always effect a cure, however severe the "cold in the head" may be.

LOCKJAW

is generally popularly believed to be invariably fatal. Recoveries are, indeed, comparatively rare, yet they do take place. The proportion of them is much larger now than it was a score of years ago, and it is safe to predict that it will grow larger as time goes on and the malady is better understood. Prof. Rierzi since 1882 has applied one form of treatment in six cases, with the result of obtaining five cures. The essentials of his treatment are as follows: 1. The patient, having the ears stuffed with cotton or wax, is to be kept in a quiet room and in total darkness. (2) The sick room, as well as the adjoining ones, is to be thickly carpeted in order to avoid the noise of foot steps. (3) The room is to be opened for ventilation every four hours with the greatest care. The diet is to consist of liquids, milk, eggs beaten in broth, water and wine, etc. (4) All light necessary shall be carefully covered from the sight of the sick. (5) If constipation exists, both purgatives and injections are interdicted. Above all, quietness is necessary (6)Should the pains be intense, with the object of quieting, powdered belladonna and ergot of rye should be used.

COMMON CAUSE OF DYSPEPSIA.

One of the most common causes of dyspepsia is eating heartily when the system is tired and jaded. When exhausted by either mental or physical work we are usually ravenously hungry, and, of course, turn to food as the means of restoration. The fact is seldom appreciated that the stomach shares in the depression caused by overwork, and, hence, at such times is unable to perform its ordinary duty. The food taken then is but very slowly digested, and before the process is completed fermentation often takes place. If it does, the consequence is that we are in a worse state than if the food had not been taken, for the fermentation creates acid and gas, which in turn not only prevents digestion but excite other expedite matters, he took all of them at one dose, and joined the "silent majority."

as an article of food has more than once been questioned, and, as a result, there is more or less prejudice against it in the minds of many, not a few holding it to be indifferently nutritious and capable of producing dyspepsia. Says one writer, commenting upon these adverse criticisms: "This is not surprising, as no food article is just the thing in every case or at all times. Our daily experiences convince us of such truth, by likes and dislikes for very common and the most wholesome foods. It is natural and best to have some variation of the diet. One thing may be just adopted to the state of the individual--bodily and mentally—at one time and not at some other; while with another person it may never agree. The so-called 'eternal fitness of things' needs to be carefully studied before deciding an important question so hastily." Oatmeal is unquestionably wholesome food. If properly eaten, it is very generally well borne on the stomach. To a small proportion of people it is, however, displeasing, if not really a burden to digestion. When dyspeptic symptoms are excited by it, it is very rarely, indeed, that the oatmeal itself can properly be blamed; there is almost always some fault in its preparation or the manner in which it is served or eaten. If oatmeal is not well cooked it is unfit to eat, and taken into a delicate stomach will cause disturbance. So, too, will it even when well cooked if it is eaten with much cream and sugar; the trouble in that instance is with the sweets, and they would have the same effect if taken in any other way. Oatmeal is used almost exclusively as mush, which one naturally swallows quickly, without allowing it to remain in the mouth. To a considerable extent the saliva is essential to its rapid digestion. Hence oatmeal should be kept for a time in the mouth, as are other foods, and only swallowed after it has been well masticated. In the form of mush, also, as it goes down so quickly and easily, there is a natural tendency for one to eat more than he would were it in a solid form. Carefully cooked and prepared, eaten as it ought to be, and in proper quantities, beyond all doubt oatmeal is agreeable, healthful and nutritious.

DANGER OF A LITTLE KNOWLEDGE.

The average layman considers that when he employs a physician, he has the right to know what drugs are used in the treatment. He can scarcely be persuaded that in withholding such information his attendant has no selfish motive, but does so purely in the interest of his patient. Generally the physician is ready to give such information if he is dealing with a person of intelligence, but in some instances it is clearly his duty to decline. If a person has been much benefited by a certain drug, of course, if he knows the name of it, he is certain to recommend it to every friend who has a complaint like his. Or if a prescription has been given him calling for agents which he knows nothing of, he loans his friend the empty bottle, or copies for him the number of the label; the same medicine can then be obtained of the druggist who holds the prescription. In this way a great deal of harm is often done, leading, as it does in some cases, to the abuse of powerful drugs, while in others to the application of the most erroneous treatment. The same disease in two persons often demanns quite distinct methods of treatment; a drug, or mixture of drugs, which is in licated for one might be clearly forbidden for the other. A correct application for drugs requires a discrimination which no non-professional can possess. We predict that the time must come, through

SHARKS.

Ravenous Character of the White and Hammer-Headed Varieties.

It was reported the other week that a sailor engaged in scraping the sides of a troopship in the harbor of Sierra Leone was drawn into the water and promptly devoured by a shark. This is not an uncommon experience and the "Standard" reminds us that a boatman has been bitten in the short time it took him to dip up a pitcher of water while his craft was under full sail. We are assured that it is nothing uncommon for the ravenous fish to spring a foot out of the sea in order to secure their prey. For miles they will follow a vessel, on the lookout for any stray unforunate who may tumble or be thrown overboard, and so deep do they swim under the surface that it requires the practiced eyes of the natives to detect their presence. Many of the West India harbors are so haunted by the sharks—the least amiable of the 150 different kinds known to zoologists—that it is dangerous to bathe even a few yards from the shore without an outlay being posted.

It is a well ascertained fact that the skeletons of sheep, pigs, hogs, and cattle which have fallen or been thrown overboard have been recovered many days subsequently to their being swallowed; and it is on record that in a stomach of a shark killed in the Indian ocean a lady's work-box was found, while in another the incriminatory papers which had been thrown away by a hotly-chased slaver were recovered from the maw of an involuntary witness thus curiously brought into court on the barb of a pork-baited hook. Ruysch, one of the most trustworthy of the old naturalists, affirms that a man in mail—homo loricatus, he calls him—was found in the stomach of a white shark; and it is recorded by Blumenbach that in one case a whole horse was found. It is undeniable that many have been killed with ample capacity for such undesirable contents; and Basil Hall tells of one out of which was taken besides a host of other trifles which had been dropped astern in the course of the previous week.

THE WHOLE SKIN OF A BUFFALO,

Sailors are full of superstitions which touch the superhuman sagacity and incarnate fiendishness of this fish—how, its senses being acute far beyond what we can have any idea of, it will follow ships for days when a death is likely to occur, and desert the wake of the vessel when no such good fortune for it is in the wind. Vatea, the shark god, is the lord of the ocean in the Hervey island mythology, and it is whispered that even the Christianized Hawaiians will still, when in the direst extremity, invoke Mooaru, the shark demon to whom their pagan forefathers erected temples and offered sacrifice. The pearl divers of Ceylon employ shark charmers to protect them while engaged in their dangerous work. Marco Polo speaks of these officials under the name of the abræmani, who received as wages

A TWENTIETH OF THE DIVERS' GAINS.

At the present day they are called haibandi or shark-binders, and as the divers would not enter the waters without being certain of their services the chief operator receives a government subsidy of ten oysters per diem. The Tahitians deified the blue shark under the name of "Aukua maoo," dedicating it to shrines and priests, and in west Africa rabbits are sacrificed to "John," while, if not sharply watched, it has been affirmed that some of the tribes about the Niger delta will, at fixed times, bind a child decorated with flowers to a post on the

Our unprece a very strong and healthy person th l effects of eating when the system is much fatigued would not be so arked as in one below the standard of health. Very nervous individuals suffer from the habit, and if debilitated they are quite sure to grow more so if it is persisted in. When very "tired and hungry" it is always best to rest for a time before eating, or to take some such simple "pick up" as hot milk, which should be slowly sipped. That is very refreshing, indeed, and usually meets the requirements quite as well as an alcoholic stimulant.

REMEDY FOR HEADACHES.

When in certain painful affections the physician advises the use of cold applications, and if the affect from them is not pleasing, then that hot should be tried, the patient is likely to consider it rather an uncertain sort of treatment, of doubtful value either way. It is, indeed rather a curious thing that heat and cold can often be used interchangeably with like effects. Extreme heat will destroy the skin, and extreme cold will do the same. Now, headache is sometimes relieved by hot applications, and yet in some instances it aggravates the trouble. In case of the latter, oftentimes the cold applications will effect a cure. As a general rule a throbbing headache, with tenderness and soreness of the scalp, can best be relieved by hot applications. Whereas, when the head feels full and "bursting." if cold be applied to the head and heat to the neck and spine, the effect is most agreeable. Probably one of the best external applications which is most serviceable in the different forms of headache is menthol. A solution of that should be made in about the proportion of one drachm of menthol to ten of alcohol. It can be applied on a thin strip of cloth large enough to cover the forehead. That should be kept wet with the solution. It is very cooling, and the effect in many cases of headache is very agreeable from the first.

POWERFUL DRUGS.

A score of years ago drugs were given in quite crude forms. The pills then used were large enough to excite apprehension of suffocation in patients obliged to take them. Until quite recently all medicines have contained more or less extraneous matter, which added bulk, but not virtue, to them. Gradually the chemist eliminated such unnecessary matter, until at last drugs were furnished physicians in nearly, if not quite, pure form. But he did not stop there. He next applied himself to extracting the active principles of medicinal agents, and now nearly all the powerful remedies are used in what we might term highly concentrated from. Aconite furnishes us with a ready illustration of this great change. The powerful leaves were once given in two-grain doses, and the extract of the same in one-half-grain doses. At the present time we have aconitina, the real virtue of aconite in highly concentrated form, and the dose of that is from 1-100ths to 1-200ths of a grain Of course, a pill of aconitina containing a full dose might be made exceedingly minute, and as a matter of fact it is put up in very small granules. The inference to be drawn is that, in taking medicine, one must be exceedingly careful to follow the physician's directions "to the letter." Because the pills are small one must not assume that they can be taken recklessly. A man not long ago deceived himself in that way with most disastrous results. His physician ordered some ten granules, scarcely larger than pin heads, which contained a very powerful drug. He was cautioned to take only one, three times a day; but, thinking to application for drugs requires a discrimination which no non-professional can possess. We predict that the time must come, through the multiplication of these potent neurotic medicines, when physicians will insist upon the non-renewal of these potent prescriptions by pharmasists without a written order. It seems to us quite probable that we have simply arrived at the threshold of this department of chemical work, and that the profession will be compelled to throw additional safeguards around the unauthorized use of these powerful agents.

The Origin of Tobacco.

Tobacco, according to an Arabic legend translated in the "La Commedia Umana," is no older than the founder of Islam. The prophet was once travelling across the desert of Yemen. It was winter, and all the reptiles which infest the desert were asleep. Suddenly the prophet's horse trod upon a viper, and apparently wounded it. Mohammed, full of mercy, got down from his horse, and taking up the viper put it into his sleeve, hoping that the warmth would restore it. The viper soon began to stir. Incapable of gratitude, like, the serpent which was in the beginning, it said to Mohammed, "Reverend prophet, I will bite thee!" "Nay," replied the mild prophet, "that would be the blackest ingratitude, poor reptile, to repay a good deed with an evil deed." "Nevertheless," said the viper, "I shall do it; I swear by God the Almighty that I will bite thee!" When Mohammed heard the name of Allah he dared not prolong the dispute, but, bowing his head with reverence, said—

"His name be praised for ever; you and I both belong to him; from Him we both received life," and he offered the viper his hand. A violent pain compelled him to fling the viper from his sleeve and to curse it in the name of Allah. The prophet then sucked the viper's poison from the wound and spit it out upon the sand. A magnificent plant immediately sprang up on the spot where the prophet's sacred saliva had fallen. One of his disciples gathered some of its leaves and burned them as an offering to God for the rescue of His prophet. Mohammed and his companions were delighted with the splendid aroma of the burnt offering as its smoke ascended towards heaven. From that day to this all the faithful of Islam have taken pleasure in the plant whose taste and scent partakes in an equal degree of the bitterness of the viper's poison and the sweetness of the holy prophet's spittle.

The Bishop's Mistake.

Scene—A hatter's shop at the West-end of London. Enter a well-known man about town, who hands his hat to an attendant to be ironed. While standing bare-headed at the counter, in comes a certain bishop. The latter, mistaking the club man for one of the shop-walkers, gives him his hat, with the inquiry, "Have you a hat like this?" The club man, in the coolest possible manner, takes the hat, turns it over, examines it closely, looks at it inside and out, then, in slow and measured tones, remarks, "No, I have not; and," he adds reflectively, "If I had, I am hanged if I would wear it!" Tableau!

affirmed that some of the tribes about the Niger delta will, at fixed times, bind a child decorated with flowers to a post on the beach at low tide and leave it to be devoured by the sharks which come in with the flow, drowning its cries with the noise of drums. —[Newcastle (Eng.) Chronicle.

A Woman's Sweet Will.

She is prematurely deprived of her charms of face and form, and made unattractive by the wasting effects of ailments and irregularities peculiar to her sex. To check this drain upon, not only her strength and health, but upon her amiable qualities as well, is her first duty. This is safely and speedily accomplished by a course of self-treatment with Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, a nervine and tonic of wonderful efficacy, and prepared especially for the alleviation of those suffering from "dragging-down" pains, sensations of nausea, and weakness incident to women—a boon to her sex. A Bloody Affray.

is often the result of "bad blood" in a family or community, but nowhere is bad blood more destructive of happiness and health than in the human system. When the life current is foul and sluggish with impurities, and is slowly distributing its poisons to every part of the body, the peril to health, and life even, is imminent. Early symptoms are dull and drowsy feeling, severe headaches, coated tongue, poor appetite, indigestion and general lassitude. Delay in treatment may entail the most serious consequences. Don't let disease get a strong hold on your constitution, BUT TREAT YOURSELF by using Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and be restored to the blessings of health. The "Discovery" is GUARANTEED to cure in all cases of diseases for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be refunded.

Gents' trousers are becoming so wide that it will soon be the proper thing for a lady to take the lead in ascending a stairway.

AGENTS WANTED.

AGENTS WANTED—We have sold over $25 000 worth of the Universal Cooking Crocks in Ontario, so quietly that you have never heard it, and the sale still continues. April and May have been the best months that we have ever had in Canada. One reason of this increase is that we have just begun to reach the farming communities. For two years we have been confined to the cities and larger towns, where we have met with deserving success. The UNIVERSAL CROCKS supercedes all other stewing and boiling cooking utensils IF YOU WANT EMPLOYMENT, or a Non-Burning Acid-Proof Kettle, send for our circular, fully explaining its use and construction. Remember this is a Standard Article, not a novelty.

—Mr A. E. Paul has rented the George Mills property on the corner of Bridge and Adelphi streets and has taken possession.

—The committee of the R. C. Church wish to return their sincere thanks to all who so kindly assisted them in their late Pic-nic.

—The North Fredericksburgh Protest Case, Baird vs Parks, came up at Toronto on Tuesday last and was further enlarged until the 9th of September.

—Mr. Gibbard's yacht "Vesper" has been finished. A new engine and boiler have been put in by Mair & Bro. She made a trial trip on Thursday afternoon, taking a pleasure party down as far as Bogarts.

—Last Saturday was a regular whiskey day in Napanee. Upwards of twenty drunks were counted on Dundas street within two hours, two fights occurred within an hour and three unfortunates were locked up over Sunday.

—Grover Cleveland, ex-President of the United States, was in town on Wednesday and made a trip over the N. T. & Q. Railway in company with Mr. Rathbun. He is now at Glenora where he will spend a couple of weeks.

—A subscriber of the Express, who has just returned from the back townships, informs us that potatoes have nearly all rotted in that section, and that many of the farmers have replanted within the last week. The wet weather has rotted a good many potatoes in this section also.

—We are indebted to the celebration committees at Deseronto, Trenton and Port Hope for kindly invitations to be with them on Dominion Day. All of the towns offer good attractions. A large number of Napaneeans will go to Trenton on the band excursion while quite a few of the local sports will take in the races at Deseronto.

—The Rev. R. T. Burns, deputy-postmaster at Kingston, has been arrested for embezzlement and is now awaiting his trial. The peculations have been going on since 1885 and amount to upwards of $3,500. He has always borne a first class reputation and has been looked upon as above suspicion. Great spmpathy is felt for his family.

—The premium list for the Prince Edward County Agricultural Society exhibition to be held at Picton, Tuesday and Wednesday, September 10th and 11th, has been issued from the office of the Picton Times. The list is creditable to the Society, and to the office from which it was issued. May the Society have glorious weather and a successful exhibition.

—Still J. Edmanson, representing Dr. Chese's medicine, was in town on Friday, selling and advertising their medicines. He reports trade good over ten thousand bottles of Dr. Chase's Liver cure sold since January. Detlor & Fullerton are agents and recommend it for use. Each house in town have a sample of Dr. Chase's pills to test the merit. See advertisement in another column.

—A small fishing craft came ashore at John Ritchie's, Amherst Island, Wednesday morning. It was empty. It is thought to belong to one Ainsley, of Picton, or Indian Point, aged 59 years. He was at Bath on Tuesday with a load of fish, which he disposed of, and filled himself up with whiskey before leaving in the evening. It is probable that he was drowned. In the boat were a sail set, and a hat. The craft had not been capsized.

—Warden Lavell, of Kingston Penitentiary, discovered a plot among the prisoners —Dominion Day. Your choice of place and sport. The steamer Ella Ross will leave Napanee on the morning of July 1st at half-past six o'clock for Deseronto, Davy's Island, Glenora and Picton, connecting at Deseronto with steamer Quinte for Belleville and Trenton. On the Quinte will be the 14th Battalion Band, of Picton, and the Ladies' Band, of Demorestville. Returning, the Ella Ross will leave Picton at seven o'clock in the evening. Fare from Napanee to Deseronto and return, twenty-five cents; from Napanee and all other points, fifty cents. adv

—The Royal Templars of Temperance held a very successful entertainment in their hall in the Harshaw block on Tuesday evening. Mr. K. J. Strong, Select Councillor, occupied the chair. Addresses were delivered by Rev. A. L. Morden and Rev. Mr. Anderson, of the Western Methodist church. Miss Shipman presided at the organ; songs were given by Mr. H. L. Bryant, of Brockville, and Miss Botting. The Misses Walbridge sang a duet very sweetly. The ladies of the Temple furnished refreshments, and altogether the evening passed off very delightfully. Proceeds about $25.

—On Thursday evening of last week Miss Eva N. Roblin, of Napanee, scored quite a success by her singing at the Sherwood recital in Toronto. Mr. Sherwood, of New York, is said to be the finest pianist on the continent, and while in Toronto performing his duties as examiner at the Conservatory of Music he gave a recital. Three Conservatory pupils were chosen to assist in the programme, but to Miss Roblin were accorded the honors of the evening, she receiving a most enthusiastic encore. The audience numbered nearly three thousand people. All of the Toronto papers speak in very flattering terms of Miss Roblin's singing.

—The many friends of Mr. Fred Wright were agreeably surprised last week when he came home with a fair young bride. About two weeks ago he returned from New York, and on Wednesday went up to Wellington on a visit. While there he was married to Miss Victoria Barker, of Bloomfield. Mrs. Wright is well known in Napanee having spent some time here with her aunt, Mrs. Outwaters. We congratulate Fred on securing so amiable and handsome a bride, and congratulate the bride on winning one of the best fellows in the bay district. The happy couple have just returned from Montreal where they have been on their wedding trip, and will settle down in Napanee.

had not been capsized.

—Warden Lavell, of Kingston Penitentiary, discovered a plot among the prisoners to capture the guards and then break out and escape. He had a portion of "A" Battery brought to the Penitentiary and secreted, ready for the slightest move on the part of the convicts. The ringleaders evidently suspected their plot was known for they made no attempt to escape. The soldiers were kept in the prison for eighteen hours and then allowed to return to their barracks.

—A large number of the Masons of Napanee attended services at St. Mary Magdelence's Church on Sunday afternoon last, when the Venerable Archdeacon Bro. Bedford Jones, chaplain of Union lodge No. 9, delivered a very able and eloquent address, taking as his subject the life and work of St. John the Baptist, and comparing it with the Masions of St. John the evangelist. From the history of the two patron saints of the order, the Venerable Archdeacon drew many interesting and instructive lesson.

—The Methodists, of Bath, and vicinity will excurt to Murray Canal per the popular steamer Quinte on Tuesday July 9th. The boat will start from Collins Bay at seven o'clock in the morning, calling at all bay ports, leaving Bath at eight o'clock Adolphustown at 9.30 o'clock and Deseronto at half past ten. Fare for the round trip only fifty cents. Meals can be procured on the steamer if desired. Rev. H. I. Allen is one of the prime movers in the excursion which is a suffiicient guarantee that it will be properly managed.

—On Tuesday quite an interesting cricket match took place between Trinity College and Napanee cricket clubs. Napanee went first to bat and scored 41, Trinity then scored 122 and Napanee 27 the second innings. The match was decided by the first innings it being too late for the second innings to be played out. Mr. Stokes topped the score on the Napanee side 17 being the highest. The match was somewhat a failure on account of the recent rain and a few of the best men of our local team not being able to attend.

—On Saturday afternoon, Bill Young, a tall, powerfull man who is said to be a very inoffensive person when sober, made a vicious attack upon an old grey haired man by the name of Mowers, from Camden. The blows showered on the old man soon knocked him out, and it is feared is seriously injured. Billy was taken to the cooler by the police. The question arises which is to blame, the man who sold the liquor or the man who allowed himself to be come crazed by the stuff. Somebody should get six months, twice a year, for this foul attack upon an inoffensive old man.

Deaths seem to have been quite the order this week. On Saturday last Mr. John Wheeler, of the Queens Hotel, passed away at the early age of thirty-six years, and on the same day Mrs. John Smith went home to her reward. The remains of John Wheeler were buried on Sunday afternoon, the Oddfellows participating. The funeral of Mrs Smith took place on Monday afternoon and was largely attended. On Monday morning about six o'clock Mr. White, better known as "Teddy" died very suddenly. The funeral was on Tuesday, the remains being interred in the Huffman cemetry.

Town Council.

Council met in regular session. His Worship the Mayor presiding. Members present, the Reeve, Deputy-reeve and councillors Aylsworth, Fennell, Gibbard, Joy, Jamieson and Madole.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

Councillor Madole presented a petition from J. S. Hulett and others asking to have the turnpike on West street between Bridge and Graham streets lowered and widened, and the ditches on both sides filled in. Referred to the Street Committee to report.

On motion of Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Gibbard, the Street Committee presented pay list No. 15, amounting to $145.27 which was ordered to be paid.

On motion of Mr. Fennell, seconded by Mr. Jamieson, the Street Committee asked for further time to report respecting the estimates of cost of Bridge street sewer, which was granted.

On motion of Mr. Aylsworth, seconded by Mr. Joy, that councillors Lowry and Steavens entered and took their seats.

The chairman of the committee on Fire Water and Gas presented the agreement of the corporation with the Electric Light Co., which was read and referred to the committee and town solicitor.

On motion of Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Gibbard, that Nightwatchman Emberson presented his monthly report which was ordered to be filed.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Gibbard, that a majority of the committee composed of the Finance committee, the Fire, Water and Gas committee, and Councillors Stevens and Fennell to whom under by-law 418 was referred the supervision and approval of the contract respecting water works, to be entered into between Hanover and Hinds, and the corporation of Napanee having neglected to act or to supervise on approve of the said contract.

1. Be it therefore resolved that this council do hereby approve of the said contract respecting water works, as now drawn up and executed by the said Hanover and Hinds and dated the 19th day of August, 1889, and that this corporation doth hereby assent and agree to all the terms of the said contract and doth hereby authorize the mayor and clerk to sign the same and affix thereto the corporation seal.

2. That the mayor and clerk are hereby authorized to sign this resolution and affix the corporation seal to the same.

Moved by Mr. Fennell in amendment, seconded by Mr. Joy, that the said contract be not signed to-night, but laid on the table until the second meeting in January, 1890. The amendment was lost and the original motion declared carried.

The reeve introduced a bylaw respecting the incorporation of the Napanee Waterworks Company. Read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time in committee of the whole.

On motion of Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Gibbard, the reeve in the chair, the committee rose and the chairman reported ed the by-law read a second time without amendment. The report was adopted.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Stevens, that the bylaw be read a third time, numbered, signed by the mayor and clerk, and finally passed. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Aylsworth, that the fire, water and gas committee be authorized to purchase the necessary amount of coal required for town purposes. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Joy, seconded by Mr. Aylsworth, that this council desires to place upon record its sense of the great loss this corporation has sustained in the death of its oldest members in the person of Chas. Lane, whose death occurred on Saturday, 10th inst. As a member of this council he was upright and painstaking in the discharge of every duty the office imposed upon him; courteous in intercourse with his fellow-members, and faithful in promoting and considering every interest of the town. As a citizen he was held in the highest respect, and his death has been and will long continue to be universally regretted. We would extend to the widow, family and friends our deep sympathy in their bereavement. Carried unanimously.

Mr. Lowry moved, seconded by Mr. Stevens, that the case of a Mr. Walker, a sick and indigent person, be referred to the Poor and Sanitary Committee with power to act. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Carson, seconded by Mr. Gibbard, that account of E. J. Hooper and E. S. Lapum for services in connexion with the school debentures be laid over until the next regular meeting of the Council. Carried.

On motion the account of the Water and Electric Light Company was referred to the Clerk to examine and found to be correct. On motion the account of Ezra Pringle was referred to the Fire, Water and Gas Committee.

Mr. Lowry moved, seconded by Mr. Fennell, that the account of Templeton & Beeman for printing be referred to the Committee on Printing and By-laws to report. Carried.

On motion the account of J. C. Drewry for printing Voter's List was similarly referred.

Mr. Gibbard moved, seconded by Mr. Lapum that the account of Ferguson & Bro. be referred to the Street Committee with power to act.

Moved in amendment by Mr. Aylsworth, seconded by Mr. Fennell that it be referred to the Committee on Fire, Water and Gas. The amendment was lost and the original motion confirmed.

UNDER AN AFRIC SUN.

By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

CHAPTER III.

"Yes, my dear sirs, I cannot conceive a more delightful climate. Winter is unknown, and you can suit your taste by selecting the heat you prefer. Africa down by the seashore; Italy where you stand; a few hundred feet higher in the mountains, France; then England; and Norway and its snows at the top of the volcano. A man ought to be happy here."

"And you are not?" said Fraser dryly.

"No, and yes. Of course, I'm happy in my garden with my child, but—— There, hang it all, my dear boys!" he cried, in a good-humoured angry tone, "how can a man be happy with a load of debt?"

Digby listened, but his eyes were directed to the garden.

"Yes," continued Redgrave; "I've been so confoundedly unlucky. Too speculative, perhaps; but I came out here twenty years ago as a speculation, and I'm a stubborn Sussex man, sir: I will not be beaten. But I've got hold of the right thing at last."

"And what's that?"

"Sulphur, sir. I'm working up that at the top of the mountain. You shall see the place, if you'll come.—Ah, here's Nelly. We never ventured to import a piano, gentlemen; but we have a guitar, and I'll be bound to say if we petition rightly, we shall get a song."

"Do you wish me to sing, father?" said the girl, colouring slightly as she met Digby's earnest gaze.

"Yes, my dear, if you are not too tired."

"Oh no," she said hastily; and she crossed the room to reach down a guitar hanging by its ribbon from a nail in the wall.

The two Englishmen had been a fortnight in Isola, and, attractive as the place had proved with its wondrous vegetation, gorge, hill, and crater, Redgrave's pretty half-English villa seemed to be the spot which drew them to it again and again. The days would be passed in penetrating the most out-of-the-way parts of the island and adding to Fraser's collection; then they would return, tired out, to the little venta, where their dark-eyed moustached landlady had prepared a substantial meal; after which there would be chocolate and a cigar, followed by: "I say, Horace, what do you say to a walk up to Redgrave's? He will not see much English society when we are gone."

Fraser always looked uneasy, hesitated, and seemed on the point of refusing; but he invariably ended by rising to go, till it became almost a matter of course for them to find father and daughter standing starting by the rough gate between the prickly-pears, Redgrave moking one of his homemade cigars, and Helen watching with a sadness of expressions in her eyes which seemed to grow night by night.

Then there would be more chocolate out there, in the delicious evening, with the scent of orange blossom floating around, and the boom of the great Atlantic billows, softened by the distance, coming up like a bass murmur from far below.

Delicious dreamy evenings, with sea, sky and shadows of the coming night, and the slowly developing stars, all tending to give an indefinable something to the place which seemed to hold the visitors as in a thrall.

It had been so night after night, with the only drawback to the pleasure in the presence of Senor Ramon, who seemed to be quite at home at the villa, and polite and friendly, to a degree; but whose warmth never seemed to thaw the two Englishmen.

This night, Ramon was absent at his home way up a path through his grounds, followed unwillingly by Fraser, to a seat cut in the steep stone, from which they could gaze right away to sea and over the sleeping town.

"Peak looks well to-night," said Redgrave, pointing to what seemed like a faint cloud where the last rays of the departed day still lingered. "It's a beautiful world this—a bad world."

"Paradoxical," said Fraser dryly.

"Yes, sir. We spoil it, and make it bad."

There was a long silence, during which they sat and smoked; and from time to time, faintly heard, came the tinkle of Helen's guitar.

"You have been so friendly to us, Mr. Redgrave," said Fraser at last, "and you seem so isolated"——

"Yes; this is Isola," said the other with a half laugh.

"A stranger among strangers that I take the liberty of speaking," continued Fraser, without heeding the interruption. "You are in trouble?"

"To the very eyes, sir."

"Can I, as a fellow-countryman, help you?"

"No," said Redgrave shortly.

"I beg your pardon. I meant well."

"Of course you did, my dear sir, and I thank you; but you can't help me.—I have two great troubles—debt, and my daughter."

"A curse—and a blessing," said Fraser dryly.

"Call it so if you like, sir," cried Redgrave almost fiercely; "but I owe that Spanish dog more than I can ever pay him. He has led me on in my foolish desire to speculate, tempting me to borrow of him, as if he were my best friend, and I could not see it. I have no means of proving it; but I feel morally certain that he has used his great influence as the richest man in the island to undermine me in my sales. And now he demands payment in full."

"Well, sir; pay him.,'

"I cannot."

"You have not the means?"

"Yes, I have; but I cannot pay him."

"May I ask why?'

"Because he will not take money."

"What do you mean?'

"What did old Shylock insist upon having?"

"His pound of flesh?"

"Yes. I might borrow and pay him; but he insists upon having my daughter's hand."

"Ha!" ejaculated Fraser, as they sat there in the dark.

"And she hates him"——

There was a pause.

"As much as you, sir.

"Ha!" ejaculated Fraser again.

"There: come back, and join the young folks, Fraser. I feel better, now some one knows my trouble.—Humph! there he is again." For Ramon's voice was heard speaking loud enough, and directly after the four men encountered.

That night Ramon and Redgrave walked part of the way back with the two visitors; and after they had parted, Ramon stopped short.

"Good-night," said Redgrave,

"No, senor; it is not good-night," said the Spaniard haughtily. "How long do those English stay here?"

"I don't know; they are their own masters."

"Yes, Senor Redgrave; and I am yours. trip to your works?" said Fraser one evening, when he had been watching angrily the looks which Digby directed at Helen.

"Eh? Ah, when you like," said Redgrave.

"To morrow be it then," said Fraser.

"A trip—a walk?' said Ramon, turning sharply.

"Yes; only to the works."

"Ah, yes; very interesting.—You will take them to-morrow, Redgrave?"

The latter nodded.

"I wish you a pleasant day. You will start early, as it is far?"

"Yes. Soon after sunrise. I shall have everything ready, gentlemen, so be here in good time."

Ramon smiled to himself as he went away in the best of humor that night, but he smiled too soon.

Redgrave saw it, and he was very thoughtful as he bade his other visitors good-night.

"Nelly, my darling," he said as they re-entered the house, "it is very cold up the mountain, and the way there is scorching and dusty; but if I had the side-saddle clapped on one of the mules you could go with us."

The sad aspect fled from Helen's face on the instant. "Ah yes," she cried.

"That's right," said her father. "Then be ready. Thick boots and cloak ready for the cold."

Helen flung her arms about his neck, and hid her face for a moment in his breast before kissing him and saying "Good night."

"I've seen him smile before," said Redgrave to himself; "and it means mischief. As soon as we were out of the way, he would be here pestering my poor girl. Checkmate there."

"Treacherous enemy at least," said Ramon, as he returned home.

"Tom," said Fraser suddenly, as the two walked together down the steep slope.

"Eh? Yes?" said Digby with a start.

"What do you say to getting back to Santa Cruz and trying to catch one of the Castle boats home?"

"No."

"Eh?"

"I said No. I'm very bad, out of sorts, Horace; and this place is doing me worlds of good. Emphatically, No. Besides, you have not half-done the island yet. You said so the other day."

"True: I did."

"Then do it properly while you are here; and don't bother. Why, you are always wanting to go home."

Fraser's countenance grew more sad as he gazed sidewise at his companion's happy face, and he sighed gently. "Young—handsome—volatile," he said to himself; "and he loves her dearly; while she"—— He seemed to have come upon a confused mental tanglement, and it was some minutes after blindly blundering on through a maze of thought, that he said softly: "Matters are getting in a knot."

CHAPTER V.

"Going with us—you! cried Digby as he entered the pretty room at Redgrave's the next morning, to find a delicious breakfast spread, and Helen standing ready to receive him in a riding-habit specially adapted to the place.

"You will not think me in the way?' she said playfully.

Fraser's countenance looked more sombre as he took the hand extended to him, and smiled sadly as he followed Digby's example and expressed his delight.

To both men that day was a dream of a wondrous journey upward along a flower-strown track towards a dense cloud, which soon after enveloped them, and through which they laboriously climbed to find themselves in a new region, where the air was only drawback to the pleasure in the presence of Senor Ramon, who seemed to be quite at home at the villa, and polite and friendly, to a degree; but whose warmth never seemed to thaw the two Englishmen.

This night, Ramon was absent at his home a quarter of a league on the other side of the little port; and as soon as the guitar strings had been tuned, Helen sang first one and then another of the old ballads of home, the room growing darker, and the faces of those present more indistinct, till suddenly Redgrave started up as his child's sweet sympathetic voice ceased, the last note of the guitar vibrating in the fragrant air.

"Room's too hot," said Redgrave huskily.—"Come and have a walk round, Fraser."

"Poor papa!" said Helen, rising as he left the room, followed by Fraser with unwilling step.

"Is anything wrong?" said Digby, laying his hand upon the guitar, as if in protest.

"It was my mother's favourite song," said Helen sadly. "She used to sing it. I remembered the air, and found the words one day in her desk. I sang it to him one evening as a surprise, and his emotion frightened me; but ever since he makes me sing it whenever I take down the guitar. He says it brings him back the past; but it always makes him sad."

There was a few moments' silence, embarrassing to both. Digby had words rising to his lips which he longed to speak; but he checked them, as he felt that he had no right.

"Let us join them now," said Helen, trying to draw away the guitar.

"No, no; not yet," cried Digby. "One more song—will you?—may I ask you? the little Spanish song I heard you singing that day you were gathering flowers."

Helen drew her breath so sharply that there was a sound in the darkening room as of a painful sob. Then there was silence as Digby sank back in his chair with a feeling of misery crushing down upon him such as he had never felt before.

"I'm an idiot!" he said to himself. "What business had I ever to harbour such thoughts? But if it had been another, I should not have cared."

He knew he was thinking a lie as he seemed to start back into consciousness, for the chords of the guitar rang out in a wild half-minor refrain, and before him he could dimly see Helen on the other side of the room, seated opposite the window, while the sweet pure notes thrilled him through and through.

But the song seemed different now. In place of the vivid greenery of the wood, and the face of the singer looking bright, happy, and surprised in the encounter, everything was dark and oppressive; even the song seemed sad, while it was as if a blow had been struck as the last note rang out and a voice from the window cried "Brava! brava!" with the addition of hearty plaudits.

Digby sprang to his feet with the hot blood in his cheeks.

"Ah, my dear Senor Digby, I did not know you were there.—Is not Helen's voice delicious?"

Digby tried to speak, but bit his lip with rage, for the words would not come; and Ramon continued: "Come, senor, confess she sings our Spanish songs in a way which throws yours in the shade?"

"Miss Redgrave's singing is a pleasure to hear," said Digby coldly.—"Shall we join your father in the garden?"

"Thank you, Mr. Digby; not this evening," said Helen, her voice sounding as if it had caught the inflection of his.

"But you will come, my dear senor," said Ramon. "I have brought you a few of my latest made cigars."

In the meantime, Redgrave had led the

"No, senor; it is not good-night," said the Spaniard haughtily. "How long do those English stay here?"

"I don't know; they are their own masters."

"Yes, Senor Redgrave; and I am yours. Their presence here displeases me. Let them go."

He strode away; and as Redgrave walked slowly back, he struck the palm of his left hand a tremendous blow with his fist and said something English—only one word, but it was very English indeed.

CHAPTER IV.

Another fortnight had passed. Excursions had been made along the shore to where the huge billows thundered in. Digby has mastered his antipathy so far as to allow himself to be let down by a rope in company with Fraser to inspect the mummy caves, where, in the most inaccessible spots, the ancient inhabitants of the island buried their dead; and here Fraser had descanted upon facial angles, prognathic jaws, width of cheekbones, height of forehead, and the like, as he stood before Digby, Hamlet-like, holding an antique skull. Botanical specimens had been procured; geological examples collected, and packed in boxes for transit home; insects had been captured, and duly stuck; and the troglodytes of the island visited in their cavern villages, where they dwelt dirtily and securely in caves, which were similar to those used in the past by the Guanches as catacombs, being really huge ruptured bubbles formed by volcanic gases in the molten stone, when the great mountain of the interior poured forth in eruption the rock-formed fluid of the interior of the earth. While ever, night after night, as if drawn by a magnet, the two visitors found their way to Redgrave's house, where the master was gravely friendly, as he noted how his child's sad countenance lit up as the familiar footsteps were heard upon the silvery pumice-path.

Ramon raged and stormed. Redgrave forgot his Canary-Spanish education, and grew more English, displaying a bulldog obstinacy.

Then Ramon threatened as he showed his white teeth. "Mischief may come, my dear Redgrave," he whispered.

In an instant Redgrave's strong hand gripped him by the shoulder, and his gray eyes flashed fire into the Spaniard's dark orbs. "Don't try it," he said fiercely. "You have an Englishman and a Scot to deal with, sir, and those two together can beat the world, let alone Spain. Read your history, sir, if you don't believe. Your Spaniards fight with knives; we Englishmen with our fists. Knives break, fists break too, but they break people's heads. That's metaphorical, Senor Ramon, but there's a good deal of truth in it, all the same. Don't threaten, sir. You've got me down, but I might be dangerous if you tempted me to kick."

"My dear Redgrave, this is absurd," said Ramon. "You misunderstand me. We are the best of friends. I will say no more. We two cannot afford to quarrel. I look upon you as my father, yet to be."

From that moment Ramon was smiles and good-humor combined. Placid as one of the volcanoes of the island, sleeping and covered by time with grass and flowers, with nothing to tell that they were not pleasant mounds, till a stick was thrust in deeply, and then a faint vapour arose, invisible to the eye, but diffusing an odour of sulphur that was strangely suggestive of heat far down below.

Redgrave was always friendly to the two men, but he made no proposals for trips in the island; he never invited them to come.

"I'll do nothing," he used to mutter to himself. "My attempts always fail. I'll leave everything to fate."

"When are we to have this long-talked of

To both men that day was a dream of a wondrous journey upward along a flower-strown track towards a dense cloud, which soon after enveloped them, and through which they laboriously climbed to find themselves in a new region, where the air was cooler, and fragrant with the odour of the resinous pines through which they passed; and as Digby led Helen's mule, they talked little, but listened to the music of the birds and the gurgle of water, and caught from time to time among the tree-tops glimpses of the dazzling blue sky. They spoke but seldom, but went on with their eyes fixed upon Fraser and Redgrave, who led the way some fifty yards ahead, but stopped from time to time, for the laggards to overtake them, and admire some fresh view.

And all through that temperate summer zone the birds sung around them; and to Digby they sang only of love, and to Helen of what might be.

But the sadness in her breast suffused her eyes, with tears. There was a black shadow always before her; and when, after riding her mule through some rougher part, Digby turned to seek her gaze, she averted it with a sigh, but to own to herself that all this was very sweet, and she knew that she had never before enjoyed a day like this.

This fir-tree zone came to an end; the cool darkness and soft silence of the shady glade gave place to a rugged pumice-strown desert, where fine dust rose at every step, and the sun poured down with blinding power. A weary, weary tramp to some; but to those two who hung behind, a dreamy time of bliss, through which they journeyed on hour after hour, till a wooden hut was reached, where the mule was tethered; and Fraser now, at Redgrave's suggestion, offered his arm to help Helen up a cindery slope to the edge of the mountain crater, the party then descending a hundred feet or so into a hollow, where Fraser forgot everything but the delight he found in gathering specimens of sulphur crystals—pale straw colour, rich yellow, and brilliant scarlet.

"Yes, this is my last venture," said Redgrave suddenly. "My men come up here to dig the sulphur, of which there is no end, store it for me in the tent below, and we ship it off home. But you had better not stay long; the sulphur gas comes up strong to-day."

"What would happen if there was to be an eruption now, Mr. Redgrave?" said Digby.

"This party would never know," was the serious reply.

"Then I wish to goodness Senor Ramon were here, and this party safe at home, if it did blow up," said Digby in a half-whisper as he glanced at Helen, who shook her head at him sadly; and he saw her eyes fill with tears.

Fraser was a dozen yards away, stooping to pick up yet another crystal, while Redgrave was walking towards him.

"Forgive me," whispered Digby. "They were the words of a thoughtless boy."

Her look said so much that he caught her hand and raised it to his lips, but only got it to be drawn timidly away.

"Well, Fraser, when you're ready," said Redgrave. "It's a long way back; the wind's high; the gases bad, and the dust blows. It's very cold too.—Shall we go back?"

Fraser assented; and Digby gave way to him as he came forward to help Helen to climb up the side of the crater to the edge, whence, after a brief gaze round at the glorious view, they all descended to the hut, and partook of the luncheon they had brought. Helen remounted the mule, and Digby took the bridle once more as her father and Fraser went on.

The first part of the descent took place in silence, both Digby and Helen wondering how it was that they had not noticed that it was bitterly cold, the wind boisterous, and the dust that rose painful and wearying to a degree. They were conscious of nothing save that they were together in an idyllic dream, with a world of beauty spread out below.

Eight thousand feet, they had been told, was the height of the quiescent volcano; but the words had fallen upon deaf ears, for there was a question asking itself at the portals of their hearts: 'How is this to end?"

The sun was gething low in the west as the pine zone upon the mountain was reached; and once more in the dim obscuri y they seemed more dreamy and sweet than ever.

Fraser and Redgrave were well on ahead; the track wound here and there; but dim as the woodland became, the mule was familliar with the way, and paced slowly on with its bridle upon its neck, and Digby walking now with his hand upon the saddlebow.

"Helen!" he said, and his voice was a whisper among the pines.

She did not speak; but her hand was timidly resigned to his grasp, and the next moment his arms were about her. "My darling!" were his words; "I love you with all a man's first true love!"

There was no reply, a timid shrinking, and with a sob Helen let her head rest upon his shoulder, as if that were the place where she might find safety from the fate that seemed to her worse than death.

There was a strange grating noise, such as might have been made by a frightened bird, but it was caused by ivory gritting and grinding upon ivory.

Digby started round to see dimly, half-a-dozen yards away, Ramon standing by the bole of one of the thickest pines, while a cheery voice ahead shouted back: "Come, you people; don't lose your way."

The Larder of A "Liner."

We grumble at a hotel or on board ship if our food is not exactly what we desire, but few have any idea of the provision needed on one of the American liners. The passengers on the Royal Mail steamship Umbria, on one of her recent voyages from New York to Liverpool, consumed the following:—9,500 pounds of beef, 4,000 pounds of mutton, 900 pounds of lamb, 256 pounds of veal, 150 pounds of pork, 140 pounds of pickled legs of pork, 600 pounds of corned tongues, 700 pounds of corned beef, 2,000 pounds of fresh fish, 20 pounds of calves' feet, 18 pounds of calves' heade, 450 fowls, 240 spring chickens, 120 ducks, 50 turkeys, 50 geese, 600 squabs, 300 tins of sardines, 300 plovers, 175 pounds of sausages, 1,200 pounds of ham, 500 pounds of bacon, 10,000 eggs, 2,000 quarts of milk, 700 pounds of butter, 410 pounds of coffee, 87 pounds of tea, 900 pounds of sugar, 100 pounds of rice, 200 pounds of barley, 100 jars of jam and jelly, 50 bottles of pickles, 60 bottles of sauces, 20 barrels of apples, 14 boxes of lemons, 80 boxes of oranges, 6 tons of potatoes, 24 barrels of flour.—[Pall Mall Gazette.

Artificial Silk.

In the Paris exhibition is exhibited a collodion product of a remarkable character, neither more nor less than an artificial silk. To manufacture it pyroxyine was first prepared by the conversion of a specially pure cellulose, obtained from certain parts of young wood, and then dissolved in a mixture of thirty-eight parts of ether and forty two of alcohol. Through a series of concentric tubes the collodion is forced out, under pressure, in a stream, and then immediately

HOUSEHOLD.

Home Made Portieres.

The most elaborate effects may often be produced with very ordinary materials, and this is the secret which, once mastered, gives unlimited scope to the inventive talent of the home decorator.

A portiere for summer is often desirable for certain reasons: it leaves such a gap in the rooms when the heavy winter draperies are taken down, and yet they must be dispensed with in order to have the necessary circulation of air during the summer months. In this case a pretty substitute for a winter drapery is a portiere made of rope,—the ordinary cotton clothes-lines will do nicely if the macrame rope, which is sold for hammock hangings, etc., is not attainable.

A rope portiere is not difficult to make. Cut the rope in lengths to reach from the pole to within six inches of the floor, and attach each length to a ring. Make a tassel at the lower end by fringing out the rope about eight inches and tying a knot above. Variety may be afforded by using alternating lengths of rope, or arranging them in graduated lengths so that they will form points at the bottom.

If a curtain pole and rings are too expensive, use a rustic pole and screw in it, in a straight line, as many screw-eyes as there are lengths of rope, and attach each length of rope to a screw-eye; then fasten the pole up to the door casing with leather bands or a loop of rope. The expense of this really artistic hanging is only the price of the rope and a few cents for the screw-eyes. The portiere can be parted anywhere, as those of Japanese bamboo and beads are, and needs no looping, as it looks better hanging perfectly straight.

The Care of Shoes.

A woman who understands the economy of dress will never buy a cheap pair of shoes. No poorer investment can be made, for besides giving out in shorter time than a firstclass article it will look shabby and worn long before it should do so. But any shoe, no matter how costly or well-shaped in the beginning, will lose its freshness speedily if not properly cared for. This is especially applicable to those made of French kid, which every little bruise and touch turns purple. A rule observed by many women, and a good one it proves, too, is never to wear a street shoe in the house. It receives harder treatment, strange to say, from numerous inevitable collisions with articles of furniture than it would in double the amount of street wear.

Another sensible custom is to reserve a pair of boots for wet-weather wear leaving them to rest in a comfortable bag between times. Nothing tells against the beauty of footgear so much as getting it wet, and even with rubbers no amount of diligence will prevent the dampness from the skirts reaching the ankles. Shoes should be removed immediately on arriving at home, the dust and soil wiped away with a clean, soft rag, and then they should be placed together in a separate pocket of the shoe bag until wanted again. If this course is invariably pursued a considerable saving of money, time, and temper will be added to the increased service derived from even an inferior quality of leather.

Never wear a shoe unbuttoned if you care for its shapeliness, and never be satisfied when you do button it if all those little necessaries are not in place. The wearing of a shoe even once or twice with a pair or trio of buttons gone from it tells on its appearance in the long run. Patent button-fasteners are unsatisfactory, for if the shoe kettle, a layer of potatoes alternately till all are used. Season each layer with salt, pepper and sprinkle with a little flour. Pour enough boiling water into the kettle to cover the contents. Cook slowly till the potatoes are done, then add one pint of scalded milk. Split a dozen crackers, dip them in boiling water and lay in a tureen. Pour the chowder on the crackers. Serve the pork with it.

PIGEON PIE.—One and a half pounds of rump steak, two or three pigeons, three slices of cold boiled ham, pepper and salt to taste, two ounces of butter, four eggs, puff or other paste. Cut the steak into pieces about three inches square, and with it line the bottom of a deep pie dish, seasoning it well with pepper and salt. Clean the pigeons, rub them with pepper and salt inside and out, and put into the body of each rather more than half an ounce of butter; lay them on the steak, and a piece of ham on each pigeon. Add the yolks of four eggs, and half fill the dish with good stock; place a border of puff paste round the edge of the dish, put on the cover, and ornament it in any way that may be preferred. Clean the feet, and place them in a hole made in the crust at the top; this shows what kind of a pie it is. Glaze the crust, that is to say, brush it over with the yoke of an egg, and bake it in a well-heated oven for about an hour and a quarter.

British Investors in the U. S.

British capitalists have been investing their money in the most wholesale manner of late in the United States. Twenty-seven millions sterling are said to have gone into breweries alone; large sums have been expended on flour mills, and an immense purchase of dry goods houses is now proposed. In the midst of the flow of wealth into the Republic comes a note of warning to the capitalists who are thus pouring their money into a country which is anything but friendly to Britain, and of whose differing State laws and State rights they have little knowledge. It is pointed out that many of the individual States of the Union have adopted an extremely hostile attitude towards alien investors in their real estate, and that while the British capitalist will find himself safe in some States, in others he will run grave risks of losing his entire investment.. The laws of the State of Pennsylvania are extremely harsh in this particular, and the Minnesota Legislature has recently enacted that it shall be unlawful for any one who is not a citizen, or who does not propose to become one, or for any corporation not created by or under the laws of the Republic or of the State, to acquire, hold or own real estate. While means are often found to evade these requirements of the law, it will still be evident that considerable danger exists for the incautious or ignorant investor, and that if any hostile feeling should be aroused in the country, and it is easily done during election times, the British capitalist might have bitter cause for regretting his faith in the friendship of the United States people.

A recent cartoon in a New York paper hits off the present situation very well. John Bull is represented with a number of bags of gold hanging from his belt as approaching Uncle Sam with the remark! "It's a lot of trouble to buy you up piecemeal; what will you take for your whole blooming country, anyway?" Canadians cannot but wish that the British investor, in his own interest as well as in ours, would utilize more of his wealth than he now does in building up the great mining and other industries of which this country is capable, and which would afford him a safe and paying investment.

of alcohol. Through a series of concentric tubes the collodion is forced out, under pressure, in a stream, and then immediately solidifies by contact with water, the thread so produced being wound off on a bobbin. Next, this thread is denitrated by being soaked in weak nitric acid, which renders it insoluble in ether and alcohol, and also non-explosive. The threads are now dried and used as ordinary silk; they are capable of being dyed, and are about three-quarters of the textile strength of ordinary cocoon silk. In appearance it is stated to excel the natural product of silk-worm.

Character the Key to Success.

Two fundamental psychological elements to be always studied among any people are character and intelligence. Character is infinitely more important to the success of an individual or a race than intelligence. Rome in her decline, certainly possessed mor superior minds than the Rome of the earlier ages of the republic. Brilliant artists, eloquent rhetoricians, and graceful writers appeared then by the hundred. But she was lacking in men of manly and energetic character, who may perhaps have been careless of the refinement of art, but were very careful of the power of the city whose grandeur they had founded. When it had lost all of these, Rome had to give way to peoples much less intelligent but more energetic. The conquest of the ancient, refined, and lettered Græco-Latin world by tribes of semi-barbarous Arabs constitutes another example of the same kind. History is full of such.

A Submerged Forest.

During the late violent storms in the channel the sea washed through a high and hard sand bank near the Isle of St. Malo, France, nearly four meters thick, laying bare a portion of ancient forest which was already passing into the condition of coal. This forest at the beginning of our era covered an extensive tract of the coast; but with the sinking of the land it became submerged and covered up by the drifting sand. Mont Saint Michel once stood in the middle of it. The forest had quite disappeared by the middle of the tenth century. Occasionally, at very low tides after storms, remains of it are disclosed, just as at present. It is believed that some centuries ago the highest tides rose about 12 metres above the level of the lowest ebb. Now the high water level is 15 5 meters above the lowest.

The Manchester Ship Canal.

Anyone unconvinced by a sight of the canal itself that the task of making it is a serious one would assuredly be converted if he saw the plant and machinery at work. Though the canal is only 35 miles long, there are about 200 miles of railway line laid down on or near its banks, and 150 locomotives are at work upon them to remove the soil dug out by 15,000 human and 80 steam navvies. One of these latter has been known before now to feed full 650 railway waggons, holding four cubic yards apiece, in the course of a day. But when there are 50,000,000 cubic yards to be excavated 2,600 is a mere flea bite. In all the ground at the present moment is valued at upward £700,000.—[Murray's Magazine.

of a shoe even once or twice with a pair or trio of buttons gone from it tells on its appearance in the long run. Patent button-fasteners are unsatisfactory, for if the shoe draws even the least bit about the ankles the mental clamps show, and even the most persistent system of blackening fails to keep them from looking brassy.

A small box of round shoe-buttons with a curved needle and lengths of course linen thread already cut should have a place in the top drawer of every woman's dressing-case, or chiffonier. Then the task of replacing a missing button simplifies itself wonderfully. On children's shoes particularly the patent fastenings should never be used, for in their romps buttons, fasteners, leather and all are apt to disappear. A good plan to carry out regarding shoes for the little ones is to rub them well with castor oil before they are worn at all. This makes the leather pliable, fills up the pores, and prevents it from cracking. For their every-day shoes once in two weeks is not too often to oil them. At first the oil will give them a gray look, but after an hour or so is passed the finish they show is nice and soft.

If shoes get wet smooth them into as good shape as possible and place them in a medium warm atmosphere to dry. This takes a longer time than if dried close to the fire, but they will be in much better condition when wanted. Leather hardened by drying too suddenly can be restored by the application of castor oil well rubbed in.

Two or three breadths of ingrain carpet, according to the size of the space to be covered, and of the length required, sewed together, and hemmed at each end or bound with carpet binding, make a very nice rug, and so do lengths of Chinese matting put together in the same way. The breadths of matting will have to be joined together with twine, the two edges overhanded together loosely with a sail-needle, so that the edges will meet flatly when the matting is laid down. The ends may be bound with strips of scarlet or gray cloth, and the matting rug, when not in use, can be rolled up and set on end in a corner of the hall.

Choice Recipes.

CREAMED EGGS.—Slice in quite thick slices four hard boiled eggs, roll each slice in melted butter and coat with flour. Bring to boiling point one quart of sweet milk, add one teaspoonful of minced onion, two tablespoonfuls of butter, salt and pepper to season, and last of all add the eggs. Boil five minutes and serve hot.

COFFEE CAKE.—One pint of bread dough, one-half cup of butter, one cup of sugar, one teaspoonful of cinnamon; mix all well together, rolling into a thin sheet; after rising until light, place in baking pans. Let the cake rise until light, then cover the top of each with this mixture: two tablespoonfuls each of sugar and butter, one teaspoonful of cinnamon; beat well together, then spread over each cake and place in the oven five minutes. Serve warm or cold.

STEAMED INDIAN PUDDING.—One pint of granulated cornmeal, one pint of sour milk, one pint of chopped suet, one cupful of molasses, one tablespoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in one tablespoonful of hot water and added to the last thing (this is considered better than mixing soda with milk.) Steam three hours or longer and serve with molasses sauce. In summer-time add one pint of berries and one pint of apples. In using uncovered molds in steaming, the surface can be kept perfectly dry if the steamer is uncovered during the steaming.

FISH CHOWDER.—Cut three-and-a-half pounds of haddock into about eight pieces; fry three thick slices of salt pork slowly and take them up, chop a good-sized onion and fry in the fat, then having pared and sliced eight potatoes, put a layer of fish in the Popular Books.

Many people deplore the fact that fiction is by far the most popular sort of reading matter with patrons of public libraries. It is safe to say, moreover, that they lay the blame for this state of affairs to the younger readers. But there is evidence to show that this is a mistake. The New York "Commercial Advertiser" recently sent out a serious of questions respecting the class of books taken from public libraries, and the following answer given to one of them by he librarian at Indianapolis is substantially the same as that given by the officials at Columbus and Boston:

"The popular belief that boys and girls use the public library for the purpose of steeping themselves in fiction is not held by librarians nor borne out by facts. It is a common everyday sight to see a boy or girl pass proudly out from the library with a book much beyond their years, to be followed some time later by their kind, tender mother, or their hard headed father, with a very light novel. The statistics of reading in public libraries show that in every thousand volumns of fiction circulated, two-thirds are taken by adults and one-third by young readers."

It is to the seniors, therefore, that we must look for improvement in this matter.

Evidence that a Man is Fearfully and Wonderfully Made.

An old preacher, after services one Sunday, announced his reading for the following Sunday. During the week, some mischievous boys obtained his bible and pasted two of the leaves together, right where he was to read. Sunday morning coming, the aged divine opened his book, and read as follows: "and Noah took unto himself a wife who was"—and here he turned the leaf—'forty cubits broad, one hundred and forty cubits long." With a look of astonishment, he wiped his glasses, re-read and verified the passage and then said: "My friends, although I have read the Bible many times, this is the first time I have ever seen this passage, but I take it as another evidence of the fact that man is most fearfully and wonderfully made."

Defensive Theology.

Bennie is a bright five-year-old son of an editor. The other day he came home from a protracted tricycle ride.

"Bennie," said his father, "didn't your mother tell you not to go so far away from the house?"

"Y-e-s, papa, but the devil took my breath away and wouldn't let me remember."

"That's the old story about the devil," said Mr. Hughes, trying to look stern. "I'm afraid I shall have to spank that devil out of you."

"Oh, the devil flew out of me just as I entered the house," protested Bennie. "He said, 'Bennie, you're in for a spanking, and a spanking hurts, and I guess you'd better take it yourself.'"

Then and Now.

"In 1816," says a London exchange, "it took just one bushel of corn to buy one pound of nails; now one bushel of corn will buy ten pounds of nails. Then it required sixty-four bushels of barley to buy one yard of broadcloth; now the same amount of barley will pay for twenty yards of broadcloth. It then required the price of one bushel of wheat to pay for one yard of calico; now one bushel of wheat will buy twenty yards of calico."

HEALTH.

Care of the Sick.

He or she who could properly be intrusted to feed the seriously ill must know something of the qualities of different foods. Some foods in certain diseases have really a curative effect, as, for instance, coffee. A five-ounce cup of strong coffee contains about 66 grains of extract, or an equivalent to about two grains of caffeine—often quite sufficient to relieve neuralgia or a headache. Beef tea containing a generous quantity of red pepper is quite equal to drugs in the treatment of delirium tremens. In inflammation of the stomach and intestines, liquid food made of gelatine, isinglass, Irish moss and flaxseed, have a very soothing effect, and in some cases recovery takes place under their use alone.

And so we might go on with evidence of the curative effects of many foods. From what has been said people ought to be able to understand that the duties of the physician are by no means confined to drugging, and that when in any case he is limiting his treatment to dietetic means, he is doing what demands equally as much skill as would the proper administration of medicines. And here it is well to say that physicians of the present, whenever they can do so, employ Nature's simple dietetic remedies, always in preference to drugs. Life depends upon diet, and the restoration of health depends upon the same principles as its preservation. Disease is the result of the violation of the laws of health; hence the first step toward recovery is to establish those laws. The material for repair and support must come from diet, and often in disease a cure takes place under its proper administration alone.

There is yet one other point to bring forward in relation to feeding the seriously sick to show that the application of dietetic measures can never properly be intrusted to other than skilful hands. No two patients are alike, hence no two will scarcely demand exactly the same treatment. One may require that the nourishment be generous, in fact, all that the system can dispose of, and yet, for the other, ill with the same disease, a low diet will be much the best.

Want of Sleep.

Are you afflicted with insomnia? Perhaps you have too much time for sleep. Perhaps you depend too much on sleep for rest and recuperation. For sleep is not the sole rest of used-up nerves. Sociability, congeniality, enjoyment of good company rest the body quite as much as sleep.

The dreary monotony of life in many a household, involving this tumbling into bed with the mechanical regularity of a machine at nine or ten o'clock in the evening, does not always rest weary bodies. "Early to bed and early to rise" does not always make a man healthy, wealthy or wise.

Numbers of organizations are only capable of five or six hours' sleep at a time, and their early lying down to rest is often succeeded by an early waking up and a consequent restless tossing for hours preceding daybreak. The practisers of punctuality are often surprised after breaking their own cast iron rules, and passing two or three later hours of mirth and jollity past their usual bed time, to find themselves even more refreshed in the morning than usual. The relaxation of sociability has rested them more than would sleep or an attempt to sleep. But these are conditions not so easily reached in the average family.

In fashionable life we have a formal, exhausting and mechanical evening of more or less dissipation. On the other hand the

FROM THE UNITED STATES TO EUROPE.

A Railroad from Washington Territory Through British Columbia and Alaska.

It is highly probable that a railway from Spokane Falls to Alaska will be constructed within the next few years, said Mr. H. A. Johnston. I am on my way home from a business trip to Washington Territory, and while out there my attention was called to this project, and I spent considerable time looking into it. The movement is in its infancy, but it has the backing of the wealthy men of the Northwest and of the people of British Columbia, and I believe the road will be built. The idea looks strange and impracticable at the first glance, but, as a matter of fact, the obstacles to be encountered in the construction of such a line would not be as great as were met with by the Central Pacific and the Northern Pacific. It is proposed to begin the railroad at Spokane Falls, making that city the southern and eastern terminus. Competent engineers place the total cost at $130,000,000. Mr. Walter Moberly, engineer for the Government of British Columbia, has examined the proposed route, and believes the route could be built for less money per mile than the Canadian Pacific, and would prove profitable.

As to the route projected, it is necessary to explain the physical conditions of the country so that the feasibility of the plan may be seen. The Rocky Mountains enter British Columbia in about the longitude of Salt Lake City, and tend westward until they join the Alaska coast range, breaking in the northern part of British Columbia into three parallel ranges. The eastern range is the Rockies proper, the middle range is the Selkirks, and the western the Columbian range. The Columbia River rises in the valley between the Rockies and the Selkirks and flows north until it reaches the extremity of the latter range, around which it turns and flows back south between the Selkirks and Columbian ranges into Washington Territory. At the point where the Columbia turns the north end of the Selkirk range, it receives a strong tributary in the Canoe River. The road as projected would run along the valleys of the Columbia and the Canoe, then over the hills from Tate Cache, and down along the Fraser River to Front George. Thence it would have to cross a long, but not difficult pass to the valley of the Yukon, down which it would go to the mouth of that great river, a distance altogether of about 3,000 miles. The Yukon is bordered most of the way by a wide flood plain and terrace, and construction along its banks would be simple.

"Where would the road get its revenue?" was asked.

Well, to began with, it would touch the famous Kootenai valley, a splendid agricultural and cattle raising region. The people of Spokane Falls have for some time been figuring on a road eighty miles to the boundary to connect with a road for which a company of Canadians and Englishmen have secured a charter, from the boundary to the Canadian Pacific at Revelstoke, 200 miles further north. The English company will commence work this summer, and their road would form the first link in the Alaska road. This, however, is merely to show that the Kootenai region is valuable and that the Spokane Falls people know it. There are a great many mines and rich deposits of ore along the Columbia, and an English company is building a smelter at Revelstoke to handle them. Nearly every stream running into the Columbia carries float gold. The Canoe River runs through a great fur and embryo mining region, and from the Yukon come gold, furs, and timber, and from its mouth the seals. All along the route of the road is Indian Medicine Men and War Dancers.

The habits and customs of some of the Western tribes are so little known to the general reader that, perhaps, a description of some of their curious practices may be of some interest. Mr. Paul Beckwith has published an interesting paper on the Dakotahs in the last report of the Smithsonian Institution, and among other things he remarks that the medicine man or high priest is invariably a chief, and although he maintains his sway by the use of mysteries and incantations, nevertheless at times shows a power which is not understood by those outside of the cult or brotherhood, and through a knowledge of the medicinal properties of herbs often performs cures that lead one to believe he is not altogether the charlatan he is represented. His cures are often the wonder of the army surgeons.

An incident in point is cited in the case of an Indian who one day came staggering into camp with his leg horribly swollen from a bite of a venomous snake. The camp surgeon could do nothing for the sufferer, but he was completely cured by the medicine man. Another case is quoted in which a cataract of the eye was cured by inserting brass filings into the affected organ. To impress upon the mind of the patient the divine nature of his medicine, the medicine man adds to the efficacy of his remedy mysterious pantomimes, contortions of the body and features, always to a drum accompaniment. If the patient is affected with a serious ailment, he places a paper or bark figure on the round, and, while the patient is held over it he fires a gun, by which act the sickness passes into the image in the ground and is killed by the discharge of the gun. They claim that all this power is received from the Great Spirit, who confers upon them a spiritual medicine so powerful that they can kill at will, resuscitate the dead, and cure the sick. This spiritual medicine is represented by anything that strikes the fancy, as a bunch of feathers, a claw, a bird, or the head of an animal.

When a council is held, a barricade is erected in the form of an ellipse, and a tent is raised at each end of the inclosure, one for the high priests or medicine men and the other for ten men who have been selected to keep order and conduct the ceremony, acting as a sort of police. The high priest, from his seat in the medicine tent, appoints your assistants, one bearing a drum, one a willow and stick, one a rattle, and the last assisting by grunting. A big drum in the center of the circle is being constantly beaten by several drummers. The high priest then speaks to them of the holy dance which was founded centuries ago, and tells them of the power of the medicine of their ancestors and warning skeptics not to scoff at them or their crafts, as they have the power of thrusting a claw or stone through the body of any one at will, causing instant death. In proof of this assertion, he calls one of his assistants to him and points towards him with the medicine bag, at the same instant puffing at him with his lips, whereupon the assistant falls to the ground apparently senseless.

Then the priest salaams to the four points of the compass, and invokes the Great Spirit to aid him and the other members present in bringing the dead brother to life.

The drums are then beaten and a frantic dance is begun, when the lifeless form gradually returns to consciousness and spits into his hand a mass of froth and blood in which is found a claw or a stone. The high priest now dances around the circle, and waving his medicine bag, blows upon some one else, who in the same manner, falls to the ground senseless. The chief continues, and the "dead men," reviving, assist in shooting others, until the inclosure is full of howling savages dancing, yelling, and shooting

In fashionable life we have a formal, exhausting and mechanical evening of more or less dissipation. On the other hand the evenings of great numbers of families are monotonous humdrum. They involve the assemblage of the same people, the same surroundings, the same paterfamilias yawning over his paper, and the same queurlous mamma overladen with family cares. Fresh people with fresh thought, fresh atmosphere, anything to stir up and agitate the pool of domestic stagnation, are sadly needed and sadly scarce. There needs to be also a constant succession of such fresh people to bring about these results. The world is full of men and women, and in a better regulated life it would be the business after the day's work was done to entertain each other, and give each other fresh life. As it is now, hundreds if not thousands of our households are little better than cells for the incarceration of each family. Thousands are thus worn out prematurely from the utter lack of domestic recreation. There might be written over the graves of hundreds of thousands, "Bored to death by the stagnation of domestic life."—[The Christian at Work.

Ice-Water.

There is a great deal of sentiment and many opinions regarding the use of ice-water that vanish when the light of reason and experience is turned upon them. The fact is, that ice-water, drank slowly and in moderate quantities, constitutes a healthful and invigorating drink. There is no doubt that ice is a great sanitary agent, and every family ought to be provided with it during the warmer months of the year. It is true that the inordinate use of ice-water, or its use under some special conditions and circumstances, is attended with great danger, so is the improper use of any other drink or food. The assumption that iced water is dangerous, and that iced tea, or iced coffee, or iced lemonade is a harmless substitute, is simply a delusion. As the source of danger feared by some is the degree of cold, we fail to see clearly how flavor modifies the effect of temperature. There are some individuals, undoubtedly, who cannot drink ice-water without injury, and who ought never to use it, but to a great majority of persons it is refreshing and healthful. Its use, temperate and discrete, is in no way to be condemned, which cannot be said of some of its substitutes.—[Sanitary Volunteer.

Hyena-Spearing in India.

The hyena, though a most useful scavenger, is not a noble looking animal, and his nature is decidedly currish. He is not a beast usually selected for the chase, but affords a certain amount of fun when nothing better is to be had. Many a sportsman, when disappointed in finding boar, has had a run after a hyena. These beasts do not go at any great pace or charge like a brave old boar, yet they are not easy to spear, by reason of the quickness with which they turn and twist. The animal has just turned sharp at right angles, and thrown out the man who is about to spear him, letting another out in, while the horse of a third, putting his foot in a hole, comes down, and then, getting rid of his rider continues the chase on his own account, biting and striking at the hyena, which makes no attempt to resent this strange onslaught. We observe that Mr. Moray Brown, in his excellent book, "Shikar Sketches," mentions a similar incident. But doubles and turns can not always save the hyena; at last a well-directed spear-thrust ends his career on earth and finishes the difficult pursuit.

When a man goes out for a "spin" on the road he should use a "top" buggy.

River runs through a great fur and embryo mining region, and from the Yukon come gold, furs, and timber, and from its mouth the seals. All along the route of the road is valuable country either for mining, salmon fisheries, agriculture, stock raising, or timber.

"Would not the snow and ice prevent the operation of such a road?"

That is apparently the greatest difficulty. Any one at first would think that the climate would be an insurmountable difficulty, but it is positively asserted by those who ought to know that the climate would cause no more trouble than it does on the Northern and Canadian Pacific. You know that the ocean breezes temper the climate all along the coast, and and it is very little colder in Sitka than it is in New York. Now, this road would run west of the mountains all the way, and the further north it gets the nearer does it go to the coast, so that the climate would be comparatively temperate all the way.

The road would be operated for the joint use and benefit of British Columbia and the United States, and it is proposed to have the province contribute its proportion of the cost in lands, and the United States to give its guarantees for the payment of interest for twenty years on $50,000 per mile of the cost.

There is another important point in connection with this road. The Russian Government is now engaged in building a railroad across Siberia and down the Amoor to its mouth. A road is also projected from the main line on the Amoor into Kamschatka, and to some port on Behring's Strait, only a short distance from the mouth of the Yukon. This line, in connection with the Alaska road would form a practically all rail route from Europe to the United States.

Victimized Innocence.

Not long since a Yankee made his appearance in the goodly Dutch town of German Flats, professing to be a schoolmaster, and commenced preparations for opening an English school. The honest Dutchmen, delighted with the project, received him kindly, entertained him hospitably and stood ready, as soon as the necessary preliminaries could be provided, to patronize his undertaking. Under these circumstances the Yankee purchased of one of them a very fine horse, giving his note at six months from date as the purchase money.

Shortly after this both the Yankee and the horse were missing, and a neighbor, meeting with the former owner of the horse, said to him:

"So, Hans, you have lost dat der horse of yours?"

"How so?"

"Why, dot Yankee you sold him to has run away mit him."

"Val, vat do I care for dot; hain't I got his note?"

What is Fog?

In an interesting letter to "Science," H. A. Hazen, of Washington, gives some interesting and valuable particulars respecting the properties and nature of fog. He says that it is admitted that fog is simply cloud composed of water dust or solid minute spheres of water from 1-7,000 to 1-00,0.0 of an inch in diameter. Many have supposed that a dust particle must be the nucleus for each sphere, but an examination under the microscope of evaporated fog has proved that such is not the case. Briefly stated, the cause of fog is as follows:—It is essential that there be no wind. The sky must be clear. The air must be saturated or nearly so. The formation of fog is a purely mechanical process, unaccompanied with heat.—[New York Heraldc.

ground senseless. The chief continues, and the "dead men," reviving, assist in shooting others, until the inclosure is full of howling savages dancing, yelling, and shooting each other. The dancing is kept up in the most frantic manner. After a certain length of time the four assistants, who have been trotting around the ring faster and faster, form in line, and after advancing and retreating several times, thrusts the instruments into the hands of others who become their successors and then take seats, and now represents the gods of the north, south, east, and west, the high priest representing the Great Spirit, or Wan-kan-tanka. When a new member is initiated, he is taken into the council tent for instructions, which are secret. He is then stripped of his clothing, excepting an apron about his loins and moccasins on his feet. He is then painted entirely black except a small red spot between his shoulders. The candidate is exhorted to be good, and is told that his medicine will be correspondingly powerful, and he must also give a feast once a year. If he does not, he will meet with misfortunes, sickness, or death. The candidate now receives the holy claw or stone. The medicine man, approaching him from the east, describes the course of the sun with the medicine bag, and bowing to the four points of the compass, mutters an incantation, and thrusting the bag toward him says, "There goes the spirit." The candidate then falls prostrate, and blankets, skins, ornaments, etc., are thrown as offerings over the candidate. At command of the high priest the novice recovers and is presented with the medicine bag, becoming a recognized member of the order. After these ceremonies the feast begins, and the food which has been cooking before the tent of the assistants is distributed among the people. The dance lasts from daybreak to daybreak of the day following, and as these dances are frequently given in winter with the thermometer often far below zero, it may easily be imagined how the candidates must suffer, clad as they are in a coat of paint. It is generally understood that the members of the orders have secret signs and passes, but the penalty of exposure is so sure and swift, that none of the secrets are ever divulged. There are well known instances in which indiscreet members have mysteriously but permanently disappeared, at the instance, it is supposed, of the medicine men.—[Scientific American.

Flossie Improves the Occasion.

Flossie had been eating intemperately of watermelon.

"Mamma," she said, pressing her hands wearily on her stomach, "My sash is just like a window sash, isn't it?"

"In what way, dear?" asked the mother, smilingly.

"Because it's around the pains," she replied, demurely.

"Give me a proof of your love, George,' she said, and George did so by the manifold process.

The White Hart of Southwark, one of England's most famous inns, whose history goes back five centuries, is being pulled down. It has been associated with Jack Cade and Mr. Pickwick. Shakespeare makes Cade say, in "Henry VI.": "Will you needs be hanged with your pardons about your necks? Hath my sword therefore broke through London gates, that you should leave me at the White Hart in Southwark?" Then in "The Chroncole if the Grey Friars" it is recorded that "at the Whyt Harte, in Southwarke, one Hawaydyne of Sent Martyns was beheddyd" in 1450. But more interesting than these events was the fact that here Mr. Pickwick first met Sam Weller, the White Hart boots.

The Earth's Fiery Ordeal.

There are in the Scriptures and sacred writings of most of the ancient races terrible prophecies of a fiery ordeal through which the earth and its people must some day pass. We wonder with more or less curiosity if such a fate be actually in reserve for our planet, and we interrogate science if, perchance, we may discover any evidence of such a possibility.

Science has no direct information to give us, but the astronomer exhibits a circle of the heavens filled with what he believes are the ponderous fragments of an enormous planet, which has been shattered by some violent convulsion. The geologist shows us vast continental areas of dry land which have, as he believes, once been deep down under the sea, and the historian presents us with traditions of lands and people that have been swallowed up in the abysses of the ocean. There are stories of stars that have flamed into brilliance and finally disappeared as if they had been consumed in a conflagration, while the earthquakes and volcanic eruptions which shake our planet announce the actual survival of forces and agencies that make possible the most terrible cataclysm, and seem to suggest for the future disturbances as profound and formidable as any that ever occurred in any past age.

It is in this connection that we are led to consider some recent utterances on the subject of the enormous volume of inflammable gas stored up in the crust of the earth and recently brought into use for the most important economical purposes. There is an area of country in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio and perhaps other States, embracing many thousand square miles, which is underlaid with the most extraordinary and extensive stores of coal oil and coal gas. In the past twenty-five years oil has been taken out to the extent of millions on millions of barrels, while gas is escaping at the rate, as it has been recently estimated, of 1,000,000,000, cubic feet each day. The flow of both oil and gas is so great that the belief is warranted that the supplies, notwithstanding the extraordinary daily depletion, are still enormous.

Beyond the existence of this gas and oil and of the coal beds, which also underly the greater portion of the United States, we know actually nothing of subterranean conditions; but if we can assume the presence at great depths in the earth, of fire or of sufficient heat-making agencies to operate on the coal beds we may well imagine that by the action of such heat the petroleum is distilled from the coal and the gas is, at the same time, liberated, but both remain stored up in cavities or in the pores of the earth until extracted by the borings. As long as these accumulations of gas and oil remain sealed up in the depth of the earth, away from actual fire, there is no risk of a conflagration. The entire possibility of such danger is dependent upon the existence of fire and on its contact, under favorable conditions, with these inflammable compounds.

As the oil and gas are drawn out water and air will find their way into the cavities thus vacated, and the geologists have forecasted a possible period when by some such operation all the water now appearing upon the surface of the land will sink into the cavities of the earth. This necessary fluid will then only be attainable by drawing it from wells of extraordinary depth. It is even held that the moon is one of these dry planets, being destitute of surface water, which has sunk into the dry and honey-combed interior of that body. This water, coming in contact with the interior fires of the moon, produced terrific internal throes and volcanic eruptions which continued to wreck the moon until its fires were extinguished, and it became, as it is now believed to be, a dead, dry planet.

of that body. This water, coming in contact with the interior fires of the moon, produced terrific internal throes and volcanic eruptions which continued to wreck the moon until its fires were extinguished, and it became, as it is now believed to be, a dead, dry planet.

Coming back to our own prospects for a conflagration, it would be necessary for the gas in the earth to be sufficiently mixed with oxygen to make it inflammable. This could occur from the air which is supposed to enter the cavities of the earth to take the place of the escaped gas, or oxygen could be supplied by the decomposition of the water into its constituent elements through the action of heat. There is no certainty that the heart of the earth is a mass of fire, although it is so held to be by some of the theorists; but it would be easy enough to secure fire there by electrical or chemical action, or both. A powerful current of terrestrial electricity trying to pass through a formation of poor conducting power would easily burst into flame, or water poured upon a bed of quick lime would produce a like result.

A Broken Jumping-Jack.

If General Boulanger hoped to fire the French heart when he penned the bombastic pronunciamento which he recently issued bearing his name and the signatures of Count Dillon, and the bully and blackguard Lewis Rochefort, he was unlucky in his choice of material. The French are an excitable race. One day they dedicate museums; the next day they are shooting each other across a street barricade. They have impetuously responded to Boulanger's previous appeals. He has done little in the last two years but demand and receive vindications. The ministry would take some action which he would construe into an affront. He would issue a bulletin and demand a vindication. Some department would return him. He was charged with complicity in the decoration scandal; immediately he was vindicated by an election from another department. He was banished and—elected; he was deprived of his rights—and now another proclamation and the announcement that he is to stand for election in eighty districts at once.

There is something intensely alluring to the Frenchman in Boulanger. He realizes his ideal of the "man on horseback"—military glory. There is about him just enough of the successful soldier and just enough of the charlatan to please the craving of the French nature for romance and sensation. He can always be depended on to be picturesque and startling, and those are the chief qualifications of a French hero. He is an enigma. Promoted for proficiency in the science of war, he is a failure as a political leader; decorated for personal bravery, he betrays his friend and patron He is a riddle, a sphinx, a jack in-box which whenever the ministry shuts the lid, bobs up with a proclamation, which always secures him a re-election from somewhere

Of late however, there have been signs that the French are becoming bored with Boulanger. He is passe. They are volatile, and easily see fresh heroes. Even Buffalo Bill—William le Buffle, as they call him—has served to attract attention to the exiled mischiefmaker. The tone of his latest manifesto shows that he realizes this, for in his vain attempt to call attention to himself he loses his temper and descends to mere jawing. His mistake was in leaving France. He should have staid in Paris and fought it out. They would have jailed him, but what of that? No man is a hero of the Boulanger sort until he has been martyred. There's nothing like martyrdom to raise sympathy. Then, too, it is a long way from Dover to Calais, and shout as the little general will the strong winds of the channel will not be roared down. We are afraid Boulanger's name is soup.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, AUG. 23, 1889.

Another liberal victory was scored in the British House of Commons on Friday evening last, when Mr. Smith the Government leader announced that the Tithes bill was withdrawn and the Government would not introduce a new measure. The cause of all this commotion was the narrow escape the government had on the amendment moved by a liberal, to the effect that the Landlords instead of the tenants, be made responsible for the payment of the Tithes. It makes a good deal of difference in England, as elsewhere, whose ox is gored. When your come to put the saddle on these "high and mighty" people you soon hear the cry of galled backs.

Behring Sea Seizures and the Monopolists

The question as towho authorized theseizure of the Black Diamond sealing vessel is one that will not down very easily. Did the instructions given to Capt. Shepard authorize him to seize vessels engaged in seal killing outside of the three mile limit on the high sea, or did the valiant captain in his zeal to protect the interests of the monopolists, exceed his duty, and instead of carrying out his instructions proceed to commit an act of piracy on the high sea. The facts are that the United States Government have been running wild on monopolies, and have at last put their foot in it, by chartering a company and giving said company the exclusive privilege of killing seal east of an imaginary line drawn from the Arctic Ocean through Behring Straits and sea, and as these monopolists demand of the United States Government their pound of flesh, the latter have been compelled to make as how of protanecting them, by sending acruiser to guard industry, inimicable to the rights of others. This illegal protection, as it ever does, is leading to consequences the most serious; time alone will tell how serious. It is only another chapter in the history of monopolies, which have cursed every country under the sun; under the guise of protective tariffs or a National Policy, the greedy and selfishtry to clothe themselves with the respectability of law and ply their nefarious schemes to fleece the honest, hardworking sons of toil. Before the United States gets through with this business they will find "the way of the transgressor is hard" in more ways than one. Perhaps a Tory Government in England may be inclined to wink at this matter, but the people of England will hold them to a strict account as will the people of this country hold the Canadian ministry if any attempt is made to pass over this piractical seizure. That it was such we subjoin an article from Harper's weekly which shows very plainly the unfounded pretensions to jurisdiction in Behring Sea.

The seizure of the British sealing sch. Black Diamond in Behring sea by the qualified jurisdiction is asserted is common both to Great Britain and to the United States. It is the protection of the seal fishery which would be soon exterminated if the ravages, which the seizures are intended to prevent, should continue. The situation, therefore, is obviously one for the calmest deliberation. The Canadians certainly cannot be allowed to destroy the seal fisheries. But they are not to be restrained by a claim of authority which cannot be maintained. It must be remembered constantly, however, that this claim is not made. We have not yet defined our dominion in the Alaska waters and we are not likely to make a claim there which would imperil our interests and rights elsewhere. This is evidently the general American view, as expressed by the press on all sides, and a prompt and reasonable adustment of the question by negotiations would be most honorable to the administration."

Obituary.

Mary Cooley, relicit of the late Peter Weese, was born in Oneida County, N. Y., in 1804. She came to Canada in 1823 and was married one year later. They settled on a farm in Ernesttown, and success crowned their efforts so that they acquired a competency and retired to Newburgh. After the death of her husband she removed to Napanee, to reside with her nephew, W. G. Baughan, Adelphi-street. During the latter years of her life, she suffered much from a fractured limb, and later from paralysis of the right side. She bore her sufferings with patience. She was converted at a camp meeting held on the farm of the late Henry Shibley, of Portland, in 1832, was connected with the Methodist church for a period of 57 years and died at the ripe old age of 89 years and 25 days, on August 9th, 1889, in sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection.

Congratulations to Councillor Denis Daly.

As announced last week, nominations to fill the vacancy in the council caused by the death of Charles Lane, took place on Wednesday at noon. But little interest was taken in the matter. Councillor Jehiel Aylsworth nominated Denis Daly and John Stevenson seconded the nomination. Mr. G. F. Robinson nominated W. D. Madden and the nomination was seconded by Mr. Caretaker Hearns. Neither of the candidates were present but we interviewed them both yesterday afternoon. Mr. Madden has decided to retire from the field, leaving a clear course for Mr. Daly. Denis ought to make a good councillor. He has a level head and has earned for himself the reputation of being a shrewd, careful business man. It is generally safe to trust public affairs to men who have made a success of their own business and here again Denis has shown his fitness for the position he is now called upon to fill. We extend our heartiest congratulations to Mr. Daly and also to the people of the West Ward.

shows very plainly the unfounded pretensions to jurisdiction in Behring Sea.

The seizure of the British sealing sch. Black Diamond in Behring sea by the United States Revenue Cutter Rush, in pursuance of the President's proclamation of March 22d 1889, has been the main topic of recent discussion in the press. This was a seizure far without the three mile limits of jurisdiction which every maritime power controls. It was a seizure upon the high seas, and the substantial question, in view of a probable demand for explanation, is whether the United States have formally claimed jurisdiction over the Behring sea, as a closed sea, or mare clausum; what such a sea is, is perfectly well known.

A land locked sea is defined by Vattel, as one which "must be entirely surrounded by the territory of the nation claiming jurisdiction, and must have no other communication with the ocean than by a channel of which that nation may take possession." This is the accepted discription of a mare clausum. It is affirmed by what is called International Law, which is only the acquiescence of great States for their common convenience. Does the Behring Sea conform to this definition, or is it admitted by a common consent of States to be such a sea. The answer to both questions is an unconditional negative. The Behring Sea on one side is enclosed by the Russian main land and Russiam Islands, and the passage between the nearest Russian and American points is one hundred and eighty three miles broad. This fact answers the first question. The second is as readily answered. When Russia held all the surrounding land. They made a claim of authority over the Behring Sea, which the United States denied and refused to acknowledge. Our demonstration of the case was complete, and Russia did not insist on the claim. Moreover, we have always assered the right to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, although it is entirely surrounded by British territory, and the channel between Newfoundland and Cape Breton is only fifty miles broad. As the United States have denied that the Behring Sea is enclosed, no other great power except Russia has asserted it. In 1870, however, the treaty with Russia by which we acquired alaska difined our water boundary by a line "starting from the Artic Ocean and running through Behring strait to the the north of St. Lawrence Island," then south westerly midway between Alton, and Copper Islands.

In 1881 the treasury department instructed our naval officers, that all the waters within that boundary are considered to be the waters of Alaska Territory. Mr. Cleveland's administration in 1885 adopted this view and many arrests of British sealers were made. A strong protest followed from the British Government and the vessels were released. In consequence of the release a great number of British sealers appeared in the sea. Congress then took up the subject and prohibited the catching of seals within the Dominion of the United States in Behring Sea, except by the Alaska Commercial Company. But Congress distinctly refused to claim that the waters of Alaska Territory composed the whole Behring Sea eastward of the line mentioned in the treaty. The law assumed jurisdiction but did not define its limits. Do the United States claim dominion over the Behring sea east of the line mentioned. If they do they derive their title solely from Russia. But they have long ago demonstrated that Russia could have no such title. The United States, however, have not claimed, but on the contrary, by the action of Congress, have declined to claim a jurisdiction which the common consent of nations, the United States included, has denied. Moreover, the object for which the carefully lower cables, buyers offered for the most of the lots 9¼ cents, which was not accepted. At the close of the Board Mr. President Potter and Director Gibbard, on behalf of the Agricultural Society addressed the Board with the view of making arrangements for a special prize to be offered to factories for colored and white cheese, to be shown at the Lennox Agricultural Society's show, to be held in Napanee, October 8th and 9th. Through the liberality of the buyers and representatives of the numerous factories in the district, it has been decided to offer two prizes for each kind of cheese, colored and white. The first prize in each class will be a beautiful gold medal, value, $15, while the second prize will be a silver medal, value, $10. These will be "open for competition" to all Ontario factories, only one prize to be awarded to any factory in each class. Foreign judges are to award the prizes. We hope to see every factory, in this district at least, represented.

Special Announcement.

We have made arrangements with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases" which will enable all of our subscribers to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address (enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., Enosburg Falls, Vt. This book is now recognised as standard authority upon all diseases of the horse, as its phenominal sale attests, over four million copies having been sold in the past ten years, a sale never before reached by any publication in the same period of time. We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

TEA EXTRAORDINARY !

Having recently secured an extraordinary good bargain in tea, we intend to share it with our customers.

Heretofore we have given extra good value in Tea at 25 cents per pound, but the fifty chests just received would be "dirt cheap" at 45 cents, and 25 cents is what we shall sell it at. We venture to say and we have had many years experience in the tea trade, that nothing to compare with it has ever been sold in Napanee at that price.

To those who want to save money and at same time enjoy a choice cup of Tea, we say come and get a pound and we feel certain it will cause you to come for more.

A CAVE AT BATH.

The Newest Attraction at the Ancient Village—A New Species of Fish.

The recent landslide on the farm of Mr. Lasher has brought to light a subterraneous cave of sufficient size to accommodate a large number of persons. It is octagon in shape, and the roof is upheld by pillars or ledges of limestone regularly laid up in layers of shelly stone about four inches, or a hand's breadth, in thickness. The floor of the cave is covered with debris of the shelly stone, but the walls are of sufficient height to admit of a medium sized man to stand erect in any part of the cave. A small stream of water winds itself through one side of the cave and now finds an outlet at the mouth of the cave into the Bay of Quinte. The stream is about the width of four feet and a depth of eighteen inches, and forces itself through the rear of the cave from a large crevice in the rock. The water is muddy, and abounds with numerous small fish of a species hitherto unknown in these quarters. On emerging from the crevice they are very lively, but indulge in queer contortions on coming into the light, apparently as if suffering the most excruciating agony on leaving the darkness. They are cone shaped, with scales of a pinkish hue, which emit a crackling sound when handled. As far as can be ascertained from the naked eye they are devoid of seeing properties, as no eyes are visible. The cave bids fair to become a place of resort, and will add much to the attractions at Bath. In the northeast corner bubbles forth a boiling spring, said to be similar to the celebrated "Deep Rock" water at Oswego. Mr. Lasher is highly elated with the prospects, and next season will advertise it in all the leading papers, and transform his spacious and elegant private residence into a mammoth hotel, and dispense the newly-found health-giving waters to all who may visit his resort.

News From Manitoba.

Deloraine, Man.

Thinking perhaps the many readers of your valuable paper would like to hear how this part of the Prairie Province is flourishing I take the opportunity of writing a few lines :

This has been a remarkable year in more ways than one. Seeding was done, or nearly so, by 1st May. Then early in May there was a fine rain which was unusual for this Province, With early seeding and an early rain to bring the grain up the prospects perhaps never were brighter for a bountiful harvest, but June, the proverbial rainy month, failed to be so this year, and June and July being hot, with hot, dry winds, and then the destructive gopher, with the elements, nearly destroyed the prospects of a crop at all, but after all, in a great many localities, on land well tilled, where the gophers have been poisoned and trapped, a yield ranging from 8 to 15 or 20 bushels per acre, will be harvested. I have been watching Ontario papers to see what accounts they give of crop prospects here, but reports are very conflicting, as they are in the Manitoba Press. It seems hard for the correspondents of the Manitoba Press to admit they have a poor crop this year, yet intelligent writers who are posted and have the good of the country at heart admit the fact nevertheless.

I here quote a few paragraphs by Egins, of the Winnipeg Sun. He says that those who keep on talking of a 15 bushel average of wheat and a surplus for export of ten million bushels, are no true friends of the country. He says, giving our best class of crops all the credit possible for the advance they have made the last three

The above property must be sold as I am about entering other business.

The undersigned offers also to sell Lot No. 1, and half of east half of Lot No. 2, in the 15th Concession of Sheffield, joining the other said land. It contains 262 acres. There is on Lot No. 1 a frame barn; about 50 acres are under good cultivation;

Very quiet here, no trouble only a fellow tried to anger a soldier, so he left a mark on his antag.

Mrs. J. Hogle and daughter Annie have returned from a tour east.

Fred Miller, son of the late S. K. Miller, dislocated his ankle the other day, Dr. Kennedy reduced the fracture. He is doing well.

We hear the whistle of the steam thresher round about our hamlet, grain is turning out fairly, barley some shady, but the farmers are like the old woman with her children, everyone thinks theirs the whitest.

Some sickness here, Mr. John Wallace is very low, Mrs. Denne is quite ill. Roddie Kennedy had quite a severe attack.

There were quite a number of strangers at the Methodist Church Sunday evening.

Visitors.—Mrs. Bedford, of Morrisburgh, is visiting her brother Mr Rouse.

Mrs. Kingsby, of Rome, New York, at Mr. C. L. Rogers last week.

Mr. L. A. Purdy's, son and daughter, from Brighton, are visiting at Mr. H. Armstrong's.

A few strangers are at the Bay View House.

Mr. Minaker has gone to Gananoque to visit her daughter Mrs. Storey.

Mr. J. Ross Allen has gone to Sandhurst to resume teaching.

Our school does not commence until Monday 26th inst., we will be glad to hear the school bell ring again.

The Latest Attraction.

The Kingston News is responsible for the following: A few days ago, on a farm near Peterboro', Ont., a lad was driving a team of horses attached to a reaper which was cutting grain in a wheat field. A dog was lying asleep in the grain, and the reaper cut of his tail and hind legs. The howling of the dog frightened the horses, which ran away, the boy fortunately jumping clear of the machine, and escaping unhurt. When the horses and reaper arrived at the other side of the field, at a fence, it was found that forty-seven sheaves of grain were on the machine table, which had been cut and bound in transit, and no injury had been done to the machinery. The dog, hearing the racket ran after the runaway horses and caught the bridle of one of them before they could turn and start away from the fence. The tail and legs of the dog were found securely bound up among the sheaves of grain. This machine and the dog, it is expected, will be on exhibition at the forthcoming Midland Central Fair. American farm machinery manufacturers should come to Canada for new and useful ideas in their line of business.

A New Business College.

Mr. Robert Boyle has been busily engaged in constructing a spacious Business College in Belleville. The building is 110x157 feet, from these dimensions the immense size of the building will be understood. it is to be finished in the most modern style, toilet conveniences for both sexes, gymnasium, reading room, in short everything which can be deemed necessary for a fully equipped institution. The course of study will embrace all that is usually taught, including book-keeping by new and improved methods, the the addition of agricultural, chemestry, use of writieg machines, elocution, in short no effort will be spared by the founder to give the young people who shall patronize the college a fully rounded business education. We predict for the Belleville Business College a billiant and useful career.

of wheat and a surplus for export of ten million bushels, are no true friends of the country. He says, giving our best class of crops all the credit possible for the advance they have made the last three weeks, (this is under date of Aug. 8th) they are not so good as to cover the big blanks made on the stubble ploughing and by drought and gophers. He says further that if he were a betting man he would readily snap up all who say that the wheat crop will average 12 bushels per acre. I also send you a clipping from the Delorraine Times of July 25th, which gives the estimated average at 10 bushels. Why is it that people cannot get a true account of crops here?

I will give you a few samples of the exaggeration of crop reports. G. T. Dodds, of Melitta, sends a sample of wheat to the Times office, the shortest straw forty-four inches, giving that as a sample of crop about Melitta, but how did he get it? By driving the country and picking the largest wheat he could find, and representing that as a fair sample. When the fact is, in that locality there has been plenty of wheat cut with the mower as too short for binding, and then sends a sample four feet long as a sample of eighty acres. When its doubtful if there is eighty acres in one field in the Province four feet high. I quote one more, one writer in a Winnipeg papers, stated that around Portage, land would yield thirty bushels per acre without a particle of rain in summer. Now what are the facts? Is there a field around Portage (even with considerable rain) that will yield that amount this year? I have been asked by my correspondent how I like this country, I will give a few of the objections I have. One is the uncertainty of harvesting a crop it can be raised, no doubt of that, but before it is ripe or nearly so, along comes a frost or hail or the gopher, and the work of months is gone. Another objection is the prevailing high winds, I think they dry out the soil more than continued dry weather. I will give a sample of one day's wind that memorable 28th of June the wind was blowing a gale with the thermonter at from 95 to 105 in the shade, at times it seemed like a breath from a furnace. The damage is incalculable that was done that day to vegetation, and still another objection is the scarcity of good water for drinking purposes. We hear in Ontario, how easy it is to get hay, but this year we have gone ten, twenty and fifty miles and glad to get it even at that distance.

Harvesting is general here now.

PARISH OF SELBY

The undersigned offers also to sell Lot No. 1, and half of east half of Lot No. 2, in the 15th Concession of Sheffield, joining the other said land. It contains 262 acres. Lot No. 2 contains a marsh of 40 acres with 25 acres cleared and growing principally red-top hay. There is a creek (Carlom) running thro' the pasture. This tract will be sold together, separately or rented. For further particulars apply to the owner.

LATE CABLE NEWS.

The Maybrick Case—The Naval Review—Greece Causing Trouble.

The sensation of the week in England is the verdict in the Maybrick case, and the general opinion seems to be that though the unfortunate woman was tried for murder she is to be hanged for adultery. The truth is Mrs. Maybrick has been a very bad woman. Letters that were not read at the trial show her to have carried on a number of intrigues with different men, and that she was a depraved and conscienceless wanton. Nevertheless she has the popular sympathy, and it is even possible that her case may result in a change in the English Code of Criminal Procedure, so as to allow accused persons to go on the witness stand in their own defence.

The great naval review came off successfully on Monday. The ruler of Germany seemed duly impressed and made himself affable. He inspected several of the ships, and talked freely with the officers, examining carefully every novel feature pointed out to him, and especially those improved weapons lately served out to some of the ships. The electrical appliances also demanded some share of his attention, and so much was he convinced of the great strength of the flotilla that he is reported to have said that the central European powers allied with England could defy the world. England, however, does not mean to join any such alliance at present, though the leaning of this Government is undoubtedly toward the Kaiser.

Little Greece is making desperate efforts to cause an international row over Crete. Telegrams, mostly emanating from Athens, have been published in the newspapers of Europe giving blood-curdling accounts of the Turkish atrocities in that fair Island; but these stories always turn up opportunely whenever Russia desires trouble in Eastern waters. They are as usual grossly exaggerated. There has certainly been some throat cutting, but it has been confined to one side, for the Cretan Christian can handle a knife as dexterously and determinedly as his Musulman neighbor. The strife has been deliberately stirred up by agitators from the outside, and Europe is now waiting with ill-concealed trepidation to know what use Russia intends to make of it. Greece professes to be anxious to fight Turkey, but Greek valor is largely tempered by discretion. All the powers except Russia and France have admitted Turkey's right to suppress the insurrection and restore order in Crete, and the Sultan has sent his troops to do the work. The next move rests with Russia.

WOMEN IN CHINA.

Rev. Budsen Taylor Tells How the Fair Sex Suffer Among the Celestials.

Speaking of the condition of women in China he said it was almost as bad as that of the women in India. The Chinese lady was shut off from the outside world. He had heard of ladies who had never seen a man except father or brother when very young, and then their husband. When visiting the women were carried around in a closely boxed up Sedan chair. The chief sufferers from this isolation were the women of the upper class. They were than the women who had to earn a living and were consequently more out in the world. Again and again these women made

YOUNG FOLKS.

Heigho! Says Rowley.

A frog he would a wooing go—
Heigho! says Rowley—
Whether his mother would let him or no,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

So off he set with his opera hat—
Heigho! says Rowley—
And on his way he met a rat,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

"Pray, Mr. Rat, will you go with me?"—
Heigho! says Rowley—
"Pretty Miss Mousey for to see!"
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

Now they soon arrived at Mousey's Hall—
Heigho! says Rowley—
And gave a loud knock, and gave a loud call,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley

"Pray, Miss Mousey, are you within?"
Heigho! says Rowley—
"Oh, yes, kind sirs: I'm sitting to spin,"
With a rolly-polly gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

"Pray, Miss Mousey, will you give us some cheese?"
Heigho! says Rowley—
"We'd like a nice piece, if you please,"
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

"Pray, now, Mr. Frog, will you give us a song?"
Heigho! says Rowley—
"But let it be something that's not very long,"
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

"Indeed! Miss Mouse," replied Mr. Frog—
Heigho! says Rowley—
A cold has made me as hoarse as a hog."
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach
Heigho! says Anthony Rowly.

"Since you have caught a cold," Miss Mousey said—
Heigho! says Rowley—
"I'll sing you a song that I have just made,"
With a Rolly-polly gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

But while they were all thus a merry making—
Heigho! says Rowley—
A cat and her kittens came tumbling in,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

The cat she seized the rat by the crown—
Heigho! says Rowley—
The kittens they pulled the little mouse down,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

This put Mr. Frog in a terrible fright—
Heigho! says Rowley—
He took up his hat and he wished them good-night,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

But as Froggy was crossing a silvery brook—
A lily-white duck came and gobbled him up,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

So there was an end of one, two, three—

EXPORT CATTLE TRADE.

The Lesson Ald. Frankland is Teaching Canadian Breeders.

The Canadian Gazette has the following:—Ald. Frankland has just presented a striking object lesson to Canadian cattle breeders and feeders of the great advantages they now reap from their free entry into British markets. Writing from Liverpool on June 13, he points out that while good United States bullocks from two to four years old, weighing from 1,300 to 1,550 pounds average, have been sold in Liverpool at from $3 85 to $4.25 per hundred live weight, Canadian shipping cattle were at the same time being bought from $4 50 to $5 per hundred; and he adds, "I am sorry to say the Canadians were not so good a sample." How, it may be asked, can this inequality exist? Simply because Canadians, by their clean bill of health and the inestimable privilege they enjoy of free access for live cattle into British markets, realise from one halfpenny to three farthings per pound more than United States exporters, and these low prices for United States stock are likely to be maintained, and this is especially felt during the Canadian shipping season, from the beginning of May to the end of August. But by their system of early maturity United States breeders and feeders can build up a two-year-old steer to weigh 1,350 pounds, living weight, and when slaughtered produce or turn out 734 pounds of beef, the very weights sought after in every part of Great Britain, and not only wanted in preference to larger carcases, but sold at a slight advance. To Canadians, then, Alderman Frankland addresses this pertinent query:—Why not follow the United States' example—why keep your animals longer than necessary if by care and attention you can save twelve and even twenty months' feed? Until this is done Canadians will, he thinks, fail to do their best in British markets, and fail to find the ful profit to which the quality of their fat cattle and the immunity of their herds from disease should entitle them.

Edison's Home Life.

Thomas A. Edison, while in Pittsburg recently attending to his patent suit with Westinghouse, was interviewed by a Dispatch reporter, to whom he revealed some of the characteristics of his mode of living:

Yes, I am a hard worker. I hardly ever sleep more than four hours per day, and I could keep this up for a year. Sometimes I sleep ten hours, but I don't feel well when I do. If I could sleep eight hours, as most men do, I woud wake up feeling badly. My eyes would hurt me, and I would have a tough time to keep awake. I inherit this from my father. He is a remarkable old man, eating little and sleeping less. I have often known him when I was a boy, to sit up all night talking politics with a friend or swapping stories.

I eat about a pound a day, and my food is very simple, consisting of some toast, a little potato, or something of that kind. You know when I am working on anything I keep at it night and day, sleeping a few hours with my clothes on. I never take them off; don't even wash my face: couldn't think of such a thing, and in this condition I take my meals. If I were to remove my clotheswhen I slept, I would get up feeling out ofshape and with no desire to go to work. "No. 6" is my den in the laboratory, and I shut myself in there and hustle.

I sleep from 1 to 6 in the morning, and then I jump up and go to work again as fresh as a bird. This is all the sleep I need.

But I tell you we have lots of fun in the laboratory. Some time ago I had forty-two men working with me on the incandescent lamp in a big building. I hired a German men of the upper class. They were

MORE TO BE PITIED,

than the women who had to earn a living and were consequently more out in the world. Again and again these women made attempts to take their lives. They frequently got hold of their husbands' opium and took overdoses of it to put an end to their sufferings. Sometimes the missionaries were called in to bring them around, and the victims made piteous appeals to be allowed to die. When a baby girl was born she was thrown upon the streets to die. If she survived she was treated much as a cat or dog would be treated until she was sold to somebody as a wife. The Chinese beat their wives for giving birth to daughters. They wanted sons who would be able to offer ancestral worship for them, that they might not be destitute in the next world. The sufferings of girls in having their feet compressed were equally cruel. The foot was bent over by means of bandages till the toes and heels met and such was the agony suffered that for years young girls could not put their feet to the ground, but moved around on hands and knees. The Gospel sent joy into these desolate lives, and very touching were the attachments which these women formed for the missionaries. In concluding Mr. Hudson Taylor said there was at present about one missionary for every three quarters of a million in the province he labours in, and appealed for more assistance.

He Read the Bible.

Johnny's mother was rather proud of her skill in the haircutting line, and was very fond of showing it, much to Johnny's disgust. Being nine years old he was disposed to patronize the barber. The other day when his mother was making the preparations which usually precede the terrible ordeal which he knew was to make him the laughing stock of his playmates, he remarked:

"Mamma, I'm not going to have my hair cut to day."

"What do you mean, Johnnie?"

"I cannot allow it, ma. I'm really afraid. It's dangerous."

"What on earth are you afraid of, child?"

"Why, mamma," said the precocious youngster backing into a corner, "I'm surprised at you. Didn't you ever hear what happened to Samson because he let a woman cut his hair?"

His mother was so thoroughly astonished that he made his escape to the street before she could say another word.

They Yearn for Each Other.

How easily the experienced eye of the hotel clerk detects the secret of a bridal couple. Generally the unfortunates are "spotted" by their action. It is the expression of the faces as they walk side by side, or are whirled away on a railroad train, that gives them away. She smiles sweetly on her new master, who smirks back in a loving fashion until every passenger in the car is "onto" them. They yearn for each other and the feeling is clearly portrayed. At the hotel the sometimes put on a "front," believing they can deceive the genius who presides at the desk. The clerk never fails to size them rightly. The bride is usually overaffable to the bell boy, and her husband steps up to the register and writes "and wife" with a great big "W." The clerk asks "hubby" if he'll have a room with a bath, and that personage says "yes" (if he is not dazed for a time) with an emphasis intended to imply his ability to buy out the place if he so desired. Then the clerk "soaks him" with the costliest in the house and adds $10 to the bill when he takes payment. Such is life.—[Buffalo Express.

A lily-white duck came and gobbled him up,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

So there was an end of one, two, three—
Heigho! says Rowley—
The rat, the mouse, and the little frog-gee,
With a rolly-polly, gammon and spinach.
Heigho! says Anthony Rowley.

Enoch, Cyrus, Jerry, and Ben.

Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben
Were babies together, four fat little men,
Four bald-headed babies, who bumped themselves blue
And sprawled, grabbed, and tumbled, as all babies do;
Full of laughter and tears, full of sorrow and glee,
And big, bouncing bunglers, as all babies be.
All in the same valley lived these little men,
Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben.

Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben
Were fast little chums—till they grew to be men.
Eight bare little feet on the same errands flew
Through meadows besprinkled with daisies and dew;
They were aimless as butterflies, thoughtless and free
As the summer-mad bobolink, drunken with glee.
A wonderful time were those careless days then
For Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben.

Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben
Grew from babies to boys, and from boys into men.
Too restless to stay in the circumscribed bound
Of the green hills that circled their valley around,
To the north and the south and the east and the west,
Each departed along on a separate quest;
Ah! they'll ne'er be the same to each other again,
Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben.

Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben
Though companions in youth, were strangers as men;
Enoch grew rich and haughty and proud,
While Cyrus worked on with the toil-driven crowd;
In the councils of State Jerry held a proud place,
But poor Ben, he sounded the depths of disgrace.
Ah! diverse were the lives of these boys from the glen,
Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben.

Enoch and Cyrus and Jerry and Ben
Who can read the strong fates that encompassed these men?
The fate that raised one to the summit of fame,
The fate that dragged one to the darkness of shame!
Ah! silence is best: neither glory nor blame
Will I grant to the honored or dishonored name.
We are all like these boys who grew to be men,
Like Enoch, or Cyrus, or Jerry, or Ben.

Pessimism.

A small boy belonging to a Boston family was the proud owner of a bright red balloon, with which he never seemed to tire. One day he lost his hold of the string and away it went. He watched it for a long time and then went into the house and remarked: "My balloon has gone up to the angels, and it will be just like them to keep it."

then I jump up and go to work again as fresh as a bird. This is all the sleep I need.

But I tell you we have lots of fun in the laboratory. Some time ago I had forty-two men working with me on the incandescent lamp in a big building. I hired a German to play an organ for us all night, and we worked by the music. About 1 o'clock a farmer brought in our lunch, and we ate from a long table. At first the boys had some difficulty in keeping awake, and would go to sleep under stairways and in the corners. We employed watchers to bring them out, and in time they got used to it. After a while I didn't need forty-two of them, and I discharged six of them. Well, do you know, I couldn't drive them away. They stayed there and worked for nothing.

Oh, we enjoy this kind of life! Every now and then I hire a big schooner, and we go down the bay, my men and myself, to fish for a few days. Then we come back and buckle down to it again.—[Scientific American.

The Street Pavements of London.

There are three kinds of pavement in use in the London streets, says a London letter in The N. Y. Times. The least used at present is that of stone. Where it does exist, however, it is much better than those in New York. The stones are long and are set on end, the upper surface being much smaller then our Belgian blocks. Under these stones is a heavy bed of gravel and stone, the whole pavement being about eighteen inches in thickness. The wooden pavements are also formed of much smaller blocks than those tried in New York. But the most extensively used pavement in London is that of concrete. I saw one torn up for repairs a day or two ago, and had an opportunity to discover how it was built. First a foundation of stone is laid down in good substantial blocks. That is covered with tar and gravel, and upon this are set blocks of wood on end, tightly pressed together. Over these, cementing them together, and when rolled smooth, forming the surface of the street, is put on the concrete. The entire pavement is over two feet thick, and is as solid as natural rock. It is as smooth as a billiard table and over it the heavy vehicles of all kinds used in London roll smoothly and easily. One never sees a team of horses vainly struggling to pull a heavy load out of a hole in these streets. The stream of vehicles moves always smoothly and steadily onward, save when checked by the silent majesty of the inexorable English law represented by the extended arms of an insignificant London "bobby."

What Steam has Done.

A very interesting calculation has recently been made by the Statistical Bureau in Berlin. Four-fifths of the power machines at present in activity in the world have been erected during the past twenty-five years. The country which possesses the highest amount of horse power is the United States, with 7,500,000 horse power; then follow England, with 7,000,000; Germany with 4,500,000; France, with 3,000,000, and Austro-Hungary, with 1,500,000. These figures do not include locomotives, of which there are 105,000 at work, with a total horse power of 3,000,000. Thus the total horse power in the world is 46,000,000. A steam "horse power" is equivalent to three actual horses' strength, and each living horse represents the strength of seven men. Thus the total horse power of the entire world represents the work of 1,000,000,000 men, or more than twice the total working population of the earth. Steam has thus tripled the entire human work power of the earth.

The walls of ice-houses are usually decorated with an extensive freeze.

The Voyage of John Hawkins.

The clever trick performed by the captain of the captured schooner Black Diamond, in running away with the "prize crew," has quite provoked the New York Sun, which proceeds to lecture Blaine and Harrison in the following manner: The seizure of the British sealer Black Diamond by the revenue cutter Rush, the transfer of John Hawkins, able seaman, from the latter vessel to the former as sailing master and prize crew, with orders to take the prize into Sitka, the honorable confinement of the prize crew in his bunk where he whiled away the hours in reading while his capturing captives brought their vessel into the port of Victoria; all this makes a good plot for "opera bouffe." It reflects no discredit on John Hawkins, who acted with prudence, but it places the commander of the Rush, the Treasury Department, and, incidentally, the United States, in a rather ridiculous light. If there was any serious intention of taking the Black Diamond to Sitka, why did not the commander of the Rush take off the crew of the sealer and put on her enough of his own men to sail her to the Alaskan coast? If there was no such intention, or the men could not be spared, what was the object of such a farcical proceeding as putting one man on the seized vessel and ordering the sealer's Captain not to interfere with him? The mere seizure of the sealskins, with a warning to her Captain, would have been more sensible and dignified.

Whatever be the rights or wrongs of the United States in the Behring Sea controversy, she ought not to be made ridiculous. We hope that Mr. Windom will give orders that the Rush shall not figure again in such a farce as that of July 11, in which John Hawkins played the leading part.

And, by the way, when will the State Department take a hand in the game? Senator Eugene Hale, a member of the Senate Committee on Relations with Canada, told a "Boston Herald" reporter last Sunday that the committee "did not to any extent take testimony upon the questions that are likely to arise as to the Behring Sea, because it was felt that the subject was immediately in the hand of the State Department." Mr. William F. Wharton, Assistant Secretary of State, says that the question "has not become an international one." Was the seizure of the Black Diamond intended to make the question international? The State Department can thank the Treasury Department for a richly humorous preface to the work of negotiation. Mr. Blaine's part must soon begin. It would be interesting to know if he agrees with the cautious opinion expressed by his friend Mr Hale:

"I do not see that the State Department is necessarily confronted with the question of the Behring waters being considered a closed sea, and I do not understand that, whatever may happen in the future, any announcement, official or otherwise, has been made committing our Government to that proposition. That efficient measures will be taken to protect the fisheries, especially the seal in these waters, I can well believe, and I do not in such a step see anything offensive to Canada or England, and indeed it would seem that such measures would be in the common interest of all neighboring peoples. If any late transactions in the Behring waters give rise to negotiations upon this last basis, I see no reason why these negotiations may not be conducted to a harmonious end without at all raising the question of the closed sea."

Probably Mr. Blaine understands that it would not be plain sailing on that closed sea. It is only a step from the audacious to the ridiculous, although President Harrison,

IS THE EARTH A BOMB?

And May We All be Blown Into Eternity by a Natural Gas Explosion?

New Brunswick, N. J., correspondent New York Herald, of July 14: Apropos of the recent interview published in the Herald with Professor L. W. Thickstun of Metuchen, concerning the possibility of the upheaval of the earth caused by a natural gas explosion, I secured from Mr. Thickstun yesterday an explanation of his ideas, which is as startling as it is important.

"Natural gas in western Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio and in some other parts of the country," said he, "is one of the things the public is thinking about with some degree of apprehension. Capital in large amounts has been invested in its production, or rather in its capture and in its application as a heater and as an illuminator. Millions of dollars find profitable employment in this manner all over the extensive territory known as the oil regions.

"In Pittsburg alone enough natural gas is consumed daily to give sufficient amount of light for the needs of the largest city in the world. North of Pittsburg 120 miles, at Erie, and all the way between the two places, natural gas is found in nearly every neighborhood where proper tests have been made. In all other directions from this busy and prosperous manufacturing center gas has been found in quantities apparently inexhaustible.

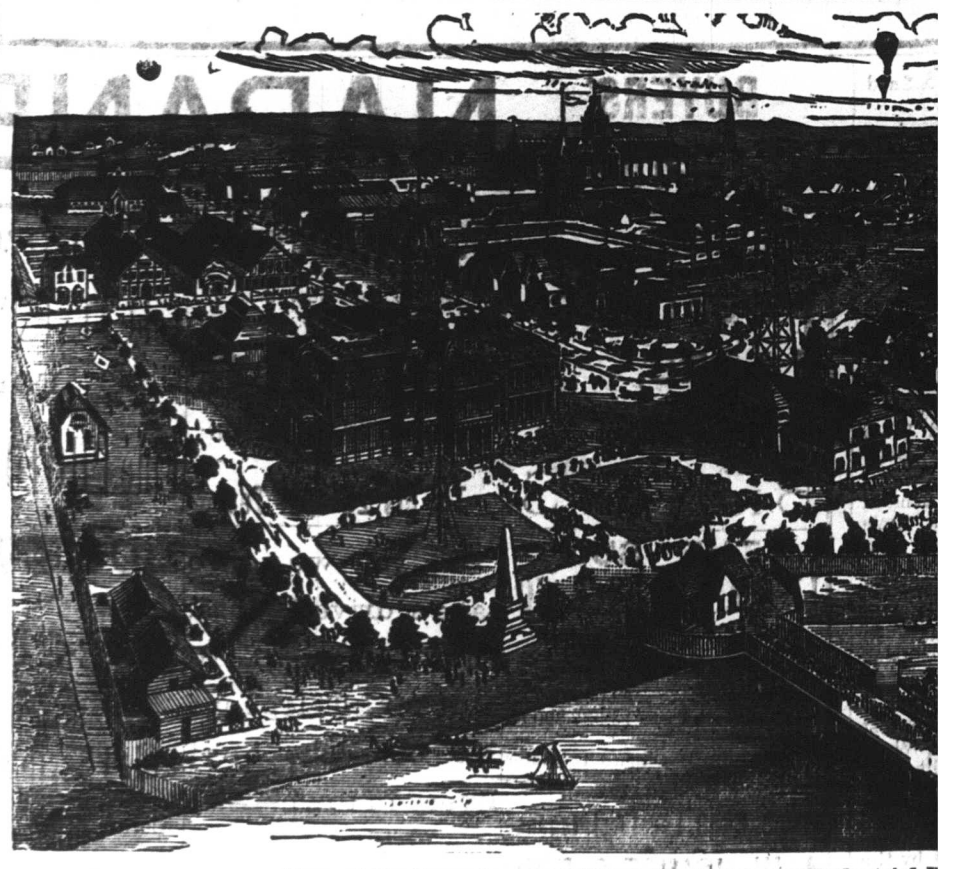
"A reservoir of vast proportions, or many reservoirs must have been provided for by nature to contain what gas has already escaped from wells and what is yet stored away in the bowels of the earth. Extensive deposits have also been found in the western countries of our own state, as well as in pennsylvania and Ohio. How far the openings extend below the earth's surface is not known, but the subterranean cavern or caverns where gas abounds must be of great magnitude.

"Gas began to appear in large quanties soon after the first wells on Oil creek were finished. Colonel Drake drilled the first oil well near Titusville, Pa., during the summer of 1859, and at a depth of sixty-nine feet he struck oil. That was a pumping and not a flowing well. From it a small amount of gas escaped, as is the case with most pumping wells. Subsequently many other wells were opened, thousands of them, some pumping and some flowing.

"All flowing wells are gas as well as oil wells. In flowing wells oil is thrown out by escaping gas. Big 'spouters' began to appear eight or ten miles below Titusville, along 'the creek,' early in 1860. Since then they have been opened in hundreds of other localities from the source to the mouth of the Allegheny river and along many of its tributaries.

"Among the most noted and the most profitable of all flowing wells was the Noble well, seven miles below Titusville, struck on May 3, 1863. It began as a 1500 gallon well. It was a 'boomer' of the first order. Gas and oil came from a crevice in the sand-rock, 140 feet below the bed of Oil creek. Twenty rods lower down the stream was the Caldwell well. It was a good 700 barrel well. Oil was reached in it at about the same depth as in the Noble well. By May 28 the production of the Noble well ran up to 1800 barrels and the Caldwell had fallen off to 400 barrels a day. Before the middle of June the latter was so nearly exhaust- that it flowed not more than seven or eight barrels, and the former was pouring out a flood of 2200 barrels of petroleum every twenty-four hours.

"The Noble well did nobly, ran about twenty-two months, produced over 500,000 barrels of oil, an immense amount of gas—wasted on Oil creek air—and then it too was



View of the Grounds and Buildings of the Toronto Industrial E

There is, perhaps, not a city on this continent that has made more rapid progress during the past ten years than the city of Toronto. During that period it has advanced in population from eighty thousand in 1879, to one hundred and eighty thousand in 1889, showing an average increase of ten thousand a year, and the Queen City still continues the forward march. Phenomenal as this progress has been, the success which has attended the great Agricultural and Industrial exhibition, that is held annually in Toronto, has been equally so, during the same period, having reached a point in magnitude and importance far beyond the most sanguine anticipations of its promoters. The attendance of visitors at this Exhibition, which in 1879 was about ninety thousand, has steadily increased each year, and last year it reached over two hundred and fifty thousand. The number of visitors has increased in like proportion, and with the efforts that are now being made by the Association and Manager Hill, it goes without saying that the coming Exhibition of this year, to be held from the 9th to the 21st of September, will be still greater and better than ever. The buildings in the Toronto a correct representation of the grounds and buildings; and we also give a view of the new poultry building and a section of the new stabling.

The Agricultural and Industrial Exhibition being promoted in the interests of the public generally, no effort is being spared to make it thoroughly representative and worthy of their unstinted patronage. The object is not only to make each succeeding fair superior to the preceding one, irrespective of what can be seen on the other side of the line, but to equal if not to excel any exposition on the American Continent. The Directors fully realize that they cannot stand still, that their patrons want something greater and better every year, with all that is new and interesting to be found on the globe, and this is what they appear determined to give them. The newest ideas are readily adopted and utilized by the management. The greatest novelties human skill can devise are engaged every year, while within the immense range of exhibits, animate and inanimate, the Industrial Fair of Toronto may be said to represent the best products, natural and manufactured, in the Dominion. The Association has certainly very much to be proud of, with no cause to fear comparison anywhere. The Exhibition is not, as many suppose, controlled by a joint stock company, but by gentlemen, who give their time and services for nothing, and their charter provides that every dollar which is made out of the show must be expended in adding to and improving the grounds and buildings, so that the public at large enjoy the full benefit of whatever assistance they may give the institution by their annual patronage. In addition to the great exposition of live stock, agricultural, dairy and horticultural products, manufactures of all kinds, fine arts, ladies' work, etc., there will be many special features of the most interesting character, full particulars of which will be given in the official programme to be issued shortly. A spectacle of thrilling interest will be flood of 2200 barrels of petroleum every twenty-four hours.

"The Noble well did nobly, ran about twenty-two months, produced over 500,000 barrels of oil, an immense amount of gas—wasted on Oil creek air—and then it too was a worthless hole in the ground. Water fills the place the gas and oil occupied and no one fears danger from that quarter.

"Not very far from the Noble well there is another kind of a blower. This has no water or oil in it, only gas, and that comes out at such a rate that you can hear it pulsating and fairly pounding a mile or two away on a still summer evening. This, like other wells, was sunk for oil, and this is the kind in which danger lurks. This well never fills up with water and probably never will. There are hundreds and thousands scattered all over the oil regions just like it. We are anxious to know what sort of a place is under our country where this treacherous substance comes from.

"If the Noble well threw out 500,000 barrels of oil and as much gas besides in less than two years, what are these purely gas wells doing? What have they been doing a score or more years? Will some one rise to his feet and explain?

"Thinking people are growing uneasy about it. Where does this enormous production come from, anyway? Where is the vast gas storehouse or storehouses located? Do these subterranean reservoirs fill up as rapidly as they are emptied? Does our atmosphere rush in to take the places vacated, or is gas forming constantly to keep the leaking tanks full? Will too much of our atmosphere move from the outside to the inside of the earth to the injury or extinction of animal and vegetable life?

"Worst of all, will the air mingle with the gas under our feet and thereby enable it to ignite and explode? If an explosion comes will it blow up all the oil regions from the great lakes to old Virginia, and will the Allegheny mountains stand between us and all harm? Do oceans of natural gas extend from Titusville to the mountains, and from the mountains to New York, and it is possible for these lakes—as unmanageable and as unsafe as dynamite—is it possible for them to be set on fire at the same instant?

"Some of these interrogatories may seem absurd and not worth the ink it takes to print them or the time it requires to read them; but then, again, suppose they are all pertinent? Suppose the last one turns out to be a fact as well as a question, what then?

"Might not an explosion occur which would be simply terrific? Instead of a torn up and devastated oil field beyond the mountains, we might have a ruined and fragmentary planet. No wonder people grow nervous and wish the owners would plug up every gas well on earth."

Buried in a Strange Land.

TORONTO Aug. 16.—On Saturday last two burials took place at the same time at St. James' Cemetery, under peculiarly sad circumstances. Both were English lads with no relatives this side of the ocean. Harry Wiggins had been in the General Hospital nearly a year, a victim of consumption, and during this time the members of the Bond Street Bible Class and others supplied his wants, and buried him when dead. The other died of typhoid fever after a few days' illness, and his funeral was conducted by kind but new-made friends. Their coffins touch each other in their grave in a strange land.

ciation and Manager Hill, it goes without saying that the coming Exhibition of this year, to be held from the 9th to the 21st of September, will be still greater and better than ever. The buildings in the Toronto Fair Grounds cover a large area of ground, unequalled anywhere else in Canada, and the Association is expending over $20,000 now in providing additional accommodation to meet the constantly growing wants of the Exhibition. New stables on the most improved plan will be erected to accommodate 150 additional horses, a new and splendid poultry building and many other additions which are considered necessary. The entire "Zoo" property has been acquired by the Association, and will give much needed space for the new buildings. The view given above is work, etc., there will be many special features of the most interesting character, full particulars of which will be given in the official programme to be issued shortly. A spectacle of thrilling interest will be Paine's great historical scenic production, the "Burning of Moscow," with grand pyrotechnic displays every evening. During the second week the International Dog Show will also add a new and interesting feature, and in fact, every day there will be plenty to see at this great exposition that will be instructive, amusing and entertaining. The agricultural and horticultural exhibits will be fully up to the mark, with many additions. There will be about 600 head of cattle on exhibition, including the best herds in the country. About 800 head of horses will be —The town schools will open on next Monday. The session of the model school for the training of teachers will commence on September 2d.

—Lost.—On Tuesday night, a bay horse, little over 16 hands; ringbone on right hind foot. Any one knowing of his whereabouts will kindly leave word at this office.

—Messrs. C. E. Lazier, W. J. Wilson and W. H. Johnson, of the Ramblers' Wheel Club, Belleville, passed through here on Wednesday on their way to Kingston.

—The belfry of the west ward Academy is being fixed up. Mr. Cliff has put in heavy frame work to stay the tower, and the bricks which had fallen out are being replaced, thus making it as strong as ever.

—On Wednesday the schooner Two Brothers, laden with coal for the Rathbun Company, ran a ground near the Pines while coming up the river. It took the Reindeer nearly an hour to release her.

—The excursions to the Thousand Island Park under the management of Rev. D. O. Crossley were highly successful. On Sabbath evening last Mr. Crossley gave a song service at the big Tabernacle at the Park.

—Great clearing sale of school books, stationery, etc., at Madden's.

—Having purchased J. H. Gallagher's stock of school books, window shades and baby carriages, we will make a big cut in prices to clear out the stock. Come early if you want bargains to Madden's bookstore.

—The 47th Batallion Band appeared in their new uniforms for the first time on Monday evening last and serenaded Mr. Joseph McAlister, maker of the suits. The music was the best of the season, being all new and select.

—Mr. J. S. Hulett has just completed a life size portrait of the late Mrs. Madole and it is now on exhibtion at his studio. The portrait is enlarged to life size from a cabinet and is finished in colors. It is remarkably true to nature and is another proof of Mr. Hulett's ability to turn out first class work.

—We regret to learn that Mr. Robert F. Hope, of Newburgh, is seriously ill, and that but little hope is entertained of his recovery. His daughter, Mrs. Roblin, of Napanee, was summoned to his bedside on Wednesday. Mr. Hope is one of the best known residents of this county and has always been held in the highest respect.

—The N. T. & Q. Ry. Co.'y have purchased the glass works property from Mr. John Herring for $2500, and will utilize it for freight sheds and other purposes. This gives the railway fine facilities for handling freight at this end of the line and looks as if considerable traffic was expected when the C. P. R. connection is completed.

—The A. O. U. W. excursion to Picton on Tuesday, per the steamer Quinte, was the success of the season. The boat was crowded to her utmost capacity, the weather was all that it should be for such an occasion and the committee of management looked well after all details. The various lodges are to be congratulated on —The young people of Wesley church purpose giving a concert in that church on Thursday evening, August 29th. The proceeds are to be applied in cancelling the debt on the organ. An excellent programme is being prepared. Rev. D. O. Crossley and others will furnish music. All are cordially invited. Admission 20 cents.

—This happened in Picton, a flag station on the C. O. R.: Johnnie's mother was entertaining company. At the table, sizing up the spread, he remarked: "I guess ma's got all the good things in the house on the table—" Being interrupted by a vigorous kick from the maternal foot, he continued, indignantly: "Yer needn't kick me for that; I didn't tell that the napkins were borrowed, so I didn't."

—The improved Pease Furnace has a larger heating capacity than any other warm air furnace invented. The fire pots are heavier than those of any other. All parts above the cast iron fire pot are made of heavy wrought Scotch plate steel. Nine tenths of the furnaces put up in Toronto where they are made, and three-fourths in Napanee are the Pease furnaces. Proof positive they are the best. BOYLE & SON, Sole Agents.

—In a match played in Napanee on Saturday between the Bath nine and the Napanee nine, the former team was victorious by the score 16—6. Callaghan and Robinson, of the Princess Street Kingston nine (under assumed names) were in the points for the victors and did really wonderful work, Callaghan striking out no less than 21 men. The Napaneeites took objection to these two players, but when one of them swore, positively, that he was an orphan boy from Sunbury, and the other just as stoutly affirmed that he was a hired boy from Mossback, the game resumed without futher kicksng.

crowded to her utmost capacity, the weather was all that it should be for such an occasion and the committee of management looked well after all details. The various lodges are to be congratulated on the demonstration.

—The Port Hope Guide of Monday last says: "As announced in the Methodist church on Sunday, there will be a meeting of the members of the congregation next Wednesday evening in the S. S. Hall to welcome the Rev. E. N. Baker, the new pastor, and at the same time to bid goodbye to the Rev. H. S. Anderson who has occupied the pulpit of that church since Conference with such ability. Mr. Anderson, while in Port Hope, has endeared himself to the people among whom he has labored with great acceptance."

—We learn that Rev. Alex. Campbell, of Montreal, secretary of the Evangelical Alliance for the Dominion of Canada, will be in town (D.V.) on Sunday and Monday next, the 25th and 26th inst. He is expected to preach on Sunday morning in the Presbyterian church, and in the evening in the Eastern Methodist church. On Monday evening a meeting will be held in the town hall, when Mr. Campbell will deliver a lecture on "the doctrines and morals of the Jesuits, together with the aggressions of Romanism in the Dominion." As the meeting will be under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance, a collection will be taken up in its favor.

—It is currently reported that Reeve Lapum is in the habit of going to the police station and ordering the constables to release parties incarcerated for drunkenness, without their being brought before either the Mayor or Police Magistrate. We now have a list of names of some of those who have been thus favored and it includes the name of at least one relative of the reeve. We can readily understand Mr. Lapum's motive for this sort of conduct and believe that the time has come when a stop ought to be put to it. Some of the councillors had better ask for a return from the constables showing the names of parties who have been liberated without the formality of a trial, and see if Mr. Lapum cannot be checked in his efforts to thwart instead of furthering justice.

—School books and all kinds of school supplies, cheap at Madden's.

—The Toronto World of Monday in referring to the various industries in Fenelon Falls, made the following reference to the Napanee Paper Company:—The pulp mills owned and operated here by this company are a surprise to most visitors, and the whole process of making the pulp is one of peculiar interest. Basswood is used exclusively and the daily output is five tons of dry pulp. To do this sixty hands are employed and twenty-five cords of firewood are burned daily in the furnaces. An engine of sixty horse power and two boilers of seventy-five horse each furnish power. For boiling the pulp there are four boilers, each holding 1¼ cords. The bark is taken off by a machine and the wood is cut up into chips and elevated to boilers. The buildings in which the chemicals are made up in which the wood is cooked is 100 x 30 feet, containing 8 tanks 8 feet deep and 10 in diameter. The pulp is emptied out of boilers at the rate of 11-4 cords every three minutes, and the liquor or chemicals that the pulp has been cooked in is calcined or dried down, and used again with pure liquor added. The buildings are brick and very extensive. Supplies are obtained by rail and water and the company have a steamboat and four scows of their own engaged in providing supplies. About 60 bushels of lime are used daily, and the company have a kiln and make their own lime. The works are run day and night.

church, on Tuesday, August 27th, at three o'clock. A full attendance is requested, the special object of business being the consideration of the necessary arrangements for the "Festival of Days," to be held in the interests of the society.

—"The Bath baseball club are a lot of noisy squealers. Last Saturday they did nothing but kick all day, even after the game was finished. It was composed of at least two professionals and ought not to have been allowed to begin the game. We have sized them up and don't want them to come this way any more." Spectator.

—A cricket match was played here yesterday between the club of the Montreal Rifles and the Napanee team. Napanee went first to bat and ran up a score of 109 runs. The Montrealers only had forty-six runs to their credit at the end of their first, so immediately went to bat again. As the second innings was not completed the game was decided by the score of the first which gave Napanee a handsome victory. The visitors did much better in their second innings as they succeeded in running up a score of 104 runs and with only three men out. They were a fine lot of fellows.

—The "Welcome Home" tendered Rev. E. N. Baker on his return from Europe, was a decided success. The reverend gentleman arrived on the afternoon express on Monday last and was met at the depot by a large number of friends. A large audience was present in the evening at the Western Methodist church, when the followiug programme was presented:

Selection.....The Choir
Prayer.....The Pastor
Trio....."Protect us through the Coming Night"
MISSES TILLEY AND MR. JEWELL.
Address.....My Trip to the Old Country
REV. E. N. BAKER, M. A., B. D.
Solo...."With Verdure Clad"...Creation (Hadyn)
MISS EVA N. ROBLIN.
Solo....."Angels Ever Bright and Fair"
MISS MARIE TILLEY.
Solo....."Not Ashamed of Christ"
MR. A. N. JEWELL.

Of course Mr. Baker's address was the chief item of interest, and his talk of over an hour was thoroughly enjoyed by all. It consisted of a sketch of his trip through England, France, Italy, Switzerland, Scotland and Ireland. The music rendered during the evening was of a very high order, and better has seldom, if ever, been heard in Napanee. The solo "With Verdure Clad," rendered by Miss Eva N. Roblin was perhaps the most difficult number ever sung in Napanee, and yet the runs and higher notes were taken with the utmost ease and with perfect sweetness and clearness, while Miss Marie Tilley's solo was rendered with all of the sweetness which ever characterizes her singing. Mr. Jewell always sings well and he did even better than usual on Monday evening. After the programme the majority of those present tarried a while to shake hands with Mr. Baker and say "good-bye." During their stay in Napanee Mr. and Mrs. Baker have won for themselves high places in the esteem of the people of Napanee. Mr. Baker has ably performed his work in connection with the Western Methodist church and has the satisfaction of leaving the church in a highly prosperous condition. He has proved himself to be an indefatigable worker, an earnest toiler in God's vineyard. During his two year's stay in Napanee upwards of one-hundred members were added to the membership of his own church while many others joined other churches through his work in special services. The people of Napanee are loath to apart with Mr. Baker and his estimable wife and will always be rejoiced to hear of continued promotions and ever increasing success in their chosen field of labor. Mr. Baker begins work in Port Hope at once.

THF JESUITS.

AND THE AGGRESSION OF ROMANISM.

An Address by Rev. Alex. Campbell.

The town hall was crowded to its utmost capacity on Monday evening last to listen to the Rev. Alex. Campbell lecture on the above topic. Nearly all of the prominent people of the town were present. Rev. Mr. Young was nominated for chairman but he declined the honor, and suggested that Uriah Wilson, M. P., be called to the chair. This was a capital hit and was received with cheers. Uriah suggested that as his position would likely be attacked he preferred keeping his own seat. Ironical cheers greeted his statement. Finally D. H. Preston was chosen to preside and he opened the meeting by calling on the lecturer of the evening and in doing so said that the question would be discussed from a non-political standpoint.

Rev. Mr. Campbell said that he was glad that such an announcement had been made, as he had frequently been accused by both political parties of favoring the other. The lecturer said that he was not here to rail against Romanism; he was perfectly willing to grant them all the privileges claimed for ourselves and nothing more. He believed in Equal Rights for all. He thought that the Roman Catholics, and especially the Jesuits, were claiming more than they were willing to grant to Protestants.

The sixteenth century was an important era in the world's history. Protestant principles threatened to overthrow Papacy, and strenous efforts were made to stem the torrent. King William did overthrow King James, and God did let the winds loose, and destroyed the Spanish Armada. As the Protestants were so victorious then why was the present agitation being pushed? What was the danger? There is in our midst to-day a power opposed to liberty, freedom and the best interests of our country. This power would counteract the influence of the Battle of the Boyne and even of Waterloo. Hunted out of Germany, and other countries, the Jesuit has found a veritable asylum in Canada. The Jesuit has been playing too important a part in the politics of our country. The people at the head of the present agitation are not fanatics, but are among the leading men of the Dominion. Our contention is that our legislators of both parties have yielded too much to the demands of Romanism as represented by Jesuits. The lecturer referred to Grips recent cartoon on the question and said that it clearly represented the facts.

Referring to the Province of Quebec, Mr. Campbell said that the Roman Catholic church in Quebec was virtually occupying the position of an established church. In 1774 the Imperial Parliament granted the ment repeatedly disallowed the Streams Bill! One party contended that the act was intra vires, that is, within the power of the Provincial Government to pass, and the other party said that they favored Provincial Rights, and would not interfere with a measure that was dealing with matters purely Provincial. Mr. Mercier actually asked the Pope if he might sell the estates in question and the Pope graciously assented.

The arguments advanced by those who voted for the bill are not much better than the green screen, which a saloon keeper puts before the door to hide the drunkards from view. The Protestants of Montreal have to pay over $12,000 a year towards the support of Roman Catholic schools. The lecturer said that he had to pay $75 a year for the tuition of his child at the high school in that city.

Mr. Mercier would allow no amendment to the school laws, unless it had first passed the public council and had been initialed by Cardinal Taschereau. The Cardinal insisted, and now had, a seat on the throne when the House of Parliament met. The Jesuits taught doctrines that the lecturer would not mention. He gave some of the teachings of the order.

1. Hunting and fishing on Sunday was permissable when not accompanied by too great noise.
2. Punishing wives ought to be practised.
3. Women should not be readily believed as they are habitually given to lying.
4. Servants are justified in compensating themselves without the knowledge of their employers if they do more work than they bargain for. These are some of the doctrines which our governments are endowing the Jesuits to teach. The Jesuits must go or Confederation must go. "A house divided against itself cannot stand." The lecturer did not say that Catholics must go, but the Jesuits must be made to move.

Partyism and denominationalism must be dropped and Protestants must unite in securing and retaining the freedom of thought and conscience which our ancestors fought for and obtained at a great price.

The Jesuits Estates Bill was signed by the Governor-General on the twelfth day of July. The Orangemen will do well to remember that fact and that date. Mr. Campbell closed his address shortly after nine o'clock.

Rev. A. B. Chambers moved that a vote of thanks be tendered Mr. Campbell for his able lecture. Mr. Chambers took occasion to announce his platform. He said that he believe in equal rights for all, and that the Jesuits were getting more than their rights at the present time. The Jesuit Bill ought not to have carried, and he had no sympathy with the men who voted for it. He condemned their course in scathing terms, and wound up his brief but eloquent remarks by urging everybody to stand firm on this question.

Rev. Mr. Young seconded the motion favoring a vote of thanks. He, too, announced his platform and spoke strongly against Roman and especially Jesuit aggression.

CANADA'S LITTLE WORLD.

Have You Seen It?

It is worth your while to take a peep at the exhibition of marvelous patience and skill manifested by Mr. Vance in producing such a wonderful collection, and all in life-like motion. Here is a steam engine in full play, blacksmiths forging in the smithey, a Pile driver and a Coffee grinder hard at work; a Shoemaker at work, and the wife rocking the baby; there goes the Bicycles, and here you don't hear the music, but you see the Organ grinder and the monkey performing on his shoulders; then there the company of soldiers go through their drill with precission; a poor old man is turning a grind stone while an exile from Erin is trying to grind an axe; the Scissors grinder has a lonely time compared with the Dancing girl, and her ethiopean admirer who pokes his head out of the window occasionally to see what is going on; next comes the Butcher shop and Salvation Army band with tambourine, cymbal and accordian; the mute discourse of the Colored Preacher will no doubt be appreciated by some of the politicians; here is a Railway Tunnel and Station with cars coming in, stopping, and moving on; a Saw mill in full operation, while the Master of ceremonies makes things lively; the Man fishing has about as good luck as Bro. Campbell had the other night. The Flour mill with bag elevator and men carrying bags out at one door into another, waiting patiently for six o'clock and the Circus, which is near at hand; here is an amateur Minstrel troop whose sable heads seem to vie in motion with the beautiful Ship under full sail; here is an old Wind mill and Water wheel pumping up water to the thirsty soldiers who guards the Battlements of the stately Fortress; in the distance you see a Railway train crossing a bridge.

A Tree with a Canary hopping from limb to limb and singing to the men near by who are sawing off a log, and wishing they could get away to the Boat race in best and best boats, just under the Niagara Falls in Miniature, while the stately dames ply the shuttle of the Loom and spin yarns.

Mr. Vance exhibits this wonderful show at the Kingston Midland Fair in September and will probably exhibit it at Napanee at the fair in October.

Obituary.

M. S. SCOUTON.

The subject of this memior, died at Napanee Mills Friday morning 23rd Aug. 1889, after a few days illness from inflamation. Deceased was the youngest son of the late David M. Scouton, of Ernestown, one of the old U. E. Loyalist stock, was born 27th Feb'y 1824, and married July 12th 1853, Rebacca Miller, daughter of the late Garret Miller, of Camden, four sons and four daughters of the twelve children born to them survive him. In early life Mr. Scouton was a graduate of the Normal school Toronto having obtained a first-class certificate, he devoted several years to teach-facts.

Referring to the Province of Quebec, Mr. Campbell said that the Roman Catholic church in Quebec was virtually occupying the position of an established church. In 1774 the Imperial Parliament granted the Catholics large privileges, which resulted inthe accumulation of vast wealth by the Priests; the degradation of the common people and the receiving of vast political power. The Roman Catholics dare not deny anything said by the Pope. Freedom of speech and liberty of conscience and action, were absolutely forbidden. The wealth of the Catholic church in Quebec is simply enormous. Its revenues were derived from many and many a source. Fees were charged for everything,from the blessing of a plot of ground to the burving of the dead.

At the time of the conquest it had $2,000,000 and some land. Now it has churches valued at over $50,000,000, and over eight hundred nunneries. Money was loaned by the church to buy out Protestant farmers at the low rate of two per cent. They could afford to do this, because Catholic farmers gave one bushel out of each twenty-six to the church, whole sections in Quebec were now absolutely controlled by the Catholics. Rome always marshals her forces at the time of an election. The Orangemen of this country have been fooled several times by their political friends, and some say that they will be fooled again. The lecturer said that he did not believe so, but that the Orangemen were going to stand by their guns. The great Methodist church had but little political influence. When Protestants ask for anything they are received with a smile, but Rome receives and insists on prompt attention to her demands. The lecturer referred to the OKa Indian matter and pointed out that the Priests never interfered with them so long as they remained Catholics, but when they became Protestants they were deprived of their homes and were persecuted most bitterly. Canada never had a government brave enough to give these Indians simple justice.

Referring to the question as it touched Provincial Parliaments. He said that Marmion was thrown out of the school curriculum to please Roman Catholics in Ontario. Canada is the only country on the face of the globe that has not expelled the Jesuits. The Jesuits have been expelled more than eighty-six times by responsible governments.

In 1761 the King of France banished them from France. In 1763 the Pope disbaned and abolished the order of the Jesuits.

The British Government took possession of their estates in Canada during the reign of George III, at that time their being no Jesuits living in Canada.

Mr. Mercier made the Pope of Rome admit that the Jesuits had no legal claim to the estate thus forfeited, but only a moral one. The question is whether the civil law of our land, administered by the Queen and her officers shall prevail, or shall the canon law, as administered by the Pope and his satellites.

Do you wonder that an out cry is being made ?

The lecturer contended that Mr. Mercier came into power through a race and religous cry, and, as his majority was small, he took hold of the Jesuit question. He arranged the matter personally with the Pope and of course gave him a solid phalanx of Roman Catholic supporters in the Province of Quebec.

In the Dominion Parliament both parties agreed to barter British Law to the church of Rome. It is doubtful if anything but the power of Rome could unite the Grits and Tories.

The power of disallowance is for the express purpose of guarding the rights of the minority. Were Provincial laws never disallowed ? Had not the Dominion Government remarks by urging everybody to stand firm on this question.

Rev. Mr. Young seconded the motion favoring a vote of thanks. He, too, announced his platform and spoke strongly against Roman and especially Jesuit aggression.

Before the motion was put, George M. Elliott, jumped to his feet and took Mr. Campbell to task about some quotations made from Paul Bert's work which Mr. Elliott contended was merely a transtation of the work published in 1640, and was not an authorized Jesuit work. The audience did not want to hear him, but Mr. Campbell asked that he be heard, and then when he had made his statement, corrected him. Mr. Campbell said that the work was written in 1875 by a noted Jesuit Father and Paul Bert translated the work in 1880. Mr. Elliott was entirely mistaken.

This was the only attempt made during the evening to defend either Uriah or the Government.

The motion was then put and carried.

NOTES.

Uriah Wilson occupied a seat on the platform, and looked as if he was putting in a very uncomfortable time of it. He was as dumb has an oyster even when he had an opportunity of speaking as he might have done when the motion regarding the vote of thanks was under discussion.

Mr. Campbell was wrong in stating that Roman Catholics in Ontario were virtually compelled to support separate schools in Ontario. There is no such law. A Roman Catholic may be and frequently is a public school supporter, nor can he be made to be anything else unless he himself wishes it.

Special Announcement.

We have made arrangements with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases" which will enable all of our subscribers to obtain a copy of that valuable work free by sending their address (enclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., Enosburg Falls, Vt. This book is now recognised as standard authority upon all diseases of the horse, as its phenominal sale attests, over four million copies having been sold in the past ten years, a sale never before reached by any publication in the same period of time. We feel confident that our patrons will appreciate the work, and be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of obtaining a valuable book.

It is necessary that you mention this paper in sending for the "Treatise." This offer will remain open for only a short time.

Not all Gold That Glitters.

The abundant yield of grain anticipated a few weeks ago does not seem to pan out up to the expectations indulged in. Again we see a wide margin between anticipation and participation. One of our best farmers in North Fredericksburgh thrashed out a load of sheaves, from as fine a looking field of oats as you would find in the county, and expected as least twenty-five bushels but only got eighteen bushels, and of light weight at that. Another neighbor estimated his barley crop at 1500 bushels, but the threshing mackine undeceived him, for he had only 900 bushels. This year a large acreage was sown on low land, as last years experiences indicated this to be the safer course. The consequence is, where not entirely flooded out there has been a wonderful growth of straw, but the grain has not filled properly. On enquiry from farmers from other sections, we find the grain crop will not be up to the average, certainly not more than two thirds of what was anticipated. Barley in this section is badely colored and of light weight.

late Garret Miller, of Camden, four sons and four daughters of the twelve children born to them survive him. In early life Mr. Scouton was a graduate of the Normal school Toronto having obtained a first-class certificate, he devoted several years to teaching in Lennox and Addington with great success. He then devoted his energies to mercantile pursuits in Centreville, Tamworth and Bowmanville, at the latter place in 1755, he suffered a severe loss by fire and barely saved the lives of his wife and child. He then went to Michigan and engaged in farming but received an injury from a falling limb, while chopping alone in the woods which nearly cost him his life. In 1869 he returned to this county where he has continued to reside. Mr. Scouton has been a member of the Methodist Church for forty years and actively engaged in the Sabbath school as teacher and superintendant. He was also a faithful laborer in the Temperance cause. The loyal Orangeman of Napanee Mills conducted the funeral services, and laid his remains in the cemetery at Newburgh on Sunday last,the funeral was attended by a large concourse of people. Rev. D. O. Crossley preached the funeral sermon. A side hill grave now contains the earthly remains of a faithful brother, a loving husband and pious father, who has gone to his rest and his works "do follow him."

YOUNG FOLKS.

Some More Don'ts

Don't appear indifferent when others are talking. Listen politely to every one, and don't interrupt.

Don't contradict any one—nothing could be ruder. If you do not agree with the speaker, express your opinion, of course, but do it with courtesy.

Don't attempt to be witty or "smart" at the expense of another. Remember always that consideration for others is the first characteristic of a lady or gentleman.

Don't trim or clean your finger nails in public. Keep them in good condition by all means, but all toilet duties should be performed in private.

Don't play with your napkin, or your fork, or with anything at the table; when not eating sit with your hands quietly in your lap.

Catching Fish With a Bottle.

Catching fish is surely a very novel use for a bottle, but the feat is easily accomplished and affords a great deal of amusement and excitement.

A number of empty champagne or beer bottles being obtained, each one is to be filled with sand or shot until it will stand upright when floated in water. Each bottle is then tightly corked and a strong tapering ash or hickory stick, 18 inches long, is passed through each cork, this stick having a small, bright-colored burgee (a three cornered flag) at its tip. Next a piece of wire is twisted around the neck of the bottle, that it cannot slip off, and in this wire a large loop is made to which the fish-line is fastened. The length of the line must depend entirely upon the depth of the water to be fished; 10 feet is usually long enough. The hooks, for general use, should be of medium size—say No. 5. Moderately heavy sinkers are attached to the line. A swivel will make the outfit complete, although not absolutely necessary. If the bottles themselves cost nothing, a dozen may by prepared at a cost of 25 cents.

The bottles, thus having been made ready, may be used in a number of ways. They may be set in a row on the bank of a stream, or on a pier, close to the edge; the hooks having been properly baited, are to be dropped into the water. It will not be long before one of the bottles will begin to waver and suddenly take a mighty leap overboard, swimming off and bobbing around in a very peculiar manner. The excitement which a row of these fishing-bottles will arouse, and the guessing as to which bottle will go first, is very amusing, and not to be despised as sport.

One or more of the bottles having popped off and been taken in tow by a fish, must now be rescued; this can be done by means of a long stick having three hooks, without barbs, lashed to it, back to back; some one of the hooks will soon catch into the loop of wire around the neck of the bottle and you can draw in both bottle and fish.

Where there is a lake or pond at hand and a boat available, the bottles may be taken out from shore and set afloat around the boat. If the fish are at all lively and there are many bottles to tend, there will be some very exciting sport in chasing the bottles, for they will start in all directions at every moment.

Where there is a number in the party "sides" may be chosen—two sets of bottles being furnished, an even number to each, and each set having a flag differing in color The side catching the most fish wins what ever prize is to be awarded.

THE BRITISH NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

How the Rival Fleets of Great Britain and Achill Will Contend with Each Other.

The naval review off Spithead is attracting the attention of the authorities at Washington. A correspondent at the American Capital writes as follows:—Although the annual inspection and review off Spithead is for the British navy the great show of the year, there is more interest in the manœuvres which follow it. These continue through several weeks, and give abundant exercise in attack and defence, pursuit, concentration, bombardment, squadron evolutions, torpedo-boat practice, and indeed most of the operations of naval war. Last year the manœuvres began at two points, one on the northern and the other on the southern coast of Ireland, at each of which a British squadron was found and attacked by the squadron of an imaginary enemy called Achill. The excitement of the operations ran high when the attacking squadrons withdrew from the front of their opponents, and succeeded in making ravages on the southwestern coast of Scotland, and thence southward for some distance in the Irish Sea before they were made to suffer for their audacity.

This year, like last, there will be an attack from Achill, and the two principal officers who then took charge of the enemy's forces will change places with the two Admirals who conducted the defence. These manœuvres unquestionably teach more than a parade in the Solent as to the real condition, degree of efficiency, and shortcomings of the British navy. For example, the structural weakness of not a few of the torpedo boats in heavy weather was made quite manifest by them, whereas nothing of the sort might be apparent in a fair-weather review.

The composition of the opposing fleets shows that the British navy can spare from its regular force in home waters for an imaginary enemy a squadron of vast power, while retaining for itself quite enough strength to defend the islands. As recently arranged, the Achill forces were to include the armorclads Inflexible, Camperdown, Anson, Howe, Devastation, Monarch, Iron Duke, and the flagship Northumberland, the first five being of from 9,300 to 12,000 tons, and carrying very heavy armor and guns of from 35 to 80 tons. The enemy's unarmored cruisers were to include the fast vessels Iris, Magicienne, Mersey, Arethusa, Australia, Calypso, Curlew, and one or two others, making from 16 to 20 knots, besides the fast gunboats Grasshopper and Rattlesnake.

To meet this array the British squadron brings together of armorclads the flagship Hercules, the Rodney, the Warspite, the Conqueror, the Neptune, the Shannon, the Invincible, the Collingwood, the Rupert, the Ajax, and the Black Prince. It will also have four belted cruisers, the Undaunted, Narcissus, Aurora, and Galatea, two of the same class being assigned to the enemy. It will have the unarmored cruisers Medea, Melpomone, Marathon, Mercury, Forth, and Thames, of from 17 to 20 knots speed, and the gunboats Serpent, Mohawk, Sandfly, Spider, and Sharpshooter, of which the last named can go 21 knots under forced draught.

In addition to these main squadrons there are no fewer than five smaller bodies, classed as divisions for use in the English Channel, and the Irish and North Seas, and on the Scotch coast. In the aggregate they include two armorclad ships-of-the-line, seven armored coast-defence vessels, seven unarmored cruisers, eleven gun-boats, and nearly forty torpedo boats.

Even this array does not take in all the vessels which were present at the review of

WHEN A DEAF MAN CAN HEAR.

His Ears are Most Sensitive When There is the Most Racket About.

The deaf man has just discovered that riding in a rumbling car robs his affliction of its terrors, and is getting even with his back biting acquaintances who have expressed their opinions of him heretofore without reserve. An eccentric millionaire who had no hearing under ordinary circumstance, found this out the other day at the expense of his lawyer, and the latter now mourns the loss of the most profitable client, while the deaf man thinks he has learned a thing or two.

The lawyer was sitting in a car talking to a friend when his wealthy client entered and dropped into the vacant seat beside his legal adviser. "This old curmudgeon will talk me deaf, dumb, and blind," said the Blackstonian to his companion and they both scowled at Moneybags, who was looking out of the car window. "He has spent lots of money with me, but it's worth a mint to yell in his ear. I'm tired of it. He is deaf as a post."

Then the deaf man turned around. "You can send me your bill in the morning," said he," and I'm done with you.

Lawyer and companion looked at each other amazed. The lawyer set about to find how is client recovered his hearing so quickly.

"It is due to the counteraction of the noisy motion on the drum of the ear," said the aurist to whom he applied for information. "The rumble of the heavy wheel on the track causes the drum to vibrate, and the afflicted one can hear quite plainly. Some people think that they voluntarily raise their voices in a car. That is not so. Always speak in a low voice to a deaf person moving car or vehicle.

Ocean Greyhounds

The twin-screw steamer is associated with one might almost say the outgrowth of the triple expansion engines, which are as revolutionary as the latest of the iron-clads or the institution of Bessemer steel. The old ships of all the lines are far behind, and while they may serve the purpose of ferry boats for many years and yield comfort to old-fashioned people, they will not be succeeded by anything like themselves. One of the marvels of the age is the machinery of the steamers that are famous for their speed on the Atlantic. If a locomotive is attached to a "limited express" train and run at a rate of speed approaching a mile a minute for two or three hours, she is withdrawn, another substituted, and every part of the rattled engine is closely examined, while it is carefully provided that the return trip is made with a slow train. Contrast with this what is expected of the machinery on board the City of Paris, the Augusta Victoria, the Columbia, or the Teutonic, or the Etruria or Umbria. During the fastest voyage across the Atlantic, that of the City of Paris in May last, her engines were driven unceasingly during five days and twenty three hours at the average speed of eighty-eight revolutions of the screws per minute. When Captain Watkins left Queenstown on the 25th of last month, and started on a course fifty-nine miles shorter than his famous run—shorter because he ran northward where the world grows smaller and came down over the shoulder of "the great globe we inherit," taking any possible chance there might be of fogs and ice crossing the banks of Newfoundland at this season—the engines were put at full speed, and for something over four days they were driven at the average rate of ninety revolu-

"sides" may be chosen—two sets of bottles being furnished, an even number to each, and each set having a flag differing in color The side catching the most fish wins whatever prize is to be awarded.

For sea fishing an additional arrangement is needed, because the waves cause the bottles to bob up and down so that it is hard to know when a fish bites. The flag is brought into use as a signal. The upright rod is furnished at its tip with a small screw-eye, and a strip of tin three inches long is fastened by its lower end to the lower end of the rod parallel with it, so as to make a spring-clip The flag is fastened to the end of the line, and is set by being caught in the clip made by the strip of tin. In this position the flag is "lowered," as it were, being at the foot of the rod; but when the fish bites he pulls it away from the clip and raises it to the top of the rod, where it stops, being too large to go through the eye. That the flag may fly straight, and not be drawn into the eye and crumpled, it is best to sew it to a straight bit of wire, having a loop at the top to which the line is tied.

Another improvement is to paint the inside of the bottle white, by pouring in white paint and shaking it around and then pouring it out and letting the bottle dry. Then prepare the bottle as described, and should a large fish turn the bottle upside-down, as he very likely will, it can be readily seen and followed.—[Wide Awake.

A Talk About Tigers.

Little folks are always anxious to learn something about natural history and animals, so they are given here a little sketch of the fiercest of known animals. The tiger is the admiration and dread of young people. We are all familiar with the appearance of its tawny, striped skin, its fierce-looking head and mouth and its long, muscular body. It is one of the most active and agile of beasts, and has enormous strength. It leaps twenty feet at a bound and can carry off a big ox to its lair.

When the tiger is hungry there is no danger that it will not brave to get food. One has been known to carry off a soldier from the middle of a camp, nothing daunted by the presence of a crowd of men. Many years ago tigers were a perfect scourge to the people of some parts of India, and they are yet where the settlements are scattered. They carry off both people and cattle, and naturally the inhabitants devise all sorts of ways to rid themselves of such a dangerous foe. One of the queerest devices is to spread broad leaves smeared with glue in the tiger's way and when he steps on them of course they stick to his paws. He then rubs his paws on his head to get the leaves off and they stick to his head and blind his eyes. He then lies down and rolls on the ground howling with rage and when the hunter hears the noise he comes up and kills the beast.

Like the lion, the tiger can be tamed until it is almost as harmless as a cat, for, you know it is only its big cousin. A story is told of a tiger that came on a ship from India, and it was so gentle that the boys who were employed on the vessel used to sleep with their heads resting on its body for a pillow.

The Roman Emperors used to have tame tigers that went about their palaces with as much freedom as we allow to the most ordinary pets. They also used them to draw their chariots, just as they did the lions we have told you about. Emperor Nero, the infamous tyrant, who is said to have "fiddled while Rome was burning," had a pet tigress which he kept always near him. Sometimes, at the end of a feast, he would point out to the tigress some one with whom he was displeased, and the beast, trained to do his bidding, would leap upon the unfortunate victim and kill him before the guests' very eyes.

armored coast-defence vessels, seven unarmored cruisers, eleven gun-boats, and nearly forty torpedo boats.

Even this array does not take in all the vessels which were present at the review of Monday, and possibly in the final programme some additional or different assignments may be made, some of those at first detailed for service under Achill being transferred to the colors of John Bull, or the reverse. But in any case it is the British navy that out of its abundant resources furnishboth the hostile and the home squadron. If imperfections are found on either side as the result of the encounters, they can be remedied without waiting for a real war to make remedy too late. There are compensations and consolations in advance for various kinds of unpleasant developments. Should the attack prevail over the defence, it will be reflected that after all English skill conducted it. Indeed, while the pessimist is already counting on the fact that British sailors will surely be beaten, the optimist is finding equal inspiration in the fact also assured in advance that British sailors will be victorious.

The Kaiser in England.

Exit the Shah, enter the Emperor. The lion of Persia has left the shores of England and betaken himself to France, whither the German emperor, at present on a visit to hi august grandmother, our most gracious and revered Queen, for obvious reasons is not likely to follow him. The Emperor William is accompanied by Count Herbert Bismarck, whose injudicious utterances at the time of Wilhelm's accession to the throne of Frederic, his father, fanned the feeling of irratibility that then prevailed in England. At the present moment, however, the hatchet appears to have been buried and things seem lovely. The Count's alroy master has taken part in a family dinner at Osborne and has been treated to the grandest of all the spectacles England can offer—a naval review, in which 150 vessels of war took part, including 30 of the most formidable line of battle ships the civilized world can produce. The Emperor was made an honorary admiral of the fleet and in the full fig of that exalted position surveyed the magnificent scene with complacency, if not with satisfaction at the thought that some day all this massive array of strength might be arrayed against his be loved naterland. But nothing untoward, beyond some unpleasant weather, occurred to in the glories of the occasion, and in the near future the Prince of Wales will return the Emperor's visit and make a brief sejourn at the court of Berlin, while her Majesty the Queen has been appointed chief of the first Dragoon guards of Germany.

She Was a "Native Daughter."

"So you're going to marry old Jones, are you, Maud?"

"Yes, Cicely."

"Awfully rich, isn't he?"

"Yes, beastly rich."

"But I thought you were going to marry young Spriggins. Weren't you engaged?"

"Oh, yes, indeed! But he has just gone abroad for a couple of years. I expect to marry him when he returns."

"Oh! And Mr. Jones?"

"Humph! He won't last that long. Nothing like having a nice young husband and plenty of money, too!"—[Wasp.

An English financial paper relates that in 1888 391,000 persons in Canada sent money by postal order to relatives in the United Kingdom amounting to $5,250,000. These figures are said to have been made public by the Postmaster-General of England.

possible chance there might be of fogs and ice crossing the banks of Newfoundland at this season—the engines were put at full speed, and for something over four days they were driven at the average rate of ninety revolutions of the screws per minute. There was a variation from eighty-six to ninety-two revolutions. When the furnaces were opened to be cleaned the intensity of the steam would be diminished for a few minutes and the speed of the screws reduced to eighty-six turns in the minute. It will be noted that the average speed was three revolutions in two seconds, and the screws are twenty feet in diameter. It is astonishing that this velocity can be maintained day and night without a second's waiting, and avoid developing excessive and crippling heat. The fact that thirty men are employed to pour oil upon the bearings and all parts where the friction is severe, will perhaps account in part for the phenomena, but certainly only the greatest perfection of material, and the most delicate adaptation of one part to the other, could provide for such a strain without disaster. I doubt whether so startling a test of integrity and absolute exactitude in manufacture can be found in any other machinery. During the late run of the City of Paris the wind was so strong from the north one afternoon as to give the ship a decided list, elevating the larboard screw so that at each turn the blades threw showers of spray with a dazzling rush far behind the vessel. There are four blades in the screw, revolving three times in two seconds—so there were six white surges per second dashed to the winds, and a fine reminder of the snowy rapids of Niagara.

Assault by an Indian.

MONTREAL, Aug. 29.—An Indian from Caughnawaga named Joseph Sharonhati was sent for trial to the Court of Queen's Bench for a fiendish assault on a girl eleven years of age, daughter of Constable Lefort of that village. In the preliminary investigation the young victim and her two companions, the Misses Latch, of Ottawa, who are on a visit at Lachine and Caughnawaga, said under oath that the accused had lured them away from the village out of earshot and view of any habitation, and then dragged little Ida Lefort into a bush. Her companions dared not follow at first, but the child's cries finally induced them to enter the brush, whence the accused fled precipitately upon their approach. On hearing of the occurrence Constable Lefort armed himself with two revolvers, determined, he says, to punish the brute. He did not, however, find him at home. In the evening he met him on the street and took him into the presence of the girls, all of whom identified him as the man in question. Lefort raised his revolver to the prisoner's face, but before he could fire his wife prevented him from killing Sharonhati. The victim is in a serious if not dangerous condition.

The Folly of it.

It is altogether beyond belief that it will be possible for us to sustain the pretension of Secetary Blaine that Behring sea is distinctly American water. Our maintenance of such a theory on the Pacific side of the continent, in view of the claims we make on the Atlantic side, cannot fail to make us a laughing stock of all foreign diplomatists; for, if the United States can claim that Behring sea, which, dividing America from Asia, is at certain places more than a thousand miles in width, is a closed sea, then there is nothing to prevent England from claiming that the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Hudson bay and Baffin bay are closed seas, in which American fishermen and whalers have no right to ply their trade.—[Boston Herald.

PEOPLE AND EVENTS.

Sir Edward Watkin proposes, if ever he gets his channel tunnel cut through—and that's a big, big if—to run trains direct from London to Gibraltar, transfer cars by boat to Tangier, and thence along the north coast of Africa, through Egypt, down the Persian Gulf to Kurrachee, and so on to Calcutta, without change of cars.

The Standard Oil Company's new steamers for carrying oil in bulk will be ready for service in September. The first vessel, named the Bayonne, was launched on the Clyde on July 2, and has a capacity of 4,000 tons. She will have electric-lights, steam steering gear, and triple expansion engines, and will carry 1,500,000 gallons, which can be discharged in ten hours.

Canada has 124,589 Indians, of whom 37,944 are in British Columbia, 26,388 in Manitoba and the Northwestern Territory, 17,700 in Ontario, 12,465 in Quebec, 8,000 in Athabaska, 7,000 in Mackenzie district, 4,016 in Eastern Rupert's Land, 4,000 on the Arctic coasts, 2,145 in New Scotland, 2,038 in the Peace River district., 1,594 in New Brunswick, 1,000 in the interior of Labrador, and 319 in Prince Edward Island.

Joseph A. Donohoe, of Menlo Park, Cal., has offered a medal to be given to the first discoverer on that coast of every new comet, and to the first observer who makes a precise observation of a telescopic periodic comet at any of its expected returns. It is a curious coincidence that the same week which saw this recognition of astronomical research witnessed an offer by J. Mervyn Donahue, another Californian, of a purse of $7,000 for a prize fight between Kilrain and the Australian negro, Peter Jackson, provided the contest should take place in San Francisco.

The new law in Connecticut requiring the removal of saloon screens has brought about the following situation. "The new screen law has produced rather an interesting and a somewhat complicated situation in New Britain. Mr. Dunn's saloon is set off from the restaurant by a partition so arranged that on Sunday and after midnight on week-days the bar can be entirely closed up and separated from the restaurant. The latter can then, by law, be kept open all the time. If the partition between restaurant and bar is removed, so as to give a clear view of the latter from the street, the saloon and the restaurant become one and the latter must be closed at midnight and on Sundays. The situation has given rise to a number of interviews between the County Commissioners and Mr. Dunn's counsel, with a view to obviating the difficulty.

The Old, Old Story.

Have you forgotten the old, old story
You whispered to me on that golden day
When the sun was flooding the earth with glory,
And hedges were fragrant and white with may?
Our path led over the cowslip-meadow,
Where birds sang gaily from every tree,
And the way was flecked with sunshine and shadow;
But only the sunshine fell on me.

With the lads and lasses to go a-maying,
That morn we had left for a space life's toil;
And we heard the sound of their footsteps straying
Where the hawthorn promised abundant spoil.
Their hearts grew glad in the golden weather;
They gathered the flowers beneath their feet;
But we two loitered behind together,
For the old, old story seemed new and sweet.

Most Terrible of Children.

A visit to the little island of Marken, inhabited by primitive fishing folk, still wearing the costume in fashion with their forefathers three hundred years ago, was made memorable by the vexatious conduct of the boys of the place. "I did not mind the girls. But by and by school broke up, and down to quay side ran all the naughty boys of Marken. We suffered a terrible persecution at their hands, so that the tender-hearted girls pitied us and rebuked, but to no effect, their unruly brothers. The Hollanders spoil their children, never punish them and allow them—provided they don't play the truant from school, for education is a serious business in this country—to do pretty well as they like. Should a stranger—my authority is one of our consuls over here—take it upon himself to sprank one of these little rascals, for throwing stones at him or otherwise misbehaving himself, the whole of the parents of the locality would rise in a body and seek that stranger's blood. A Corsican vendetta would be chiid's play to what he might expect. If you value your life, put up with insult, robbery, blows, torture at the hands of a Hollander infant, but do not venture to chastise him. Of all the children in Europe the Dutch child is most to be feared. Now the Zuider Zee child is the most terrible of Dutch children, and the Marken child the most terrible of the Zuider Zee, and hence of the whole species. Our position can, therefore, be imagined by any father of a large family." The chief amusement of these boys was pelting the vessel with stones and brickbats, and, finally her berth had to be altered to get out of their way.

She Knew the Scheme.

A girl with a bundle in her hand was going up Park street yesterday when she met a girl with a bundle coming down. They seemed to intuitively divine each other's occupation, and the fact that each was out of a job.

"When did you leave?" queried the first.

"About an hour ago. When did you?"

"Same time. What did you quit for?"

"Folks had too much company and I worked like a slave. What did you quit for?"

"Folks had no company nor nothing to do, and I was getting too fat. Don't we have hard times, though?"

"Dreffal. If it isn't one thing it's another. I am now after a place where the lady is said to respect her servant's feelings."

"How nice! That means every evening out—all the beaus you want—breakfast at half past eight and girl company every afternoon. Oh! but it can't last. It's a scheme to get you there and put a double wash on you for a starter."—[Detroit Free Press.

HOME DRESSMAKING.

A partly worn basque may be renovated or a plain one be made into a dressy garment, by adding a lace and silk muslin garniture shown in Figure No. 54. A straight piece of silk muslin, 48 inches in length, folded round the neck, as illustrated, loose pleats that are tapered in at the waist and then fall loose.

FIG 54

A row of lace trims the entire edge, and insertion is set in at the bottom of the V-shaped neck before the muslin is pleated. The sleeves should be finished with a lace frill, which is sewed in so as to be fuller and wider toward the back.

Wash goods have the round, full waist gathered and lapped front and back, or at the front only. The V is of embroidery or goods. One revers down the lapping side is worn. The round, turned-over frill of lace or embroidery on the neck and sleeves has just caught public favor at its flood. Straight gathered skirts of cotton goods are not lined. A white skirt having stiffly starched ruffles up the entire back should be worn with a cotton gown.

latter has gathers at the top and waist centre, front and back with full sleeves and lace frills.

The straight gathered skirt is four yards and a half wide, and is worn over the waist, which is cut long enough to thrust beneath the belt. A ribbon belt is worn, and tied on the left side.

Straight skirts are varied by having a Grecian-draped front, which is shown in this issue in pattern No. 4306. Side pleats, Spanish flounce fronts or deep rings over the front and sides at the top, making them in straight rows or deep Vandykes.

The foot of the front and sides may be finished with a box-pleated ruche, a gathered frill of silk, lace, or the dress fabric; and the old fashion of leaf or square tabs of the material over a tiny flounce of lace has been revived for Empire gowns.

Figure No. 59 is one of those standard designs that are always in fashion for cotton, flannel, cloth, or cheviot every-day gowns. The belted blouse has three tiny folds down either side of the front, and a plain back, with a high collar, coat sleeves and belt of the dress goods. The full skirt has the sides and back laid—not caught down—in kilt pleats, the front gathered, cut somewhat longer on the right side and caught up there in a shallow funnel pleat.

The full Empire waists are cut with or without side forms, according to the figure, only very slender figures being able to dispense with them. The fronts are without darts, the fullness being shirred along the shoulder seams and at the waist line, unless a very short basque is worn, and then the fullness ends in close overlapping pleats from the waist line to the edge of the garment. The lining of the front has the

Pretty yokes for cotton and challie gown, are rounded back and front, and very short, with the body portion gathered on a standing frill, which is doubled—not hemmed—at the top. A revived fashion shows the neck, sleeves, and edge of yoke, finished with a puff of the fabric, gathered a frill on either side, or a box-pleated ruche of lace having the straight edges sewed together before it is pleated.

suitable for cotton, tennis flannel, surah, of light-weight woolen goods. The back is cut like an ordinary loose waist, while the front is represented with a pointed yoke of folds from the shoulder-seams on either side of a V of embroidery, with a collar to match. The lower portion of the fronts is gathered on the yoke, forming an erect ruffle, and worn with a belt, leaving the basque part outside of the skirt. The sleeves are gathered at the shoulders, and into cuff bands of embroidery.

Figured woolen goods, surah, and embroidery galloon are illustrated in Figure No. 56, though plain and figured India silk or woolen material would afford a handsome combination. The front and right side of the skirt are of the silk laid in kilt pleats, with a full straight back, and the left side partly crossing the front of the woolen fabric.

The round waist fastens invisibly, and has the right side and collar completely covered with embroidery, while the left front is full from the shoulder and lapped over the waist line under a girdle belt of the embroidery. The sleeves are full at the top, and have cuffs of the galloon embroidery.

The lace trimming shown in Figure No. 57 answers either for a pointed or round basque, with long or short sleeves. Lace about four inches wide forms a round collar and epaulet on the right shoulder, with a drapery of lace net or silk muslin, edged with lace down the front and over to the right hip.

Loops of No. 12 ribbon are placed at the neck, falling over the bust where the drapery ends, over on the right side, and a bow at the waist line. Flowers are interspersed among the ribbons to brighten the dressy effect.

The morning robe shown in figure No 58 is appropriate for Valenciennes lace and nainsook or India silk, or the lace on the skirt might be omitted, and a neat gown be made of cashmere. The guimpe may be of velvet' plain or tucked nainsook, surah, or embroidery, according to the material selected, and this is made on a close-fitting lining, with the low baby waist worn over it. The usual darts, and often a sash is folded narrow and laid around this edge so as to outline it before it is tied in the back or at the side.

are without reeds. Surah, pongee, or muslin is used, with frills of lace or the material at the foot. One reed is inserted about seventeen inches below the belt, and the skirt is cut like a dress pattern. If of muslin, the trimming would be of embroidery, and the reed withdrawn for washing. If for a stout person, a yoke should be fitted to the top in place of a belt.

Figure No. 61 is represented in white and embroidered nainsook, though the design will readily lend itself to silk and woolen combinations. The skirt is arranged in wide kilt pleats, a full gathered back, and flat front of embroidery over a lining of the usual shape.

The jaunty Directoire gown shone in Figure No. 63 is of cashmere, with cuffs collar, and vest of figured India silk. The gathered skir its trimmed across the front and sides with a deep border of embroidery, and a sash bow hangs on the left side.

The coat basque has a long, narrow back to the foot of the skirt, and jacket fronts having revers and large buttons. The double-breasted vest also has revers showing a V of the basque material. The sleeves are coat shaped, and the whole costume bears the unmistakble Parisian stamp.

The measurements of a Parisian-made gown in lidate wider skirts, as the lining of this one is 3 yards in width. The front is 27 inches wide at the bottom and 9 inches at the top; the gore on either side is 14 inches at the belt, and 23 inches on the lower edge, and the straight back is 36 inches in width, with a 12 inch reed 13 inches below the belt, and has the tiniest of pad bustles.

Handsome skirts have a gathered and pinked silk frill on the inside of the lower edge. Skirts often slip around, and thus lose their designed effect, but sewing a hook at the centre front of the belt, and an eye on the corsets, any twisting around may be prevented.

Sash ends, trimmed with trimmed with fringe, are cut straight across. The front and sides are frequently finished on the lower edge with fringe, which falls over a gathered frill of the dress material. A flat border of ribbon, lace insertion, embroidery, galloon, woven designs, or velvet continue in vogue for the front and sides, or front only, of skirts.

Lace basques for stout figures are made of the lace laid smoothly over the silk lining, with bretelles of three rows of No. 7 ribbon passing over the shoulders and tapering to one row about 2 inches back of the slight point of the bodice, back and front. The sleeves are trimmed with lengthwise rows of ribbon to the elbows.

The Directoire ruffle on waists is a gathered ruffle, three inches deep, of crepe, silk muslin, silk embroidery, or lace, finely knife-pleated or left plain, and sewed down the lapped edge of the round waist full enough to fall gracefully. It is usually accompanied by a turn over collar and cuffs to correspond.

The full sleeves are shown in many designs, but the most highly favored one is quite close at the wrists and slightly full at the top. This has coat shaped lining, with the outer material cut longer.

Then there is a draped sleeve having the foundation cut as usual, with the top part of the outer material of the larger half of the sleeve cut longer and wider at the top, which fullness is draped in easy folds over the shoulder, tapering narrower in the centre. In all cases the top of the sleeve is arranged to give a rounder appearance to the arms and a graceful slope to the shoulders.

Miss Cutwell—"Papa, you are real stingy to refuse me that bracelet. Did you see Sadie Shoddy's jewelry at the ball?"

Cutwell (an honest clothier)—"My dear, Sadie's father is a very rich man."

John L. Sullivan was, on Saturday morning, sentenced to twelve months in prison, and Referee Fitzpatrick pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a fine of $300.

Three thousand persons at Portland, Me., have signed a petition asking Secretary Blaine to take steps to secure a stay of proceedings in the case of Mrs. Maybrick.

A Hangman Tried for His Life.

Berlin has just had a most extraordinary sensational trial—curious, indeed almost without parallel, among the records of crime. The hangman has been accused of assassination and tried for his life. Of course it was a question of jealousy. The Berlin executioner does not lead a very moral life. He is a married man with a family, and he deserted both, and the poor wife soon had a rival. But he also deserted the rival in her turn. The dry statistics of the law courts read like the argument of some ingenious play. The abandoned mistress longed to recover her supremacy. One would not have thought a hangman capable of such attraction. She tried every means to gain her object, and at last in despair had recourse to the executioner's assistant and right hand man, whom she knew and whose influence over him was great. There were interviews between the two hangmen, but matters did not advance. Then there was an angry interview at a restaurant, in the course of which the chief kicked his aid-de-camp in the stomach. The injury was more serious than it seemed, and a month afterward the poor go-between died. All sorts of evidence were given at the trial, and the jury were merciful in their verdict. But the criminal classes of Berlin were greatly disappointed. It would have been interesting, they seemed to have thought, if the new hangman had to try his 'prentice hand on his predecessor.

Too Late for That.

"I want to get a good hammock," said the customer. "Strong enough to hold two, I suppose?" suggested the salesman slyly. "No, sir," said the customer with some show of resentment. "No, sir; I've been married for more than three years."

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, AUG. 30, 1889.

THE REASON WHY.

Will some of our Tory friends be good enough to tell us how it is that whilst vast sums of surplus British capital are at this moment being invested in the United States—in coal mines, iron mines, oil wells, lumbering and other industries—the British investor is giving Canada a wide berth? Have we no iorn, coal, lumber, copper or oil to be developed? Why, yes. The natural wealth of the Dominion is very nearly as great as that of the United States. Probably if a thorough exploration were made of the James Bay and Hudson's Bay regions, and of the huge Territory watered by the Mackenzie River, it would be found that our natural wealth is actually larger than that of our neighbors. Our labour is as cheap as American labor; our water-power, waterways and railroad facilities relatively as good and convenient; our people every bit as [illegible] enterprising. What, then, is the matter with Canada, that these British capitalists go to the United States with their money, and invest it in building up the industries of the South, the West, and the North-western States?

We haven't a market—that is the trouble. What would be the use, for instance, of opening iorn mines in Addington, or coal mines in Nova Scotia, or oil wells in the country north of Calgary, when there is no means of disposing of the output? Give us access to the United States market and both British and American capital will come here to utilize our resources and give employment to our people, who for want of it drift across the lines in thousands every year, and are forever lost to their native land.

SWEATING THE FARMER.

A Plum Creek, Man., settler writes to a Brandon paper, that there must be some thing wrong with the Customs department because "they certainly charged me more than the 35 per cent. duty authorized by Parliament upon certain agricultural implements which I recently imported from Chicago, and Racine, Wis." This settler does not seem to be aware that the Customs department wields what is virtually a taxing power, distinct from that vested in it by the people's representatives. A farmer or an implement agent imports machines from the States. The Canadian duty, as stated above, is 35 per cent., but the Customs officials are authorized to fix the valuation of the article, and by adding

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.

In these days of Jesuit aggression and anti-Jesuit ranting, I would like to ask both parties a few questions, with a view of ascertaining, whither we are drifting.

We are very apt to forget that we are living in the nineteenth Century, and not in the middle ages, when the extreme religious factions, held the boards, and neither gave to nor asked quarter from his opponents. At this distance of time, we look upon the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the walls of Derry and persecutions by the so-called Protestants, not only of the Catholics, but also of protestant brethren who dared to be non-conformists, as huge monuments of folly and intolerance, which mark an epoch in the worlds history—the dynamo which produced the electricity that has enlightened the world and taught mankind the true principal of equal rights and privileges to all. With these facts in view, I would like to ask the Jesuits of this Dominion, are you willing to stand upon the platform of equal rights to all? If so, cease your aggressive policy, and learn to respect the rights of your fellow men, and be satisfied with the privilege of worshipping God according to your conscience, without seeking to compel others to your way of thinking.

By the act Cession the Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec were guaranteed the right to exercise their religion so far as it did not interfere with British laws and institutions, no further. Have you kept [illegible] is prescribed? Does not seeking and obtaining endowment in [illegible] contrary? The British [illegible] guarantees you in all the privileges you are entitled to. Be satisfied with that.

In Ontario you sought and obtain separ[illegible]ols, which you were not entitled to. [illegible] let me ask, who was it help you [illegible], and made it possible to obtain [illegible] advantage? Was it not the solid vote of these very Orangemen, who are now seeking to hunt you out of the land like wild beasst? Yes the Orange and the green could blend harmoniously when your interest were being served. How was it when the Orangemen wanted their quid pro quo and stood knocking at the door of Parliament asking for incorporation? Did you not very cooly vote solid against incorporation? Have you the Jesuits a right to incorporation if the Orangemen have not? I don't wish it to be understood that all Catholics are thus illiberal, because I know there is a large section who stood shoulder to shoulder with the Protestant liberals of Ontario and Quebec, in the memorable clergy reserve and Senorial Tenure fights, of former days, and who are to-day ready to battle for equal rights and privileges for all. On the other hand there are those among you who are willing to be bought and sold, and are the puppets in the hands of those who would keep you in ignorance, the more easily to carry out their aggressive plans.

On the other side of the fence stands the disenchanted followers of Sir John Macdonald and McKenzie Bowell, ready to reek their vengeance on the first unlucky head that may appear. Not only the political leaders like McCarthy and O'Brien, have mounted to protestant horse, but, could inconsistency go further? the "Messengers of peace" are on the rampage, and stumping the country from one end to the other, and howling with a zeal worthy of a better cause. "We are not partizan politicans. We are not opposed to the church of Rome exercising her religious privileges, but we do claim the right of saying what they shall and what they shall not do, and either the Jesuits or Confederation must go." prudent to trust to the blind guidance of either Jesuit aggressor or anti-Jesuit ranter.

Respectfully yours,

duty, as stated above, is 35 per cent., but the Customs officials are authorized to fix the valuation of the article, and by adding ten, twenty or thirty per cent. to the invoice price, they largely augment the duty paid by the settler. In this way, too, they contrive to harass and destroy the import trade, with the result that the settlers are left completely at the mercy of the Canadian makers. In spite of this system, however, a considerable number of American implements are still brought into Manitoba and the Territories. In a recent report to the Washington Government, Mr. Taylor, the United States Consul at Winnipeg, says that nearly 15 per cent. of the implement business is done with American houses. This of itself is an answer to the protectionist fable, that the N. P. enables the Canadian maker to turn out a better and a cheaper article than his competitors.

The revaluation system is, in fact, an additional prop to monopoly. Some time ago a firm of implement manufacturers in Western Ontario wanted five car loads of nuts and bolts. There was a combine among the few Canadian nut and bolt makers, and the firm wrote to the secretary of it, offering to pay the American price at Cleveland, O., plus the Canadian duty, for a consignment. The secretary refused to accept this figure, whereupon the firm imported the five carloads direct from Cleveland. But on its arrival at its destination the shipment was seized for undervaluation by the Customs authorities; and on enquiry the firm found that the secretary of the combine had been in communication with the Customs department, and had really prompted the seizure. The firm lost nothing in the end by this act of robbery, for of course the additional price was collected from the Canadian farmers who bought the implements, into the manufacture of which the nuts and bolts entered. The farmer is the victim of last resort in all such transactions, and even the monopolists who prey upon him are beginning to ask how much longer he is likely to stand it.

The Queen had an enthusiastic welcome at Wrexham, Wales on Saturday.

The wheat markets continue dull and irregular, with prices on Saturday the lowest for some time in New York and Chicago. Oats were especially weak in Chicago, selling at 22⅞c for May. Pork and lard steady.

W. N. Cronk, Belleville, who stole a trunk, was convicted, and the Magistrate thoughtfully asked him to choose between a year in the central prison and two in the penitentiary. He was given until today to decide.

but we do claim the right of saying what they shall and what they shall not do, and either the Jesuits or Confederation must go." Where to pray? Were not the Jesuits here before you were? Who then is the aggressor? Who is doing the ousting? If you don't like his style of living you need not stay in Quebec, the world is wide, there is plenty of room in the west; go there and build up a country to suit yourself. No, you won't do that, it is your mission to remain in Quebec and convert the heathen, and cry "No Surrender" till every mother's son of Jean Baptiste is made to swallow the thirty-nine articles, or at least, be able to repeat the shorter Catachism. Would you not also like to enact the Blue laws of Connecticut? Don't wince under the lash of conscience, bring them to time, they are only poor papists, and must be saved at all hazards, although you are made to "play fantastic tricks before high heaven," in the operation.

Gentlemen you are forgetting your calling when you undertake to run the political machine. No one denies you the right to exercise the franchise and to express your views as often and where you please, but when you pose as leaders in political matters you will excuse me if I prefer a more experienced guide.

You don't know what you are doing. I will qualify this remark by saying some of you don't know what you are doing, others of you know perfectly well what you would like to accomplish.

One of the open secrets is manifest in the open tirade against Mowat, notwithstanding your know perfectly well that Mowat is not in the slightest degree responsible for the Jesuit estate act. But the protestant horse has been stabled for a time and wants exercise, and what better fun than to gallop him after Mowat, with the whole pack of hungry office seekers in full cry "Mowat must go." Supposing you should succeed in ousting Mowat, what would you gain by the change? You will have the old, old story repeated, Tory Orangemen voting with Tory Catholics to extend the privileges of the church to the latter and the fat offices to the former. This would happen simply because you have not been educated up to that point of civilization, which would enable you to stand up for the right in an united phalanx, willing to concede to others the rights and privileges you claim to be so dearly in love with. You lack the elements of success viz: Unity of aim and action; you never have shown the world that you possess these elements; for the minute you vanquish a foe; you turn around and devour each other.

Your agitation only amounts to a disturbing influence, and is only useful to the opponents of right. You have followed the lead of your old Chieftain until you are up to the neck in the mire; followed him when he was buying up these same dandies to keep himself in power, and now, it is enough to make a Scotchman mad, just to think that a Scotchman and Highland at that, should be beaten at his own game, outwitted by a bullfrog eating Frenchman, and outbidden for the French vote. Oh! horror of horrors, after that the deluge.

But like loyal sons of worthy sires, you won't forsake the dear old Chieftain in his hour of trouble and sore affliction, when the next election comes round you will vote for his nominee all the same.

Play out the farce gentlemen. What have you in common with Mowat and the Grits? Have you not ever been found clogging the wheels of progress and trying to tomahawk every child of liberty since the world began? Look at your record as portrayed in history and see if you have not forgotten the tricks you have been accustomed to play, and the old wide stage, and pardon the subject for thinking it im-

TEA EXTRAORDINARY !

Having recently secured an extraordinary good bargain in tea, we intend to share it with our customers.

Heretofore we have given extra good value in Tea at 25 cents per pound, but the fifty chests just received would be "dirt cheap" at 45 cents, and 25 cents is what we shall sell it at. We venture to say and we have had many years experience in the tea trade, that nothing to compare with it has ever been sold in Napanee at that price.

To those who want to save money and at same time enjoy a choice cup of Tea, we say come and get a pound and we feel certain it will cause you to come for more.

The annual excursion of the Methodist Church to the Thousand Islands was an encouraging success, financially and otherwise. The day was most delightful and the programme was all that had been announced. Prof. Morgan and family favored us with a first-class selection of vocal and instrumental music, and in unstinted measure, and was greatly appreciated. On returning to this dock the excursionists were delighted to see the spacious grounds of Mr. McPherson's summer residence beautifully illuminated with Chinese lanterns and other devices. D. W. Allisons's princely residence was also all ablaze from attic to basement. Altogether the effect was most charming from the waters.

The Rev. Mr. Chalmers, once stationed on the old Bath circuit, is on a visit to his cousin. Capt. Chalmers, and will preach next Sabbath at the Adolphustown Memorial Church in the morning, and in Bath at night.

UNDER AN AFRICAN SUN

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

CHAPTER VI.

Tom Digby's right hand clenched, and as Helen clung to his left, she felt his nerves and muscles quiver with rage. A curious sensation of faintness came over her, and she struggled to be firm, as she told herself that she might prevent some terrible encounter.

But there was nothing of the kind, for Ramon came forward eagerly. "Ah, there you are!' he exclaimed. "Had a pleasant day?—Why where are the others?"

"Did you not hear them?' said Digby roughly.

"No.—Oh yes; I heard Senor Redgrave call. I missed them as I came through the trees. What a delightful evening! I passed three years in London, Mr. Digby; but I never saw such an evening as this." He chatted away, as he stepped to the other side of the mule, keeping on without waiting for the other's reply. "You have had a splendid day, but very hot down by the town. You have felt it cold up the mountain, Mr. Digby?"

"Yes, very," said Digby shortly; and he felt Helen press his hand gently, as if she were imploring him not to be angry.

"But you could not have had a clearer day for the view.—Did you feel the cold much, Miss Helen?"

"No—no," she said quietly. "I don't think it was very cold."

"Generally is.—I beg pardon, Mr Digby! Have a cigar?"

"If I refuse it, he'll take it for a declaration of war, and I don't want to fight.—Why should I?—poor wretch!"

"There you are," said Ramon, coming round by the back of the mule with his case open. "The smaller are the best."

"Thanks," said Digby, taking one.

"Let me give you a light."

A match was struck, and by its light Digby caught a glimpse of the Spaniard's face, which was as calm and unruffled as could be.

Then they went on, and retook their places on either side of the mule.

"I've been very busy too," continued Ramon. "Tired; but was curious to hear how you had got on; and yet half afraid that the crater had given way and swallowed you all up."

Digby felt tongue-tied; but Ramon chattered away.

"I wonder whether Senor Redgrave will let me throw myself upon his hospitality this evening? I called on my way up, and found that you had not returned. I left some fruit; and there was a fragrance from the kitchen window that was maddening to a hungry man.—Ah! here we are." For they had come up to Redgrave and Fraser, who were standing beside the track.

"You, Ramon?" said Redgrave rather sternly.

"Yes, my dear sir. I thought I would go and meet them; but I missed you.—My dear Redgrave, I want you to give me a bit of dinner to-night."

"Certainly," replied Redgrave—and he told a polite lie: "I shall be very happy."

For the rest of the way Ramon did nearly all the talking; and during the evening his conversation was fluent and highly interesting as he engaged Fraser in conversation about the antiquities of the place: smoking cigars and sipping his chocolate in the most unruffled way.

"You are making quite a collection of our minerals, I hear," he said in the course of people whom Fate has evidently marked out for husband and wife?'

"Fate be hanged! What has Fate got to do with it?'

"Do you not see that you are making a powerful enemy of Ramon, who has the father at his mercy?'

"I'll pitch Ramon down one of the barrancos, if he doesn't mind what he is about," cried Digby warmly.

"Mind he does not pitch you down, Tom. But—about Helen Redgrave?"

"Well, what about her? I know what my dear old moralist is about to say: Marriage is a serious thing—I have my friends to study—I ought not to be rash—I ought to wait—I ought to write home."

"Yes; I should have said something of the kind, and also warned you to flee from danger—and temptation."

"Then here we are at the roost, and I am going to get on my perch at once, my dear old model of wisdom; but before I do so, here are my answers to your warnings: I am well off; I am my own master; and I have neither father nor mother to consult. Greatest and most cogent answer of all—Helen."

Half an hour after, setting at defiance the insect plagues of the island, Tom Digby was sleeping peacefully and dreaming of his sweet young mistress while Fraser was seated in his own room, with his arms folded, gazing out through the open window, with the darkness visible and mental ahead.

"He loves her, and—— Yes,'' he added, after a painful sigh, "what wonder, poor boy—she loves him in return. Oh! I must have been mad—I must be mad.—And that man Ramon? Yes; he smiled and showed his white teeth. I would not trust him for a moment. The calm was too false and treacherous. If I could only get the poor boy away!'

CHAPTER VII.

A week of unalloyed happiness passed during which time every evening was spent at the villa. Digby grew more joyous; the saddened look was rapidly passing away from Helen's face, and that of her father grew puzzled, while Fraser's seemed more sombre and sad.

Ramon had fetched them to his place again and again, and had also begged leave to accompany them in two of their expeditions, finding horses and mules, and proving himself a polished and agreeable guide, taking them to various points, whose marvels made Fraser forget his own trouble in the excitement of discoveries dear to a naturalist's heart; while, after these journeys, Ramon always insisted upon the travellers accepting his hospitality.

They had just finished dinner, and Ramon had left them for a time, one of his servants having called him away, a summons which, after many apologies, he had obeyed, leaving the friends together, when, pushing the jug of excellent French claret towards his companion, Digby, who was slightly flushed, exclaimed: "Taste that, my boy, and confess that our host is a charming fellow and a polished gentleman."

"Yes, I confess to those," said Fraser gravely; and just then Ramon reappeared at the door, bearing a fresh box of cigars, which he handed to his guests and resumed his seat.

"One of the evils of possessing plantations," he said. "Your men are always coming with the news of some disaster."

"Too bad of Horace," he grumbled to himself as he set off up the mountain track to where it diverged, and the path led to Ramon's plantations, with the house away to the left in a beautiful nook which commanded a view of the distant islands.

For a moment he hesitated as to whether he should walk down to Ramon's for a chat before starting; and he hesitated again after going a few yards; but finally he stepped out boldly with the hot sun pouring down; and as he went on, a careworn face was slowly raised from out of a clump of semi-tropical foliage, and Fraser stood well concealed, watching him till he passed out of sight. Then, after a cautious look round he sank back into his place of concealment, and the birds that had flitted away returned, the stillness around being unbroken, save when the low deep murmur of the surf arose from far below.

"Too bad of old Horace," said Digby, as he strode along, past Ramon's plantations, till the wild country began; and recognising various places he had passed before, the young explorer soon reached the spot where the track leading to the barranco commenced—a path growing fainter and fainter, and more obliterated by the abundant growth, till it gradually became a mere shelf on the mountain side. The dense tangle at first sloped down to his left, and up to his right, but grew more and more precipitous, till there was an almost perpendicular wall of volcanic rock, out of which the shrubby growth and ferns spread out, and formed a shadowy arch, which screened him from the sun; while a foot away on his left there was a profound drop, the rock again going perpendicularly down, and in places the shelf along which he passed quite overhung the verdant gorge.

And so it continued for quite a couple of hours, during which he went on along the shelf, whose abundant growth hid the danger of the way; for it was only at times that he obtained a glimpse of the depths below, where some avalanche of stones had crashed down from above and swept the trees away.

"He's right: it is a glorious walk," cried Digby enthusiastically; "only, it seems so stupid to be enjoying it all alone."

For another hour he went on, still wondering that he had seen no traces left by his friend, but soon forgetting this in the fresh glories of the overshadowed path, and the lovely glints of sunshine in the zigzagging tunnel of ferns and creepers, which literally seemed to flow down in cascades of growing leafage from the wall on his right.

"Nature must have made this path," he said to himself; "and it can only be seldom trod. Leads to nowhere, of course, and—— Hillo! here's the end." For, at a sudden turn, after passing an angle of the rock, he found himself face to face with a huge mass of stone, which had evidently lately slipped from a few feet above the track, and completely blocked the way.

"That's awkward," he said thoughtfully. "Too steep to get over.—Ha! that's it." He smiled as he saw that to the left of the large block the green growth had been trampled down, the shelf being wide enough for any one to pass round, though the gorge seemed there to be almost dark, so filled up was it with the tops of the trees which bristled from its side.

"The old boy has been round here for one, this morning. First time I've seen his marks.—My word, he has been chipping away here," he added, as he looked at the broken fragments of stone in the newly made curve of the path.

Without a moment's hesitation he stepped down, then took another step, for the way descended apparently, to rise again beyond the block. Then another step on to some fagot-like brushwood, laid across, to form a cigars and sipping his chocolate in the most unruffled way.

"You are making quite a collection of our minerals, I hear," he said in the course of the conversation.

"Yes, I have a good many."

"Of course you examined the head of the barranco on the west side of the mountain?"

"No; we have not been there yet."

"Not been! Why, my dear sir, that is the most interesting place of the whole. You should go there.—By the way, Redgrave, I suppose the nearest way would be right across my plantation?"

"Decidedly," said Redgrave, who seemed puzzled by his visitor's urbanity.

"Yes," said Ramon thoughtfully; "that is certainly the best way. There s an interesting mummy cave there, too, about half-way along; but you will certainly be delighted with the head of the barranco.—There; I must say good-night. Going now, gentlemen?"

"Yes," said Fraser, rising. "It is time we were back."

Digby rose reluctantly; but it was time they left; so the customary addios were said, Ramon making a point of going first, so that Digby had an opportunity to raise Helen's trembling hand to his lips. "Good-night—my darling," he whispered. "I shall tell Mr. Redgrave all."

"Heaven protect him!" muttered the girl devoutly; and she stood there at the door listening till her father returned; and then they lingered, each slightly uneasy, but ashamed to give their fears words, and being content to listen to the voices of the guests, as they came clearly up through the still night-air.

Redgrave felt disposed to speak to his child before retiring for the night, but remained silent.

"Marriages are made in Heaven," he said to himself. "I feel helpless; and perhaps Nelly herself may find the way out of the difficulty, and, somehow, I begin to like young Digby."

The three guests of the villa went slowly down the track toward the little town, with Ramon chatting pleasantly about the island.

"I daresay you Englishmen are disappointed at the absence of sport," he said. "Very different from Norfolk, where I went on a visit when I was in England. Here we have partridges and rabbits—that is all."

"We find plenty to amuse us," said Fraser quietly.

"Oh yes; I have seen that. Why, you will have a boat-load of specimens.—But don't forget the head of the barranco beyond my place. It will repay a visit; and if I can assist you with guides or men, pray command me.—Good-night."

"Well, Tom," said Fraser, in a sad voice as soon as they were alone, "what next?"

"I don't know, old fellow, and don't want to know," replied Digby in a tone of voice which contrasted strangely with the mournful speech of his friend.

"You do not know?"

"I only know that I am surprisingly happy."

"Happy?"

"Yes. You must have seen. Horace, old fellow, I can speak to you as I would to a brother. I love Helen Redgrave with all my heart."

They walked on in silence for some time, and then Fraser said sadly. "A boyish fancy.—Come, be a man. This must go no further, Tom. Let us pack up and go away."

Digby shook his head.

"I am sure it would be better for all."

Digby drew a long breath, full of exultation, for the pressure of Helen's little fingers seemed to cling to his hand.

"Do you not see," continued Fraser, "you are intervening between two [illegible] his seat.

"One of the evils of possessing plantations," he said. "Your men are always coming with the news of some disaster."

"Nothing serious, I hope?" said Digby.

"No, no—a mere nothing— kind of blight appearing.—But, by the way, you two have never visited the head of that barranco yet. Don't forget it. When will you go?"

"When Fraser's ready.—What do you say to to-morrow?"

This was agreed to, and Digby rose as if to leave.

"There," said Ramon; "I will not keep you fidgeting to go; only leave friend Fraser to smoke another cigar."

"Really, I don't think"——began Digby, rather petulantly.

"Do not be angry, dear friend," said Ramon kindly. "I meat no harm. Apologise for me to my dear friend Redgrave.—You will stay, will you not, Fraser?"

"No; I will go with him," said the latter hastily. Then, in a hurried confused manner, as if he were mastering himself, "No," he added, "I will stay, and have a quiet smoke and chat with you about the head of the barranco and what we are likely to find."

"Poor boy!" said Ramon, with a gentle smile when Digby had gone. "Well, he has won a charming girl. You and I, Mr. Fraser, are getting old enough to put these things behind."

"Yes," said Fraser gravely; and he sat talking to his host till quite late.

According to what had grown into a custom, Digby found Helen and her father by the gate which commanded the steep track, and another delightful evening, all too short, was spent. Music, talk of England, the life there, all had their turn, and then came the time to go, Helen walking beneath the great mellow stars down with her visitor to the gate, for the last good-night—that farewell which takes so many times to say, and was here prolonged till Redgrave's voice was heard.

"Coming, papa," cried the girl, as she clung to Digby's hand. "Then you go," she whispered, "to the barranco to-morrow?"

"Yes; in good time."

"I shall see you at night?"

"Of course."

"And you will take care. I have heard that some of these places are very dangerous."

"Take care? Yes; for your sake," he whispered. "Once more, good night."

He ran off, to master the longing to stay; and with an uneasy feeling at her heart, Helen returned slowly to the house, wishing that he had not come alone, so as to have a companion back along the dark path, where it would be so easy for an enemy to do him harm.

She cast away the foolish dread directly, and with good cause, for Digby reached the venta about the same time as Fraser returned from his late stay with Ramon; and after a short chat over their morrow's plans, they both went to bed.

The sun was streaming into Digby's room when he awoke the next morning with the sensation upon him that it was very late; and on springing out of bed it was to find a piece of note-paper lying on his dressing-table, on which was written:

"You were sleeping so soundly I would not disturb you. I have gone on. Eat your breakfast, and follow at your leisure."

Digby dressed under a feeling of annoyance at his friend's desertion. He did not particularly want to join in the trip, for he had seen enough of the island, and would far rather have gone up to Redgrave's, but Fraser's start alone made him immediately feel an intense longing to be off; and consequently he quite upset his Spanish landlady by his hurried and scanty meal.

down, then took another step, for the way descended apparently, to rise again beyond the block. Then another step on to some fagot-like brushwood laid across to form a level way; and as he did so, he uttered a wild cry, and snatched at the rocky side to save himself. Vain effort, for everything had given way beneath him, and he dropped headlong, to fall, after what seemed to be a terrible descent, heavily far below.

He was conscious of an agonising sensation of pain, then of a stifling dust, of a sickening stupefying dizziness, and then all was darkness.

How long he lay there stunned he could not tell; but he seemed to struggle into wakefulness out of a terrible feverish dream, to find that all was darkness and mental confusion What it all meant was a mystery; for his head was thick and heavy, and memory refused to give him back the recollection of his walk and sudden fall.

But he realised at last that he was awake, and that he was lying upon what seemed to be fragments of sticks; and as he groped about, he touched something which set him wondering for the moment, before he could grasp what it was he held. Then he uttered a cry of horror and recoiled, for his finger and thumb had passed into two bony orbits, and he knewthat the object he had grasped was a human skull!

CHAPTER IX.

As Digby cast down the grisly relic of mortality, he clapped his hands to his throbbing brow, and shrank farther away, feeling as if his reason was tottering, and for a time the mastery of his sensation passed away quickly as it had come, and he stamped one of his feet with rage.

He shrank away, for his act had raised a cloud of pungent choking dust, which horrified him again. But this only served to make him recover his mental balance; and as he stood there in the utter darkness, he seemed to see once more the side of that other ravine they had skirted weeks back, when he had drawn Fraser's attention to the climbing figure which they had afterwards encountered as he crept up with his basket.

"I must have fallen, then, into one of the ancient mummy caves," he said, trying to speak aloud and coolly, though his words came for the moment hurriedly and sounded excited and strange.

He paused again, and wiped the dank perspiration from his brow. "There," he said; "I'm better now; so— What's this?—Yes, it must be: I'm bleeding," He felt the back of his head, and winced, for it was cut badly, and a tiny warm stream was trickling down his neck.

"That's soon doctored," he muttered as he folded and bound a handkerchief about his brow. "Now then: how far have I fallen, and how am I to get out?"

He began to look about cautiously, looking up the while in search of the opening through which he had come; but for some minutes he looked in vain. At last, though, he saw a dim light far above him, not the sky or the opening through which he had fallen, but a faintly reflected gleam, which feebly showed something black above his head; and at last he reached the conclusion that the opening down which he had dropped was not straight, but sloped to and fro in rough zigzag.

"How horrible!" he muttered. "Yet what a blessing!" he added. "If the fall had been sheer, I must have been killed."

By cautious progression he at last found the side, but not until he had gone in two other directions, which seemed to lead him farther into the bowels of the mountain.

This discovery did not seem to help him, for, as he passed his hands over the rough vesicular lava, which was in places as sharp as when it had cooled down after some eruption hundreds of years before, he found that it seemed to curve over like a dome above his head; and though he followed it for some distance he could find no place where there was the faintest possibility of his climbing up to the day.

"Ahoy! Frazer! Frazer!" he shouted aloud and then paused aghast, for his voice seemed to pass echoing hollowly away, giving him an idea of the vastness of the place in which he was confined.

And now for a few moments his former sensation of horror attacked him, as he felt that he might possibly never be able to extricate himself from the trap into which he had fallen, and that he might go on wandering amongst the horrors by which he was surrounded until he died of exhaustion—mad.

Again he mastered his wandering mind, and spoke aloud in a reassuring tone. "I am not surrounded by horrors," he said calmly. That which is here ought to alarm no man of well-balanced intellect. It is known that I have come this way, by the people at the inn——. No: I did not tell them. But Fraser knew I was coming, and he will search for me. Ramon knew I was coming here, and I have nothing to do but sit and wait till I hear voices; and then a shout will do the rest. Horace cannot be long."

"Good heavens!" he ejaculated after a pause, suppose the poor fellow should tread upon the broken place and fall!—No fear. It was covered when I came along. It is all open now."

He leaned against the side of the cave, thinking of his misfortune, and listening for step or voice to break the terrible silence around him; but all was perfectly still; and think how he would, he could not keep back an occasional shudder at the idea of passing a night where he was.

"Couldn't be darker than day," he said with a laugh to restore his courage; and then he began to think about Helen, a bright subject, which lasted him for long enough, till the increasing pain and stiffness of his injuries turned the current of his thoughts to his rival; and then like a flash, a suspicion came to him: "What did Horace say?—The man was treacherous and false! Great heaven, have I fallen into his trap?"

He tried to argue the thought away; but the idea was only strengthened. Ramon had been so anxious for him to come there—for both of them. The path had evidently been altered, by accident or design. Was it design, and the contriver's idea to rid himself of two men he detested at one stroke?—No; the thought was too horrible, and he would not harbour it.

Vain effort: it grew the stronger; and as the time sped on, and the hurt produced a feverish sensation of half-delirium, Digby found himself fully believing that Ramon had contrived this pitfall; that there was no escape; and that, freed from his presence, the treacherous Spaniard would renew his advances to Helen.

The agony increased, and with the mental suffering came a wild feverish horro which grew upon him till his brain throbbed; a sense of confusion, which he could not overcome, increased; and at last—long after he had fallen—he felt that he could bear no morre, and all was blank.

Soience for Children.

A pretty experiment to interest the children is to make a little hammock from a piece of muslin. Attach four threads to suspend it by; soak for awhile in very salt water and let it dry; then place in it an empty eggshell and set the hammock on fire. The muslin will be consumed, but the ashes left will be

FROM THE PACIFIC.

Great Increase in the Salmon Output this Year.

VICTORIA, B.C., Aug. 23—The "Colonist" this morning printed the salmon pack of British Columbia to date, totaling 376,000 cases, being 127,000 cases above the largest pack of any previous year. Of this amount the northern canneries contribute 100,000 cases, the remainder being from Fraser river. The fish are still running freely on the latter and some canneries will pack fall salmon. It is estimated that the year's pack will reach 420,000 cases. This has all been sold at from $5.50 to $6.50, and calculating at $6 per case, makes a total value of over $2,500,000. The Fraser canneries have from ten to thirty thousand cases each.

Work and Play.

Not one hard-worked fellow in ten thousand knows how to play when he yas a chance.

The first thing is to stop work. Easy enough, if you had the privilege? Not by any means. The habit of planning and thinking is still on you. You cannot let go your duties of yesterday. You are worried about how your substitute is going to manage the job you left in his hands. You fear he will bungle it, and you love your work. You are sure he will make you more trouble in the end than you can repair in a month when you get back. You have a suspicion that he may try to supplant you, and you may return to find him a favorite with your employers, or that he has stolen away your best customer.

If you are a professional man you, begin to plan lots of things for which, for months past, you have been wanting a leisure day. You load yourself up with a mass of odds and ends not at all in your line; things your wife wants done, or your son's errands, or the unusual tasks of some good friend, all of which fret you, because you are not used to them, vastly more than your legitimate duties would.

Stop work, mother of the children, if you get away for a week. Leave the fall sewing till you get to it. Do not take any cousin's errands. Why should you borrow your eldest daughter's baby when you go into the country? Let James, boy stay with James. You want rest. Stop your contriving as to the autumn's schooling. Go, you grey-head, with your good man—off on a genuine, old-fashioned courting day's excursion. Sit under the trees at the farm-side, and dream on the mountains. Try to take an interest in trifles. Be entertained with your husband's fishing stories, count his trout, hear him tell his tale of bear's tracks that he traced upon the mountains. Talk small talk, about the horses that your husband likes, about the championship at lawn-tennis, which the young folks are so excited over. Sit you, my queen, the mother of us all, on the seat under the big maple, while father and uncle Jerry play the antique croquet—they are too old for tennis—and give your whole soul to the shots they make, to the disputes as to wickets passed, and be as completely occupied with it as if it were the gravest business of life. I appeal to my readers if mother's umpiring of a game is not the greatest addition in the world. Alas, that so many of our dear wives and mothers so load themselves up with work, on vacation, that they get no advantage from it, and, truer than slang, they make us all tired!

Play is play. Take out all money value. No man is so big a fool as he who proposes to make a dollar while at play. Play-day is the time to spend a dollar, not to save it;

TEN THOUSAND YEARS.

That Was the Age Assigned by Humboldt to the Famous Dragon Tree of Orotava.

With an antiquity rivaling, probably exceeding, that of the pyramids of Egypt, and a reputation scarcely inferior, it is remarkable, says the London Globe, how little notice has been taken of the death of the colossal dragon tree of Orotava. This gigantic, hoary-headed vegetable veteran died almost suddenly a few years ago, and may be said, like the deacon's old masterpiece, to have gone "to pieces all at once—all at once, and nothing first—just as bubbles when they burst." After a babyhood of centuries, decades of maturity, and a decadence of ages, it does seem pitiable that the departure of this wonder of the world should have evoked little or no comment. In accordance with the new theory that plants feel and have a hereafter, it may be that the old dragon tree is receiving elsewhere its meed of praise and reward for a long and respected life.

Though called a tree, in truth the renowned curiosity of Orotava was nothing of the sort. It was a kind of gigantic bloated asparagus and a near blood relation to the fragile, delicate lilies of our gardens. But even Solomon at his least glorious epoch would never have been jealous of this phenomenon, for the dragon tree is at every period of its strange growth a monstrous, uncouth thing—a creepy, evil-suggesting, out-of-all-time creature, fit companion of ungainly pterodactyls and gigantic saurians, with some of which the ancient specimen of Orotava may have been personally acquainted in its younger days. With its blood-red sap exuding freely, though with curdling slowness, at every wound, its strange crown of stiff, strong, sword-like leaves at the end of every octopus like arm, and its scale-clad trunk, it is not difficult to trace the origin of its name. The tree which bears the golden apples is indigenous to the Canaries, and little fancy was required with an imaginative people to turn this monstrous vegetable growth into the guardian dragon. Did it not bleed thick red blood? did it not bristle with swords, and was not its abode on the isles of the blest far beyond the gates of Gades, in the veritable garden of the Hesperides? The ancients always spoke of one dragon guarding the golden fruit because the monster of Orotava was even then removed from all its comrades in size, bulk, and ghastliness. The old Guanches venerated the monster, though they were brought up under its shadow and must have been well accustomed to its peculiarities. They regarded it as possessed of animal life, and deified it, in its hollow trunk performing Druidical rites, and they use its blood-red sap (the dragon's blood of commerce) for embalming their dead. When Alonzo de Lugo, the conqueror of Teneriffe, came to Orotava in 1491 he spared the tree, but scandalized at the profane mysteries which had taken place in its interior, he converted its hollowness into a chapel for holy mass. Humboldt, in 1799, gives its height as "appearing" about 50 or 60 feet, and its circumference at the roots as 45 feet, and the diameter of the trunk at ten feet from the ground "is still 12 English feet," and he computed its age at 10,000 years. The opening was so large that a table was placed in it round which fourteen persons could seat themselves, and a staircase in the interior conducted the visitor up to the height whence the branches sprang.

Slow indeed must have been its growth, for 400 years after the visit of the first navigators Le Dru measured the tree most carefully, proving that during that long period the increase had only been one foot at the base, the other dimensions being practically of muslin. Attach four threads to suspend it by; soak for awhile in very salt water and let it dry; then place in it an empty eggshell and set the hammock on fire. The muslin will be consumed, but the ashes left will be composed of crystals of salt that will hold together and keep the shell safe in the delicate frame-work. It is possible to have an entire egg instead of the shell, but prudence would suggest its being boiled hard in advance, as accidents are always liable to occur.

It always seems worth while to occasionally try various simple scientific experiments to give the little folks a glimpse into the wonders of science and then let them read up the why and the wherefore themselves. To illustrate the difference of sound coming through air or water, ring the dinner-bell in a tub of water and see how it is altered from its usual tone. To show the power of air fill a tin can with water, tie mosquito netting over the top, hold a piece of writing paper on top with one hand and turn the can upside down; now hold it steadily and draw the paper slowly away; the water will not pour out unless there is a hole made in the bottom of the can that is uncovered so the air can pass in from above.

An attractive and interesting article of home decoration, which the children will be pleased to see growing day by day, is made by simply placing a little common salt and water in a glass. In a couple of days a mist will be seen on the glass, and in a short time the tumbler will be thickly covered with beautiful salt crystals. The crystals may be altered in color by adding to the salt water some red ink or a spoonful of blueing, which will tint the surface beautifully. If a particularly pretty result is desired use a vase instead of a plain tumbler. Place a dish underneath as the crystals will run over.—Detroit News.

Religious Celebration.

The people of Lachine have just observed by a religious celebration the two hundredth anniversary of the most frightful massacre in Indian annals. In the year 1689 the French under Danouville were at war with the powerful Iroquois tribes; but advances had been made with a view to peace. The Hurons, who were the friends of the French and the enemies of the Iroquois, heard of the projected peace with gloomy anticipations. Their Chief "The Rat" set out for Fort Frontenac to learn the particulars. On arriving he professed pleasure at the coming cessation of hostilities, and at once left for the place at which the Iroquois ambassadors or negotiators would land. Placing himself in ambush he fell upon the Iroquois and killed a number of them. To those who were left he declared that he had been sent to do this deadly work by the French. Thereupon the remnant returned to plan vengeance. A large party of Iroquois warriors was despatched with orders to fitly retaliate. On the night of August 4, in the dense darkness accompanying a storm, the Indians swept down upon the village of Lachine and killed all but about a hundred of the inhabitants. Those who did not escape they took across the river and submitted to the most terrible tortures. Meanwhile the French on the Lachine shore could discern the fires which were burning their compatriots and could hear the screams of the victims. History presents no more horrible massacre than that of Lachine.

A National Bird Wanted.

It has been suggested that when a national flower has been selected we ought to have a new national bird, "because the eagle is not essentially a United States bird." We are not away up in ornithology, but if the mosquito is an American citizen of the essential degree we should like to put him in nomination.—[Washington Post.

Play is play. Take out all money value. No man is so big a fool as he who proposes to make a dollar while at play. Play-day is the time to spend a dollar, not to save it; surely not to make it. The baseball "player" on a professional nine is not playing, he is working; to watch the game is play to the rest of us, but to him it is simply toil; he may enjoy it, as any man ought to enjoy his work; but the fact that he is earning his money by it destroys its character for recreation, to him. A merchant who takes along a trunk of samples on a pleasure trip just spoils it. He will be all the time thinking about the customers in the village whom he is going to steal time to attack. He will disturb the whole party by bending the trip to meet his business plans. He will put everybody out of patience by his Yankee thrift, that must make a dollar while others are spending their dollars. His "playfellows" (?) will begin to accuse themselves as lazy, taught by his industrious example, for they at least are not making anything. Oh, thou unmitigated nuisance, a companion of a vacation day trying to "make expenses!" I would not go a mile from town with you. You are too uneasy to live. You worship money like an idol. You are nothing but an old slave, and you know it. Stick to your shop and die. At all events, do not ask any mortal man to go with you on a play-day.

A play-day should amuse. Do not make hard work of your play. Do not half kill yourself with your first day's horseback riding, or passing the ball, or trying the gymnastics of some game that uses you all up for the remnant of the two weeks. Do not expose yourself to which you are entirely unaccuetomed. Look out for heat apoplexy, otherwise called sun-stroke. Stop when you have had enough. A great dunce is he who says, "I shall not have another chance for a twelve-month," and so goes on with some game, some mountain climbing, when it no longer amuses him, but is actually downright hard work. Fun, innocent, harmless, pure fun—that is the thing for vacation. To make work of it is abominable.

What is play to one is work to another. I will not be drawn into something that I do not like, simply to amuse the other fellow who does like it. If he wants to leave the hotel and camp out on the mountains, I have no objection. I will go. Let him not urge me. If he were at work I might unselfishly help him if I decline to assist his amusement by what to me is no amusement. I do not like to eat with my fingers, tear my good clothes, or fight musquitoes in the woods. I prefer to sit on the veranda, boots polished and linen unruffled, while I smoke a cigar and read a good story, or the papers. Let every man play his play.

I wish you all the privileges of a day of delight. It is well to remember that one is never so happy as when he is making others happy. To contribute to the laughter of pretty children; to rest the weary heart and hands of a good wife and mother; to bring a smile into the wan face of the invalid, or to comfort an unhappy soul; these are the noblest joys, if one be only himself noble enough to enjoy such high things. At least, let us harm none.—[New York Weekly.

Really Disgusting.

Mrs. Menage (laying down morning paper in disgust): "This catering to servants is going too far." Mr. M.: "What now?" Mrs. M.: "All the papers are full of advertisements of Cook's excursions. It's ridiculous putting such ideas in their heads at a time when they can least be spared!"

A late fancy among sports is to wear in enameled scarfpins the colors of a favorite horse or stable in pennant fashion.

for 400 years after the visit of the first navigators Le Dru measured the tree most carefully, proving that during that long period the increase had only been one foot at the base, the other dimensions being practically identical. Since Humboldt's account the famous dragon tree of Orotava was visited by nearly all the travelers, historians, monks, peddlers, and soldiers who had the mildest globe-trotting propensity. In 1819 an arm was wrenched off in a storm, and about some forty years ago some unscrupulous persons cut off a huge piece of the hollow trunk and presented it to the Kew museum. Another storm in 1867 broke off the upper part, leaving the trunk alone standing. A traveler at that time says the ground underneath was covered with pieces of broken branches, some being eighteen feet in circumference. When the land where the tree was growing came into the possession of the late Marquis del Sauzal he nursed the aged vegetable with loving care, filled up the gap in its trunk with masonry, and did all that was possible to prolong its existence. Piazzi Smyth, who saw it in 1856, measured the trunk, and found it 60 feet high above the ground and 48½ feet in circumference at that level, and 24 feet in circumference at a height of 14½ feet. He says: "Proudly it raises its antique arm above everything around. But how it is hampered! An indigenous wild laurel tree is absolutely in contact on one side and a Lombardy poplar is almost touching on the other, while there are such numerous peach trees, oleanders, and oranges between and all about that there is hardly a single point from which we can get a fair view.

The old tree, moderately credited with 6,000 years of life, has gone the way of all trees, but most felicitously the Marquesa del Sauzal has planted on its exact site a seedling derived from its most ancient progenitor, and this youngster is now a healthy plant some four feet high, looking—in shape only—exactly like a fine, long carrot, lightly stuck in the ground by its taper end, and surmounted by a crown of sword-shaped leaves. The visitor to Orotava still climbs up the steep hill above Puer to visit the beautiful garden of the Marquesa del Seuzal and see the spot where the historic tree formerly stood. This baby dragon will probably not flower for twenty or thirty years yet, and it will only branch after it has blossomed. In a neighboring garden there is a dragon which has not yet blossomed, and yet it is more than forty years old.

In botanical language the dragon tree is draccena draco, and is described as having a tree-like stem, which, when the tree is very old, becomes much branded, each branch being terminated by "a crowded head of lanceolate linear entire leaves of a glaucous-green color, which leaves embrace the stem by their base, and on falling off at maturity leave a ring-like cicatrix or scar." In old age curious warts appear, and one from the old Orotava tree has been preserved, which is as large as a good-sized cocoanut, being like that fruit in shape and its rough exterior. Though no particular care has hitherto been taken in the Canaries to rear these curious trees, there are still a few fair-sized specimens for visitors to see, one of the oldest extant being probably that at the gates of the cemetery at Icod. It is mentioned in the ancient chronicles of the conquest of the island of Teneriffe, and, standing in solitary grandeur, it is the best specimen to study. There is one other good example at Icod de los Vinos which may be is even older. These dragon trees, however, are small and absurdly young when compared with the old veteran which until recently guarded the golden apples in the Garden of the Hesperides.

Dont's haven't gone out of fashion yet. They are an easy and at the same time emphatic way of telling young and old what is wrong for them to do.

HOUSEHOLD.

A Strike.

Once upon an evening dreary,
As I pondered sad and weary,
O'er the basket with the mending from the wash the day before;
As I thought of countless stitches
To be placed in little breeches.
Rose my heart rebellious in me, as it oft had done before,
At the fate that did condemn me, when my daily task was o'er,
To that basket evermore.

John, with not a sign or motion,
Sat and read the Yankee Notion,
With no thought of the commotion
Which within me rankled sore.
"He," thought I, "when day is ended,
Has no stockings to be mended,
Has no babies to be tended,
He can sit and read and snore;
He can sit and read and rest him;
Must I work thus evermore?"
And my heart rebellious answered,
"Nevermore; no, nevermore."

For though I am but a woman,
Every nerve within is human,
Aching, throbbing, overworked.
Mind and body sick and sore,
I will strike. When day is ended,
Though the stockings are not mended,
Though my course can't be defended,
Safe behind the closet door
Goes the basket with the mending, and I'll haunted be do more.
In the daylight shall be crowded all the work that I will do;
When the evening lamps are lighted, I will read the paper, too.

Guarding One's Beauty.

Once, oh, so long ago, a certain intellectual, dreamy youth presented me with a volume of poems. In one of them was marked this line, after a very pretty description of a girl at her toilet: "Her beauty guarded kept her beautiful." I regarded the fact that he marked it as a joke at the time, and in my inner consciousness the words have been a useful joke many times since. Often before retiring at night, tired and lazy, I have felt inclined to omit the necessary brushing of teeth and hair, memory whispered, "Her beauty guarded kept her beautiful."

If a woman has but three hundred dollars a year for personal expenses (and a smart woman will wile that much out of any circumstances), it is wise for her to spend only one third of it on dress and the rest for service, or, at least those which bring ease in this work-a-day world. Of course to many ladies, being elegant on one hundred dollars a year sounds preposterous, but it can be done. Simplicity in dress is the fundamental idea of beauty. The novelties or freaks of fashion are what make expense and they are generally inelegant. White dresses are inexpensive and appropriate for the wee girl or the grey-haired grandmother. Indeed, a woman—say, of thirty, dressed in white, with satin hair and complexion clear and healthy, intelligent eyes, pleasing lips and teeth, with soft hands, exquisite finger-nails and a pretty foot, is the ne plus ultra of womanly loveliness. Summer dresses last for several years; winter garments can also be managed with economy, but by no means economize on your dentist, or the amount of brushing

Another, and perhaps the paramount long and half an inch wide. Bake in a very moderate oven for fifteen minutes, and serve either hot or cold.

RASBERRY SHRUB.—To three quarts of ripe raspberries put one quart of good cider-vinegar; let it stand twenty-four hours, then strain and put to each pint a pound of loaf sugar. Boil it about an hour, being particular to skim it clear. When cool, put a wineglassful of brandy to each pint of shrub.

CHOCOLATE PUDDING—Five ounces of pounded almonds, a quarter pound of chocolate, a cupful and a half of milk, or milk and cream mixed, three ounces of sugar, vanilla flavoring, three eggs. Boil the milk with the chocolate and sugar and pour it on the bread. Add the yolks of the eggs and the flavoring and beat well. Then butter a mold thoroughly. But the whites of the eggs to a froth and also the cream, if any is used and mix all together. Steam it for an hour, or until it is firm, and serve with custard or cream sauce flavored with vanilla.

COFFEE CREAM.—One pint of rich cream whipped light; one ounce of gelatine soaked in a cup of milk; one cup of strong clear coffee; one cup of white sugar; whites of two eggs. Dissolve the soaked gletine and sugar in the boiling coffee, when you have strained the latter through fine muslin, and let it cool. Whip the cream and the whites of the eggs in separate vessels. When the gelatine is perfectly cold, beat it by degrees into the whites until it is a pretty firm froth. Then whip in the cream. Rinse a mold in cold water, fill it with the mixture, and set it in a very cold place, or on ice, for eight or ten hours. Send around a pitcher of sweet cream with it.

INDIAN PUDDING.—One quart of milk, two heaping tablespoonfuls of Indian meal, four of sugar, one of butter, three eggs, one tablespoonful of salt. Boil the milk in the double boiler. Sprinkle the meal into it, stirring all the while. Cook twelve minutes, stirring often. Beat together the eggs, salt, sugar and half a teaspoonful of ginger. Stir the butter into the meal and milk. Pour this gradualy on the egg mixture. Bake slowly one hour.

STRING BEANS FOR WINTER USE.—Cut off the heads and tails of tender young beans, and a thin strip on each side to remove the strings. Then divide each bean into four or six pieces, according to size, cutting them lengthwise, in a slanting direction. Have ready a large stone jar and a quanty of coarse salt; put a layer of salt in the bottom of the jar, then a layer of the prepared beans, next another layer of salt, and so on, until the jar is full, finishing with a layer of salt. Cover and set in a cool dry place. When wanted for use, take out the requisite quantity, work until freshened and boil as fresh beans, changing the water once or twice.

Ten Good Things to Know.

1. That salt will curdle new milk, hence in preparing milk perridge, gravies, etc., the salt should not be added until the dish is prepared.

2. That clear boiling water will remove tea stains and many fruit stains. Pour the water through the stain and thus prevent its spreading over the fabric.

3. That ripe tomatoes will remove ink and other stains from white cloth, also from the hands.

4. That a tablespoonful of turpentine boiled with white clothes will aid in the whitening process.

5. That boiled starch is much improved

European Powers Uniting—"The Mightiest Coalition Ever Seen." England in Africa—Emperor William's Reception at Home

General Beck's interview with General von Waldersee and War Minister Duvernois resulted in a military convention, which, associated with the Italian convention, completes the plans for naval and military combinations in the event of war.

Although no official warrant is given for the reported absorption of England into the alliance, the language of the semi official press justifies the inference that the British government has agreed that their naval and military forces will co-operate with those of the alliance in repressing any wanton disturbance of the European peace.

DOES IT MEAN WAR?

The question now becomes prominent how the league will use its tremendous strength? Russian papers, recognizing the formidable character of the league, predict that Bismarck, having formed the mightiest coalition ever seen, will hasten to settle scores with Russia and France.

The leading official organs of Berlin and Vienna breathe a language of general good will. The "North German Gazette" rejoices over the strength of the alliance and its ability to meet any eventualities from the East or West. The Fremdenblatt trusts that permanent peace is secured, and boasts that the allied powers are ready to face any emergency.

The German Colonial Company at a meeting the other day resolved to appeal to Prince Bismarck for protection against English encroachments in Africa, and urged him to find means to put an end to the present state of affairs.

In the resolutions adopted reference is made to the seizure by the English Admiral at Zanzibar of Dr. Peters' steamer, the Neera, and to the damage done to German traders by the Niger Company, and the persistent efforts of English companies to acquire sovereign rights in the territories adjoining the German settlements.

NO ILL FEELING THOUGH.

The speakers all protested that no feeling of hostility toward England was entertained, and that the action of the German Colonial Company was taken solely in defence of German rights, which had been violated by the English Trading Company.

The Emperor and Empress of Germany met with a royal welcome on their arrival at Bayrunth, the people turning out en masse and greeting the distinguished visitors with demonstrations of unbounded enthusiasm.

Another manifesto has been signed by Gen Boulanger, M. Arthur Dillon and by M. de Rochefort. It states among other thing that "the judgment of the High Court is the result of a compact entered into between the Chamber and the Senate in consideration of a promise given by the former to maintain the life of the Senate. The result of this monstrous iniquity committed against us is the defeat of universal suffrage. But this arbitrary rule of calumnies and prevarication is nearing its end and, notwithstanding that fresh coups de etat are being prepared in the dark, we have confidence in the firm attitude of the Electoral Code."

Another, and perhaps the paramount advantage of buying leisure for one's self is the opportunity it gives for mental as well as physical culture, and the amiability one feels when clean and rested. Most of woman's ungraciousness comes from her habitual weariness and worry. To sacrifice one's self to the point of shattered nerves, even for one's nearest and dearest beloved, is a fatal mistake. Better be pretty and sweet tempered, with the housework a little neglected, than to have everything in order and acting and feeling like a virago. This however, is hardly a fair contrast, for being well and well pleased with ourselves, we can manage things more happily.

So, sisters, let us take care of ourselves. A gentleman once said to me (oh, how much wisdom we owe to the saying of gentlemen!), "You are selfish; but, true, a judicious selfishness is the height of culture."—

Suggestions for the Sick Room.

Even in the depth of summer it is often wise to keep a slight fire during the night. To avoid rousing the sick sleeper fill paper bags with coal and lay a sufficient number of these bags in a scuttle. In this way a fire may be replenished without the slightest noise.

It is essential in selecting some one to watch with a sick person that a healthy person with all his five senses alert to catch any change should be employed. A slightly deaf person will cause great annoyance, because he must exert himself unduly to make himself heard. The eyesight of the nurse must be perfect to note any change, her feeling alert to notice change of temperature, her smelling power without a flaw to make sure of fresh, pure atmosphere, and her taste delicate enough to allow her to appreciate the difference between poorly cooked food and that properly prepared. A fidgety or nervous woman or a selfish or self-absorbed woman is utterly out of place in a sick room.

All good housekeepers always keep bundles of old flannel, of old linen and of old cotton where either can be readily obtained if necessary in the sick-room. Bandages of old flannel are invaluable in cases of rheumatism or of sore throat. In fact, there is nothing else that will take the place of such half worn goods. New flannel would be of comparatively little use for the purpose. A small flannel bag filled with hops and wrung out in boiling water will soothe to sleep a sufferer from neuralgic pains oftener than anything else. There should be sufficient bandages on the outside to prevent its wetting the bedding and causing a chill in this way. Persons who have suffered from chronic troubles of the bowels have been frequently cured by wearing continuously, all the year round, a heavy flannel bandage over the abdomen.

Choice Recipes.

CHEESE STRAWS.—To make enough straws for twelve persons you will need these materials: Six tablespoonfuls of Parmesan cheese, six of flour, two of butter, one salt-spoonful of salt, half a salt-spoonful of cayenne, one tablespoonful of water, and two eggs. Beat the butter to a cream and then beat into it the unbeaten yolks of the eggs. When this mixture is thick and light, beat in the water. Beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff dry froth and stir them into the mixture. Mix the dry ingredients and stir them into the egg and butter. Continue to stir until a smooth paste is formed. Divide this paste into two parts. Flour the moulding board slightly and roll this paste very thin. Cut it into strips about three inches boiled with white clothes will aid in the whitening process.

5. That boiled starch is much improved by the addition of a little sperm salt or gum arabic dissolved.

6. That beeswax and salt will make rusty flat irons as clean and smooth as glass. Tie a lump of wax in a rag and keep it for that purpose. When the irons are hot, rub them first with the wax rag, then scour with a paper or cloth sprinkled with salt.

7. That blue ointment and kerosene mixed in equal proportions and applied to the bedsteads is an unfailing bed bug remedy, as a coat of whitewash is for the walls of a log house.

8. That kerosene will soften boots or shoes that have been hardened by water, and render them as pliable as new.

9. That kerosene will make tin tea kettles as bright as new. Saturate a woollen rag and rub with it. It will also remove stains from varnished furniture.

10. That cool rain water and soda will remove machine grease from washable fabrics.

Peace or War.

Lord Salisbury's speech at the Mansion House dinner was in a line with several other speeches delivered by him at the same place and under substantially the same conditions. The European horizon, he asserts, is black with war clouds; the great continental nations are spending larger and larger sums in preparing themselves for battle, but the costs of a struggle carried on under such conditions are so enormous that none of those most deeply interested can afford to break the peace. It can at least be said that the past predictions of this kind which the English premier has made have proved true. There is no more likelihood of war in Europe now than there was two, three or four years ago, and on none of these occasions has war occurred. So, on the doctrine of chances, it may be fairly argued that a continuance of peace is reasonably assured at the present time. But it seems to be an enormous insurance premium to pay for peace to be compelled to keep millions of men constantly under arms, and to spend hundreds of millions of dollars taken from the hard earnings of the people in wholly unproductive military outlays. If the result of all of these great armaments is merely the continuance of peace, why is it not better to procure the continuance of peace by a disbandment of them? We are willing for war purposes to sacrifice life and wealth in a perfectly reckless manner, when, if men had only a fair amount of reason, all of the legitimate ends that can be gained by war could be acquired, without any waste and hardly any expenditure, by peaceful methods.

Why the Teeth Chatter.

It is through the skin, and only through the skin, that we receive sensations of temperature. The chattering of the teeth from the feeling of cold is caused by what is termed reflex action of the muscles of the jaw. When an impression is made on the sensitive surface of the skin it is conveyed by an exciter nerve to the spinal cord, and is there reflected back on the muscles by a corresponding motor nerve, the action being involuntary, like that of any other mechanism. Chattering of the teeth, as well as shivering and sneezing, is nature's effort to restore the circulation of the blood which has accumulated in the larger veins near the heart.—[New York Telegram.

A Radical Change Proposed.

The defenders of the Established Church in England have succeeded in inducing the Government to introduce and support a measure which, if it becomes a law may, as its ultimate outcome, put in serious peril the continuance of that church as a [state organization. At the present time the tithes by which the clergy are supported form a charge upon the land. Either the land owner or the tenant is compelled to pay so much towards the support of the Established Church. A failure to pay gives the clergyman thus deprived of his income the right, through his representatives, to take possession of the land and seize upon its undisposed-of products. This is not a satisfactory arrangement where resistance is made to payment of tithes, and just now in certain parts of England, and especially in Wales, the attempts to collect tithes have led to a resistance which has been almost carried to a riot. The proposed law makes tithes a charge both upon personal property and land, and permits the clergyman to sue and recover as in the case of any legal debt. While this may make the work of recovery easier, the proposed change in the law is such a radical one that the chances are it will increase to an immense extent the popular hostility to the Established Church. Thus, though the money, when it is necessary to forcibly collect it, may come easier, it is not unlikely that in a short time more it will not come at all.

U. S. Sunday Desecration.

Bishop Littlejohn, of the diocese of Long Island, has written a powerful letter on the subject of Sunday desecration in the United States. In it he says: "It is simply frightful to behold the rapid increase of almost every form of Sunday desecration. I may not here go into the causes of this increase. They are well known to all who have their eyes and ears open, and if they are allowed to work on unchecked along the existing lines of lawless and unrestricted indulgence, the American Sunday, as bound up with the best traditions and customs of our social and religious life, will, in the next twenty years, practically cease to exist in our great cities and in their far-spreading suburbs. This consideration ought to be enough to arouse all Christian people of every name from their present apathy. But there is another feature of the case which ought to tell with equal force upon all who value, as necessary to the peace and order and well being of the community, the proper enforcement of the law. Bad as are the violation and contempt not only of the religious sanctity of Sunday, but also of its domestic and social properties, and of its labour exemptions for the masses, the open, habitual and wanton defiance of the laws enacted by the State for the protection of the day is only less fraught with disaster." Commenting upon the Bishop's letter the Brooklyn "Times" says that "there can be no doubt that the open breaking of the Sunday laws breeds contempt for all law, turns the suburbs into pandemonium and tends powerfully to destroy the character of Sunday as a day of rest."

Making the Best of Circumstances.

Vigilantes—"We regret to inform you, madam, that we have just lynched your husband by mistake. We intended to hang Bill Bideye."

Wife of the deceased—"Is this Bill married?"

Vigilantes—"No, supposed to be single."

Wife of deceased—"Well, I expect I'd better take him then, I need somebody to do the chores."—[Omaha World

Wives and Sweethearts.

It is in domestic life that untidiness causes the greatest mischief, remarks Oscar Wilde's Woman's World. It means waste of time, waste of money, waste of affection; in nine cases out of ten it is the cause of strife and unhappiness often of utter ruin. Far more marriages turn out unhappily through untidiness than from any other cause. I do not mean the ordinary sort of personal untidiness that so many women fall into after marriage, the ceasing to make themselves attractive—though that in itself is disastrous enough—but the mental untidiness that prevents woman from thinking out a subject to the end.

Many a girl has married full of love, good resolution, and the best intentions, resolved to be careful and economical in her housekeeping, and always keep her home in pristine freshness and prettiness. But she soon finds putting down everything she buys is a very tiresome business; "besides," she says to herself, "I only buy just what I want, and putting down every penny won't save me a penny." And she very soon finds that she loses a good many pennies. The weekly bills grow in the most alarming manner; the weekly allowance is no longer sufficient to meet them; one has to be left over one week, another the next and so on, till all are in arrears; while the husband "good easy man," thinks everything is going on quite smoothly and praises his wife for her good management and skill in being able to have everything the same when beef and mutton and coals and butter are so much dearer. She, flattered by his praise, cannot bear to admit that she is all behind and so the matter goes on till it cannot be concealed any longer. If the husband is a prudent man and has made some provision for such a contingency, he is fortunate, but if he has been living up to his income, as so many men do nowadays, he is handicapped at the very commencement of his career with an unsuspected debt and it may take him the best years of his life to shake it off, for even the smallest debt has the most marvelous power of accumulating; besides, he has lost faith in his wife's management—lost some of his admiration for her, spoken some words, perhaps, that can never be recalled, and unconsciously distrusts her. She, knowing she deserves to be blamed, woman-like resents the distrust, and is impatient of any interference or supervision; the simplest question about household expenses sends her into a passion; more hard words follow, and so "the little rift within the lute" grows wider and wider, until a dreary sea flows between those two hearts that had loved so truly! And a little mental training—mental tidiness—would have saved all that.

Fun With the Old Man.

He was a meek-looking old gentleman from the country, and as he took his seat at the dining room table the drummers looked at him over their soup-spoons. They noted his weather-beaten face, his wet hair carefully parted and brushed around over his ears, and his air of diffidence as he nervously fingered his fork; and when the waiter girl stood at his side and winked at the boot-and-shoe man, they were all attention.

"Soup?" she asked.

The old man seemed a bit surprised at the brevity of the bill of fair, and fidgeted about as though waiting for her to say something more.

"Would you like some soup?" said the girl, with a side-glance at the coffee-and spice man.

"I ain't particular about soup, as I know of," answered the old man.

The old man looked kind of helpless, and the boys felt a little sorry for him as he kept his eyes fastened on the fork, which he shoved from side to side with his fingers.

"I guess I'll take—I guess you'll have to say that again," he said, looking up, and the girl rattled the whole thing off in exactly the same time as before.

The old man looked 'round the table and caught sight of a drummer winking at the girl; then he jerked his head around, and looking her straight in the face, he said:

"You may gimme s'm bile cornbeef 'n' cabbage, roas' beef, veal 'n' mutt'n, cole chick'n 'n' turkey 'n' tongue, 'n' s'm ham 'n' eggs 'n' codfish cakes 'n' sassage 'n' beefsteak 'n' a piece o' punkin pie 'n' cup o' coffee, sis; 'n' now see ef yer kin make yer little legs fly 's fast as ye kin yer tongue, for I wanter git home; there's a shower comin' up."

—On Sabbath evening next Rev. J. B. Clarkson will occupy his own pulpit, he having returned from Europe on Wednesday last. In the morning Mr. Hagar will preach his farewell sermon.

—Rev. A. Campbell will be in Yarker on Monday; Tamworth on Tuesday; Newburgh on Wednesday and Enterprise on Thursday of next week and will lecture in each place on the Jesuit question.

—Quite a number of Napaneeans are going to Deseronto on Wednesday evening to hear Mrs. Scott-Siddons. Miss Eva N. Roblin assists in the programme and will sing three numbers during the evening.

—It is whispered around that there will soon be a wedding up in Ameliasburgh and that a young gentleman from Napanee will take a prominent part. If we happen to see the young lady we will warner before it is too late.

—Barnum's circus will be in Belleville to-morrow and there will be an excursion up the bay in order to give parties a chance to see the procession. The Ella Ross leaves Napanee at seven o'clock sharp, connecting with the Quinte at Deseronto.

—The ladies of St. Paul's church South Fredericksburgh intend holding their annual dinner and entertainment on the beautiful grounds of Robert Nelson Esq., Conway, on Tuesday at 6 p.m., September 3rd, 1889. Good music will be provided and a cordial invitation is extended to all. Admission 40 cents.

—There will be a Harvest Home excursion to Kingston, the Thousand Islands and Alexandria Bay, per steamer Hero, on Saturday, September 14th. The steamer will call at Deseronto, Thompson's Point, Adolphustown, Conway, Bath, Stella and other bay ports if flagged. Tickets fifty cents.

—A firebug by the name of Wm. Wallace thought he would make a bonfire of the house occupied by Hearns north of the G. T. R. track, some time in July last, was arrested and sent up by the Mayor for trial, came before his honor Judge Wilkison on Tuesday last and got one year in the Central prison, wherein to sober up and reflect on his folly.

Witch's Predictions.

The Napanee correspondent of the Belleville Ontario gets off the following: The Oddfellows excursion to Watertown did not terminate as successfully as was hoped. It appears that some of the Kingston young ladies consult the oracle in the shape of a withered old dame with the reputation of riding the broom stick, before they undertake any perilous adventure. At the beginning of the week they repaired to her cell in one of the obscure streets in that mystic city. The old woman produced a blood red stone about the size of a hen's egg, and muttered some unintelligible incantation as she pressed the stone to her forehead three times. With a brass wand she then tapped the three young ladies on the forehead three times, when in silence they repaired to the inner cell. All was still as death. The three young ladies trembling advanced in single file and mustered courage to follow their guide, as they recalled to memory the followers of "She." The old woman halted, joined the hands of her disciples, pressed the mystic stone three times to the forehead of each head and slowly spoke in harsh whisper: "Go not on the Oddfellows excursion for the Hero goes down." Then they all knelt three times and returned in the order in which they had entered the cave to the outer room. When they reached the daylight again they brushed the dust and cobwebs from their garments and looked in wonder and admiration upon the dear old woman." They each paid $3, as she explained that that number was the secret of her art. She was born in the third hour of the third day of the third week of the third month of the third year of the century, and therefor she is privileged to look into the future provided three young ladies be her subjects and they pay her three dollars each. Thoroughly satisfied with their investment the young ladies returned to their respective homes and never told their dear papas what they had done with their three dollars. Their experience though was too good to keep so they confidentially whispered it to a few friends and by the time the excursion was to leave Napanee everybody knew that the Kingston oracle had said that the Hero would go down. The superstitious of course would not go and as the infection had spread to some extent only about 250 availed themselves of the cheap trip. The sail to Cape Vincent was as pleasant as could be expected. Some few discovered about the time they were entering the gap that they had eaten some food at their breakfast that was not agreeing with them. Arriving in Watertown the visiting Oddfellows were hospitably received by their brethren in that city. A magnificent lunch was prepared, for which the hungry excursionists were most duly thankful. The reception was wholly unexpected, and proved a great success. About three hours in all was spent in the city, seeing the sights, renewing old acquaintances and forming new ones. Leaving their about 8 o'clock in the evening they reached Deseronto, after a rather tedious trip, at 4 o'clock in the morning, but upon attempting to come up the river they were enveloped in a dense fog, and, running upon a sandbank, were obliged to remain there until 8 o'clock when it became sufficiently clear to proceed on the course. About 9.30 a tired and sleepy crowd, headed by the band, wended their way up from the dock to the tune of "Home sweet home." The superstitious maidens, upon hearing of the mishap, rushed out to meet the belated excursionists, and tauntingly greeted them with "I told you so." The Kingston girls are in high feather, and groups of them may be seem on any street corner arranging for a visit to the "dear old women" and the securing of the necessary

—J. W. Anderson has just received 75 pairs of women's buttoned kid boots bought at a bargain which he is selling at from 50 to 75 cents below cost. They will go rapidly at the price asked. adv.

—George I. Ham left his horse standing in front of Wm. Templeton's residence last Saturday, and Treasurer Parrott and Turnkey Clark came along with a lawn mower. The noise frightened the horse and it ran away, completely wrecking the wagon. George threatens to bring an action against the above named parties.

—W. D. Madden is the only authorized agent of the C. P. R. in Napanee and if you are going to Manitoba, British Columbia or in fact any point on the C. P. R. you will find a great advantage if you purchase tickets from the authorized agent. Call or write to W. D. Madden for maps, folders and all reliable information. adv.

—On Saturday morning a man named Patrick Murphy was killed on Gilmour's track, Trenton, by being struck with the engine. He was seem around Trenton during the day, drinking, and it ts supposed he went and laid down on the track and the engine struck him cutting his face, breaking his arm and crushing in his chest. The train hands did all they could when they found him but he never spoke to any one. Murphy was well-known in Centreville Napanee and Belleville. He was working lately for a man named Brown in Sydney township. He had, when found, $8 in cash, Only a part of the engine went over him. He was buried. No inquest was necessary. Murphy was about forty years of age. He has worked in the shanties. He may have friends in Stoco, near Tweed.

—The Ball match between the Princess street nine of Kingston and the Napanee nine, on the palace grounds here on Monday was a hotly contested game and resulted in a victory for the visitors—the score at the conclusion of the ninth innings stood a tie of 16 runs each. Napanee then went to bat and scored one, then the Kingston team went in and scored two; thus ended an exciting contest, and the Napanee team although defeated are to be congratulated on making such a splendid stand against a team composed in part at least of professionals. The Orphan boy and Mossback who played here a few days ago as part of the Bath team, were among the Princess st. nine. Everything passed off pleasantly notwithstanding an occasional kick, which seems part of the game, on the part of the players. But the spectators were disgusted with the bawlists from Kingston, who fancied they were playing ball while indulging, making the scene hideous with the perfect diarrhœa of slang kept up with the intention of rattling the pitcher. It seems these tactics are allowable under the rules of the game, at least so it is claimed. If so, the sooner the rule is changed the better, because spectators go to see ball played and not to hear chin music.

—The improved Pease Furnace has a larger heating capacity than any other warm air furnace invented. The fire pots are heavier than those of any other. All parts above the cast iron fire pot are made of heavy wrought Scotch plate steel. Nine tenths of the furnaces put up in Toronto where they are made, and three-fourths in Napanee are the Pease furnaces. Proof positive they are the best. BOYLE & SON, Sole Agents.

—The excursion to Brighton and Presqu' Isle yesterday was a tremendous success. Both the Quinte and Ella Ross were crowded to their utmost capacity. As the Ella Ross neared Belleville an elderly lady caught sight of the lighthouse and asked Dr. Edwards what "monument" that was. The doctor managed to keep a straight face while enlightening her ignorance, and then moved away and had a big laugh. The excursion party did not reach Napanee until nearly midnight. Captain Stanton is winning golden laurels as a genial and efficient officer.

—This year the Lennox Agricultural Exhibition will take place in Napanee on the 8th and 9th of October. The prize list has just been issued from the EXPRESS office, and it contains an usually attractive list of premiums, as well as some valuable special prizes. The directors are working hard to make this year's show the best in the history of the society, but in order to do this they must have the hearty co-operation of the farmers of the county. With the big yield this year there ought to be a fine lot of exhibits.

—Rev. J. B. Clarkson, M. A., and family arrived in Napanee on Wednesday and were met at the station by a number of the Reverend gentleman's congregation, and escorted to the commodious parsonage of the Western Methodist church. The Ladies Aid had a substantial dinner prepared and when Mr. Clarkson and his family were ready to sit down at the table the ladies left them to enjoy their new home in peace and quietness. Mr. and Mrs. Clarkson were much pleased with their reception.

—A mean game was played on the Napanee Stars, a juvenile base ball team, at Massassaga Park on the 15th August, by the Deseronto Athletes. The Athletes led at the third innings, but the Stars shut them out in the fourth and fifth innings, and had the game virtually won, when the Athlete squealers wanted their dinners, stopped playing and claimed the game, although according to the rules, they had no right to call the game at this stage, except for darkness or rain. The Napanee club are ready to play the Deseronto team on the grounds of the Stars in Napanee, and hope to hear of their acceptance.

WEDDING BELLS.

At the Western Methodist church, Napanee, on Wednesday last, by the Rev'd Dr. Badgey, brother-in-law of the bride, assisted by Rev. J. B. Clarkson, Mr. Fred G. Asselstine, merchant of Moorehead, Minn., second son ot George Asselstine, South Ferdericksburgh, was united by marriage to Miss Mary Bell, daughter of John S. Bell, Napanee. Miss Marie Tilley and Miss Blanch Badgey assisted the bride, while Mr. Bell acted as best man for the groom. Many valuable presents attested the high esteem in which the bride is held. The pleasant event took place at 4 o'clock p. m., and the happy pair left for their new home at Moorehead, Minn., on the 5 o'clock train, amid hearty congratulations and best wishes for their future happiness.

groups of them may be seem on any street corner arranging for a visit to the "dear old women" and the securing of the necessary three dollars. The fortune-telling craze is upon the limestone city, and the fathers are seeking an antidote."

Bartels vs. Vanslyck.

This is an action of ejectment brought by the plaintif Anna Bartels against Franklyn Vanslyck, of Morven, to recover possession of four acres of land, part of the old Bartels farm in Ernesttown it being the four acres on which the late Andrew Bartels so long lived. The case was tried at the last assizes here before Mr. Justice Falcombridge and judgment was reserved. The learned Judge has now handed in his judgment, verdict for defendant Vanslyck with full costs. B. M. Britton, Q. C., A. L. Morden and John English, for plaintiff. R. C. Clute and S. Gibson, for defendant.

KINGSTON'S BIG SHOW.

Lennox and Addington Large Prize Winners.

"Well done Lennox," was the general expression of satisfaction when the results of the contests in the horse ring were known, and well might our enterprising horsemen feel proud of the splendid exhibition of horse flesh at Kingston. About fifty prizes, more than half of them red tickets, fell to the county of Lennox and Addington. The prize animals would make a fine parade. First in the procession comes that famous thoroughbred stallion, "War Cry," and his three sons, owned by R. H. Potter. Next in order comes the carriage stallions; headed by that fine young 3-year old imported Cleveland Bay, "Ingmanthorpe Lad," owned and imported by W. H. Hutchison, Napanee, winner of the red ticket and also of a diploma. Next comes a fine young stallion, owned by Mr. E. Davy, Bath. In the 2-year old stallion class. L. Lasher, of Bath, carries off the first prize. Then comes the brood mares and foals in the carriage class, W. E. Hayes, of Napanee, first, and L. H. Stover second. For 3-year old gelding or filly, R. H. Potter again swept the paddock with L. Lasher, 2nd.

Then comes the 2-year old gelding or filly, headed by that fine young Yorkshire Coach filly, "Victoria," owned and imported by W. H. Hutchison, 1st prize and diploma. A choice animal Mr. H. need not be afraid to show in the best company, while Mr. J. P. Lake with his beautiful Canadian bred bay filly had no difficulty in securing second. L. H. Stover captured the first for yearlings. W. E. Hayes the first for foals, and L. H. Stover, third. In carriage horses matched G. H. Williams, Napanee, got second on his pair of grey beauties, and Thos. Trimble captured first on single horse and W. J. Shibley second.

Next comes the non-standard bred stallions, the first and second prizes falling to R. Howard and J. W. Johnston, of Odessa, respectively, while the competition between the same horses with three of their get, resulted in E. W. Johnson getting the red ticket. In 2-year olds L. H. Stover got first.

Here comes the roadsters, so clear the track for I. P. Brown owns that pair with the red ticket, 15 hands and over, and W. E. Hayes that pair of flyers 15 hands and under, also carrying the red ticket, with E. W. Johnson 2nd. As the drivers are not apt to see common mortals just now, clear the track.

Single horse 15 hands, 3 and under, R. H. Potter third. Stallions 3 years, old W. H. Hutchison imported Yorkshire Coach horse, Prince of Orange, captured equal 2nd. Mr. A. Breckenridge got first prize for brood mare and foal in this class, while for 2-year olds, R. Brisco and G. Hawley captured second and third. For foals, A Breckenridge, 1st; S. Martin, 2nd; mare any age, Sidney Martin, diploma.

Agricultural horses—Stallions, R. J. Walker, 2nd; 3-year old stallion, R. Perry, Loyal True Blues.

The deputy-district Grand Master of Lennox and Addington being desirous of extending the association to the villages of this district, desires to set before the young men, the designs, objects and benefits of the Loyal True Blue Association, which is misunderstood by many, and misrepresented by others, who do not know us.

The Loyal True Blue Association has been founded by persons desirous of supporting in entirety these ordinances, inculcating and promulgating the Protestant religion, maintaining the law and constitution of the country, affording assistance to members in sickness or distress, and otherwise promoting such laudable and benevolent purposes as may tend to the due ordering of those christian virtues, viz., Charity and Love. Its members revere the memory of that immortal Prince, King William III, Prince of Orange, not only as a Patriot, a Constitutional Monarch and a Hero, but as a true Christian, and hope with tenacity and perspicuity to emulate his virtues by maintaining freedom without malignity; religion without persecution or trending on the rights of any. The society is constituted on the broadest principles of national freedom, it disdains the lodge of faction, disclaimes an intolerant spirit, demands an indispensable qualification that the candidate shall be deemed incapable of persecuting anyone on account of their religious opinions. The duty of every True Blue being to aid and defend all loyal subjects of every religious persuasion in the enjoyment of their constitutional rights and privileges.

The association is extending very rapidly and during the past year has doubled its membership, and nearly every lodge has adopted a benefit scheme equal to any benefit society. No Surrender lodge Napanee has adopted the same, and looks for a big increase of members. Any person desirous of aiding to establish lodges and wants any information can obtain the desired information by corresponding with the undersigned who will be most happy to answer them.

Marlbank.

R. B. Allen is in town this week with a consignment of honey and will wait on his customers on Saturday. The honey from the North is very fine and light in color this year. The Methodist Harvest Dinner announced for the 4th September at Marlbank was a grand success. Rev. Sanderson from Londsdale and Rev. Curtis, Canifton, each gave grand speeches. The dinner was of the best, and the choir rendered several fine quartette solos. The programme was brought to a close by singing God Save the Queen, R. B. Allen at the organ, proceeds over $60.

ANTWERP'S GREAT FIRE.

It was an Awful Calamity.—160 Dead and 550 Wounded.

ANTWERP, Sept. 7.—The fire is still raging, all efforts of the firemen, assisted by the millitary and populace, to quell it having so far proved unavailing. The docks and shipping are untouched by the flames, as the direction of the wind has been towards the town continuously.

It is estimated that the number of deaths by yesterday's disaster will not exceed 150. Two hundred and fifty persons were seriously and 300 slightly injured. The firemen and troops worked through the entire night on hourly shifts. Many of them succumbed to the heat and smoke, and had to be conveyed to hospitals insensible, on stretchers. All the workers have blackened faces, and bear evidences of the sickening effects of the dense smoke which clogged their efforts. Work is now entirely confined to keeping the fire from spreading beyond the sheds and factories within the dry dock.

Six million litres of petroleum are in flames. The oil, it is expected, will continue to burn at least until Monday.

A TERRIBLE EXPLOSION.

At the moment of the explosion many of the workingmen jumped into the Scheldt in their fright and were drowned. A number of sailors and customs officers were killed on board ships by the flying bullets, and ships were riddled by the missiles. It is estimated that 2,000 tons of cartridges exploded. The noise was heard thirty miles away. The smoke which filled the air was greater in volume than that of a great battle. Human heads and other parts of bodies were found half a mile away from the scene of the disaster. One hundred and thirty whole bodies lie in the morgues, and charred heaps of human fragments represent an unknown number of dead.

The first officer of the Red Star steamer Zealand was terribly wounded on board his ship.

The populace watched the flames all night. The noise of the exploding barrels of oil and the falling of ruins exactly resembled the sounds of a battle. Those who have been deprived of their homes by the fire are encamped upon the river banks.

THE WATER WORKS DESTROYED.

The water works, which cost £80,000, are three parts destroyed.

A judicial enquiry has been ordered into the origin of the explosion.

The Minister of the Interior has visited the scene of the explosion. The King and Queen have telegraphed, expressing sympathy with the sufferers. Subscriptions have been opened for the relief of those rendered destitute by the disaster.

Stover made it interesting and got two out of the three prizes. In large breed pigs, C. W. Neville captured the first prizes. All these prize animals will compete for honors at the Lennox Agricultural show to be held in Napanee October 8th and 9th, and as the competition will be much keener than at Kingston, every one should see this show.

Another interesting feature of the exhibition will be the Baby show. The special prize offered by the President should bring out a crowd on Tuesday evening. All the fairs this fall have been successful. Don't let it be said that Lennox is not up to her former record.

The Boat Race.

SEARLE THE AUSTRALIAN VICTORIOUS.

On Monday last took place the greatest race of modern times, over the historic course from Putney to Mortlake on the Thames, England. Fifty thousand people witnessed the contest for the championship of the world. The first part of the course, from Putney to Hammersmith bridge was covered in the remarkable time, eight minutes and thirty-eight seconds, being four seconds better than any previous record. The terrific pace up to this point brought out the staying powers of the Australian champion. Both men knew that this part of the race was the crucial test, which would decide the event, and nobly they strained every nerve. At Hammersmith bridge the Australian led by a length and a half, and virtually had the race in hand, nevertheless O'Connor like a true Canadian, fought the battle out to the bitter end, and, although defeated in the second best time ever made over this course, twenty-two minutes and forty-two seconds, he has the satisfaction of knowing he did his best, but was defeated by a better man and a Briton.

Bedford-Jones, at three o'clock in the afternoon, and Mr. and Mrs. Parker left for Uncle Sam's domains by the afternoon express. A number of fog signals were placed on the track and as the express moved out a number of sharp reports testified that the happy couple were getting a good send off. We wish Mr. and Mrs. Parker a joyous trip through life.

The Manitoba wheat crop has been harvested in excellent condition, and it is said it will all grade No. 1 hard. Such specimens as have reached the market are certainly very good. At the present time there are 20 elevators in course of construction in Manitoba alone, several of capacity of from 40,000 to 60,000 bushels. There is a general feeling of satisfaction and confidence among farmers and business men all over the country on account of the large yield and excellent quality of this season's grain. The weather is fine and cool.

Tuesday morning Lady Cartwright, wife of Sir Richard Cartwright, and two other ladies had a lively ride down the Barriefield hill in Mrs. Cartwright's carriage, drawn by a team of spirited bays. When about half way down the descent one of the reins snapped, and the coachman, of course, lost control of his horses. They galloped away at a rattling pace and the driver crawled over the dashboard on the tongue, in order to check the animals. In this he was not successful, and the horses dashed off the main road over the boardwalk and upon the common. They cut a circle, and after grazing a telegraph pole returned to the main road again. Three times they made this trip, going around in a circle. The ladies were terribly frightened, and had great difficulty in remaining in the carriage. The driver was in jeopardy. He lay coolly on the tongue between the horses holding on to the stick for all he was worth. At last the suspense was relieved by an artilleryman catching the horses by their heads. They and the carriage escaped uninjured. The ladies had a fortuntte escape.

New York, Sept. 7.—The Herald's Antwerp special says that immediately after the explosion yesterday it seemed as though a rain of glass was falling over the surrounding country. There is not a whole window in Antwerp. The catastrophe took place in a powder magazine belonging to M. Corvilian, a merchant, who had recently purchased 40,000,000 old cartridges, intending to sell the powder. His work people, over 100 in number, more than half of them being women, were occupied in the task of opening these cartridges when the explosion took place. To what it was due there is very little hope of discovering, for not one of M. Corvilian's employes has as yet been found alive. In fact, not a single corpse has been found intact. It was not only in the Corvilian factory that lives were lost; a large number of persons were also more or less severely wounded by pieces of glass, and the roofs of several houses falling in. For a great distance all around the ground was strewn with cartridges and debris of all kinds. A few minutes after the explosion a vast sheet of flame leaped up into the sky and it was seen that a patroleum warehouse not far from the powder magazine was on fire.

THE FLAMES VISIBLE AT BRUSSELS.

Even in broad daylight the blaze of 40,000 barrels of petroleum was visible at a distance of thirty miles at Brussels. Then the Maison Hydraulique of Antwerp, which furnishes the motive power for all the cranes and other machines of the port, suddenly gave way and became a heap of ruins. Everywhere in the streets are wounded persons, and at frequent intervals one comes across parts of the human frame such as legs and arms. The spectacle is terrible, and there is nothing in recent history that can be compared to it save the scenes which Paris presented during the last days of the Commune, and the great fire in Chicago. The fire has spread in all directions in the city. Warehouses, in which from 20,000 to 25,000 barrels of petroleum are stored, are on fire, as are many of the vessels in the docks. The Scheldt resembles a river of fire.

A STRANGE LEGACY

CHAPTER I.—MR. DOTTLESON IS PUZZLED.

Mr. Montague Dottleson, East India merchant of Calcutta and London, was writing letters in the library of his private residence in Blakewood Square, Kensington. It was Sunday afternoon, and the rain was coming down with steady persistency, as though it had made up its mind to keep Londoners indoors for the rest of the day. Mr. Dottleson, who was a methodical man in everything, made a regular practice of going for a long walk every Sunday after lunch; and when the weather presumed to interfere with this arrangement the effect upon his temper was infelicitous. Accordingly, it is our misfortune to present him to the reader at a moment when he is decidedly snappish and surly.

"Very aggravating," said he, throwing down his pen and going to the window; "no chance of its clearing up either. How I detest a wet Sunday!"

He picked up a book, and made himself comfortable in an armchair; but he had hardly read a page when the door opened and his daughter Kate appeared. She was a fair, pretty girl of twenty, whose gentleness and tact saved her from coming in collision with her irascible parent at times when other members of the household shrank from the consequences of intruding upon his privacy.

"Well, what's the matter?" asked Mr. Dottleson curtly.

"Grandmamma isn't feeling very well this afternoon, papa."

Kate had not completed her errand, but knew from her father's manner that she had come in at a time when it was best to say as little as possible; when he was in this humour, he was certain to jump at any opportunity for grumbling, and would finish her message for her.

"She wants that doctor, I suppose?" snarled Mr. Dottleson.

"Perhaps we had better send for him.'

Mr. Dottleson threw down his book and frowned savagely. "Isn't it a very singular thing, Kate, that your maternal grandmother should select this impecunious young prig Lakeworth to be her medical attendant, when there are half-a-dozen experienced practitioners living within a stone's-throw of the square? Isn't it very curious that Mrs. Lamshed never knew what illness was or asked to see a doctor until she met this Dr. Lakeworth at Scarborough last summer? Her confidence in him is positively touching, and passes my comprehension altogether."

It was evidently a mystery to Kate also, for she shook her head slowly and looked out of the window. It was a fad of her grandmother's to have Dr. Lakeworth; and when a patient has reached the eighties, perhaps one physician can do little more than another.

"I don't know why she likes him, papa."

"I suppose you must send for him; but I don't imagine he will thank Mrs. Lamshed for bringing him through a mile of back streets on a day like this, just to tell her that her heart is much the same as it was the day before yesterday."

Kate left the room without making any reply, and her father walked over to the hearthrug and proceeded to address the figure he saw reflected in the mirror above the mantel piece. Many people have a habit of "talking to themselves," and Mr. Dottleson cultivated it to a remarkable extent; it was his peculiarity, though, that he could not take himself properly into confidence unless he saw himself in the glass. He stood with his left hand thrust into his

"It's the heart," replied Mrs. Lamshed with a deep sigh, which did not seem quite genuine somehow.

Mr. Dottleson had never thought of his mother-in-law's favourite in connection with his daughter. He was essentially a grasping, mercenary man, and the fear always before his eyes was, that Mrs. Lamshed might alter her will and bequeath her property to this doctor. He had heard of ladies who had cut off their rightful heirs in favour of their medical attendants, and Mrs. Lamshed was eccentric enough for anything. If any one had told him that Kate was the attraction, he would have laughed at the idea. She had nothing, and would have nothing but what he chose to give her; and it was not likely that a man who had to push his way in the world would encumber himself with a wife. Dr Lakeworth was dancing attendance on the old lady in the hope of getting her money, and really she seemed so fond of him that the danger was making him very uneasy.

He got up and opened the door slightly, that he might hear the doctor's arrival, and also ascertain whether Kate stayed in the room during Mrs Lamshed's interview with the young man. Dr Lakeworth went straight up-stairs when he came, and remained with the two ladies for fully an hour and a quarter, whilst Mr. Dottleson sat fuming and fidgeting in the library below.

"Much value the fellow's time must be," he sneered, looking at his watch, when the door upstairs opened, and Mrs. Lamshed's shrill cracked voice arose, cautioning the doctor not to forget that he had promised to come and see her on Tuesday.

"I'll waylay him as he goes out, and find out, once for all, whether there's any actual necessity for these incessant visits."

"Good-afternoon, Mr. Lakeworth," he said, meeting the doctor in the hall. "Just come this way for a moment, if you please." He led the way into the library, motioning the young man to follow him with the pompous air which had gained him the sobriquet of "Majestic Monty", among his many friends.

"I wished to ask you whether there is any cause for anxiety regarding Mrs. Lamshed's health," he said when Charles Lakeworth was seated.

"Mrs. Lamshed is under the impression that she is suffering from some internal malady; but I am unable to detect anything amiss. Of course any organic complaint would be serious to one of her advanced age; but I have no reason to suppose there is the least cause for anxiety."

Perhaps the confident tone of Dr. Lakeworth's reply irritated his questioner; for Mr. Dottleson put on his most majestic air, and fixing his pincenez on his somewhat rubicund nose, he elevated that feature until he could bring his dull fish-like eyes to bear upon his companion. "Is that your opinion?' he asked with light stress on the possessive pronoun.

"That's my opinion," responded the doctor quietly.

"Then there's no actual necessity for your rather frequent professional visits?"

"I can do nothing for Mrs Lamshed but allay fears about herself. They are groundless; but a lady of her years is naturally prone to make much of any little feeling of indisposition."

Mr. Dottleson lay back in his chair considering what he had better say next. If he made any attempt to discourage Dr. Lakeworth's calls, it would infallibly come to his mother-in-law's ears, and her resentment might produce results very detrimental to cautious in making his investigations; that remark about the possibility of making a codicil had gone home, for he knew it had not been spoken idly. The will as it stood was in his own favour. Mrs. Lamshed had bluntly observed when she made it, that Kate was only six years old, and there was no knowing what she might grow like; so her money should be left to one who would at least take care of it—namely, Montague Dottleson. She had a higher opinion of her son-in-law at that time than she had now; but he had always been kind and attentive since she went to live with him, and she had seen no reason, so far, to alter her designs.

"What can the man be after, if it isn't the money?" queried Mr. Dottleson on the hearthrug of Mr. Dottleson in the mirror. "He can't be so much attracted by Kate. She's a pretty girl and a good girl; but she's got nothing. Then again, her grandmother was always of a saving turn of mind, and she wouldn't encourage him to pay expensive visits if she had no object in view. It's absurd to suppose that she pays him to come here for nothing. If he admired Kate, he'd come without being sent for, and her grandmother can't fail to know that."

His mental vision had been so dimmed by the atmosphere of money in which his life had been passed, that he did not understand the possibility of man or woman being guided by any other motive. Love was a misty unreality outside the pale of his reasoning powers, and therefore did not enter into his speculations at all. His affection for Kate took the characteristic shape of finding a wealthy husband for her; she might choose for herself, as she had a right to; but measuring her heart by the size of his own, it never struck him that her choice might fall upon a man whom he would reject as ineligible.

What a Woman Can Do.

A student of the sex exalts woman and covers man with contempt thus:—

She can come to a conclusion without the slightest trouble of reasoning on it, and no sane man can do that.

Six of them can talk at once and get along first rate, and no two men can do that.

She can safely stick fifty pins in her dress while he is getting one under his thumb nail.

She is cool as a cucumber in half a dozen tight dresses and skirts, while a man will sweat and fume and growl in one loose shirt.

She can talk as sweet as peaches and cream to the woman she hates, while two men would be punching each other's head before they had exchanged ten words.

She can throw a stone with a curve that would be a fortune to a baseball pitcher.

She can say "no" in such a low voice that it means "yes."

She can sharpen a lead pencil if you give her plenty of time and plenty of pencils.

She can dance all night in a pair of shoes two sizes two small for her and enjoy every minute of the time.

She can appreciate a kiss from her husband 75 years after the marriage ceremony is performed.

She can go to church and afterward tell you what every woman in the congregation had on, and, in some rare instances, can give you some faint idea of what the text was.

She can walk half the night with a colicky baby in her arms without once expressing the desire of murdering the infant.

She can—but what's the use? A woman can do anything or everything, and do it well.

She can do more in a minute than a man can do in an hour, and do it better.

it of "talking to themselves," and Mr. Dottleson cultivated it to a remarkable extent; it was his peculiarity, though, that he could not take himself properly into confidence unless he saw himself in the glass. He stood with his left hand thrust into his waistcoat pocket, emphasising the remarks he made half aloud with his right forefinger.

"Now, will you have the goodness to tell my what my mother in-law wants with this young medico? He's got no practice to speak of; he's got nothing any one can see to recommend him, and he lives most inconveniently far away. Ever since she met him last year, she has required medical advice and no advice but his will do. When she thinks she's seedy, he's called in to earn a fee; and when she's well, he's called in to receive it. He's never out of the house. I wonder he doesn't take lodgings next door, to be close to the gold mine.—I tell you candidly," continued Mr. Dottleson, suddenly withdrawing his hand from his pocket and tapping the palm impressively with his finger-tips—"I tell you candidly that if I didn't know the old lady would alter her will without compunction, I'd forbid Dr Charles Lakeworth the house. —Why, bless my heart! if Mrs Lamshed lives ten years longer, she'll spend every shilling of her twenty thousand in physic and fees."

This final prediction, although made by himself, so worked upon Mr Dottleson that he swung round upon his heel and stamped on the floor.

Mrs. Lamshed, who was the mother of his departed wife, was eighty-one years of age, and in spite of her frequent calls for the doctor, gave every promise of maintaining her interest in mundane affairs for ten or even twenty years longer. "I'm an old woman," she was wont to say; "but I was an old woman when I was forty, and I haven't grown a day older since—not a day."

And indeed Mrs Lamshed seemed almost as active and sprightly now as she had been half a century ago. Fourteen years before, the middle aged, dust-dried lawyer who looked after her concerns had come to urge the desirability of making her will.

"Make my will! cried she. "I'll make it, if you're afraid you won't live to do it, Smuggles; but I hadn't begun to thing about it yet! Why should I?" However, the solicitor's arguments prevailed, and the thing was done, "to oblige her old friend, who had always taken good care of her affairs, and was in a hurry to finish them." And though the fact has no bearing upon this story, we may mention that the engrossing of Mrs. Lamshed's will was the last bit of professional work the careworn Smuggles ever did for his client. He was twenty years her junior; but he passed from Lincoln's Inn to another place long before she began to use spectacles. The spring of vitality was strong in Mrs. Lamshed.

Mr. Dottleson turned away from the mirror to which he had been confiding his woes, and went up-stairs to see his mother-in-law, whom he found in the drawing-room with Kate.

"I'm sorry to hear you're not well," he said, going to her side.

The old lady looked up and smiled. "I'm getting very feeble, Montague, though I don't look it. I am not quite up to the mark, and thought I'd like to see Lakeworth."

"They sent for him half an hour ago. But don't you think, now, that a more experienced man should be called in?"

"Lakeworth will do nicely, Montague; he understands my constitution."

When an old lady is convinced that one particular man "understands her constitution," no reasoning will move her. Mr. Dottleson knew this, and did not press the expediency of making a change.

"What do you think is wrong, this time?" he said, sitting down near her.

of indisposition."

Mr. Dottleson lay back in his chair considering what he had better say next. If he made any attempt to discourage Dr. Lakeworth's calls, it would infallibly come to his mother-in-law's ears, and her resentment might produce results very detrimental to himself. It would not do to attack the position from this side, when he had only his suspicions to work upon; it would be less risky to go to the root of the matter with Mrs. Lamshed. He rose and extended his hand. "I'll say good-evening, then, Mr. Lakeworth: you have relieved my mind very much regarding your patient."

Charles Lakeworth left the house, and Mr Dottleson went in search of his mother-in-law. He meant to lose no time in putting her on her guard against this insidious enemy; but he knew that he would have to approach the subject very carefully.

"I am very pleased to learn from Dr. Lakeworth that your fears about yourself are unfounded,' he said cheerfully.

"Oh yes; he thinks I'm all right,' replied Mrs. Lamshed. "I've great confidence in Lakeworth."

"I'm afraid he takes advantage of it to drain your purse pretty heavily in fees."

"He wants 'em," replied the old lady dryly. "Poor fellow! he finds it hard to make both ends meet. But he'll make his way; I'm going to help him."

It was bad enough to hear that this hanger-on was sent for more to benefit himself than the patient; but Mrs. Lamshed's last words made Mr. Dottleson turn red with anger. "Help," in his vocabulary, was synonymous with money, and here was his mother-in-law coolly telling him, her heir, that she was going to give help to an utter stranger who had no claim upon her whatever. It was quite time that he did speak to her, so he cleared his throat and began without more ado: "You know that of late it has often occurred to me that Dr. Lakeworth's attention to you is not so disinterested as it should be. I may be wrong, but I cannot get over the idea that he has some ulterior design upon us."

Mrs. Lamshed put on her spectacles and stared at her son-in-law. "Do you suppose I'm a fool, Montague Dottleson?"

"My dear madam, you misapprehend my meaning," said Mr. Dottleson with anxious suavity; "but really I have known such frequent cases in which kind-hearted ladies have been led away by their gratitude towards scheming physicians. I never for an instant imagined that Dr. Lakeworth or any one else would be able to bend your sturdy sense of what is right and just so as to serve his own interests; but he comes so frequently, he stays so long, and he——"

"And you think Lakeworth expects my money when I've done with it, and comes here to keep my friendship for him alive?"

"I am bound to confess that this had crossed my mind."

The old lady leaned over, and tapped her son-in-law gently on the knuckles with her spectacle case as she replied: "You are the fool, Montague Dottleson. You're as blind as a mole. If you hadn't betrayed these unworthy suspicions about an honourable man, I might have opened your eyes for you; but since you have such an undeservedly bad opinion of him, I shall leave you to grope your own way to daylight. I've made my will, Montague, and you know what it says; but there's plenty of time to add a codicil to it, you know—plenty of time."

Mr. Dottleson saw that he had made a grave mistake in mentioning his distrust; but he could not repair it now, and beat a hasty retreat. Mrs Lamshed had hinted broadly that there was something going on which he was too blind to see, and which she was going to let him find out for himself. Whatever it might be, he would be very baby in her arms without once expressing the desire of murdering the infant.

She can—but what's the use? A woman can do anything or everything, and do it well.

She can do more in a minute than a man can do in an hour, and do it better.

She can drive a man crazy for 24 hours, and then bring him to paradise in two seconds by simply tickling him under the chin, and there does not live that mortal son of Adam's misery who can do it.

Salaries for Wives.

It is the opinion of the Supreme Court of Iowa that any contract a man makes with his wife can be broken by him with impunity. Mr. Miller and his wife entered into a formal contract to this effect: "That Mrs Miller shall keep her home and family in a comfortable and reasonably good condition, and Mr. Miller shall provide for the necessary expenses of the family, and shall in addition thereto pay Mrs. Miller for her individual use $200 per year, payable $16 66⅔ per month so long as Mrs. Miller shall faithfully observe the terms and conditions of this agreement." Miller failed to keep his part of the compact. Mrs. Miller kept her home and family in a comfortable and reasonably good condition, but the $16.66⅔ a month was not forthcoming. Miller simply refused to give her any pin money. Mrs Miller invoked the law to hold him to his contract The court has decided against Mrs. Miller. It holds that the agreement cannot be enforced for the reason that it is against public policy, and therefore void; that it was her business as a wife to do what she agreed to do without any compensation!; that it strikes at the very foundation of domestic life and happiness when the courts recognize a contract of this character between husband and wife. In short, that a woman must make home comfortable and happy and be satisfied with whatever the husband choose to give her. This may seem pretty hard on wives, but for the most part wives manage to get a fair share of the income without any contract or trouble.

A Preference for British Justice.

One of the great virtues of English practice is that executions follow hard upon trial and conviction. In this country years sometimes elapse before a murderer pays the penalty of the crime, and in the meantime he is given every possible opportunity to escape by legal means. To-day there are four condemned murderers in Moyamensing prison, whose dates of execution have not been fixed. All of their crimes were committed long before that of Mrs. Maybrick; one of them has been in prison nearly two years. The English practice is much superior to our own in the matter of prompt punishment, and it does not appear that providing for delays and appeals will improve it.—[Philadelphia Ledger.

Why He Became a Bachelor.

A young lawyer, who had been instructed that when a witness declared that he was this or that, it was essential that he should be made to tell when and for what reason he became so, thus utilized his instruction when trying his first case with a witness that he had under cross-examination:

"Are you a married man?" he asked.

"No, sir," I am a bachelor," was the answer.

"Then, sir," said the young lawyer, in a stern tone, "will you please tell this court how long you have been a bachelor and what were the circumstances that induced you to become one?"

Things always seem fairer when we look back at them.—[Lowell.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

Prince Albert Victor Going to India.—The Maybrick Excitement Subsiding.—The Great Strike.

Prince Albert Victor is going to India on a tiger-hunting expedition. As it is his first outing alone he is said to be very enthusiastic and eager. He is also very keen to try his hand on big game and to emulate the example of his father, who proved himself a nervy hunter and good shot in India years ago. Thus far in his young career Albert Victor has never had an opportunity to bring down anything larger than a stag. Preparations are already being made to secure a sufficient supply of big game, and the best tiger preserves are to be left unmolested until the arrival of the royal hunter.

Already a rather amusing circumstance has arisen out of Albert Victor's proposed expedition. Lady Reay, wife of the Governor of one of the most important Indian provinces, being in London, and hearing of his youthful highness's prospective visit to her home, took time by the forelock and ordered a lot of cards at a fashionable stationer's, engraved "to have the honor of meeting H R. H. Prince Albert Victor." The stationer was careless enough, or foolish enough, to put one of these cards in his window. The newspapers published the circumstance, and now everybody is laughing at the Lady Reay, and wondering what she will do with the cards if the Prince should give up his visit or decline her invitations.

The Maybrick excitement has subsided entirely. The unhappy woman has been removed from jail at Liverpool and taken to Woking prison, where she was at once admitted to the hospital. Her physicians say she cannot live long, and her friends believe that her invalid condition will soon insure her pardon.

The resources of British Columbia are soon to be made manifest to London capitalists. Frederick Villiers, the war artist of the Graphic, will join the Governor-General of Canada on his tour through the British possessions in America.

The situation in regard to the strike has become very serious, all trades are paralyzed and prices of all necessaries from coal to coffee have been forced up. Covent Garden and other large markets are almost empty. Steamers filled with fruit, flour and vegetables block the Thames. All the produce is rotting in the holds. The supply in the shops is very small and many restaurants find it impossible to feed their patrons. The river from London to Gravesend is crowded with craft which cannot be unloaded.

Scores of vessels have sailed away to other ports in the hope of being able to unload there, but the strikers say that if the dock companies hold out much longer the strike will be extended to all the principal seaports in Great Britain.

Eyelids That Have Strange Power.

I saw two women jugglers at Jeppore They were bright, intelligent-looking girls, one of whom appeared almost old enough to be the mother of the other, says a well known writer in the New York Mail and Express, They did many wonderful things, one of which was mixing up sand in water, and then putting the hand into the discoloured fluid they brought a handful of sand which they filtered through their fingers as dry as before it went in. The youngest of these girls was perhaps 15. She had bracelets on arms which was mixing up sand in water, and then putting the hand into the discoloured fluid they brought a handful of sand which they filtered through their fingers as dry as before it went in. The youngest of these girls was perhaps 15. She had bracelets on arms and on feet, and her eyes were as beautiful as those of a gazelle. One of her tricks was the lifting of a heavy chair by the eyelids, the thought of which almost makes my eyes sore. The chair was a heavy mahogany one which belonged to the room in which I was staying. She tied two strong strings to the top of this, and affixed the ends of these strings to her eyes by little round metal cups each about the size of a nickle. These fitted over the eyeballs and under the lids, and she bent over while they were so fastened. Raising herself she pulled the chair with these strings with the muscles of her eyelids, and carried it from one side of the room to the other. It was a horrible sight, and as she took the metal cups from her eyes they filled with water, and she almost sank to the floor. I told her the trick was disgusting, and that she ought never to try it again. Still, for this and the rest of the show, these girls were well satisfied with two rupees, or about 70 cents.

Trying to Scare The Smashers.

Hotel porters and baggage smashers on railways and steamboats, will do well to beware of trunks with loaded revolvers in them. As it is not always possible to tell whether the deadly revolver lurks in the comparatively harmless trunk or valise, the handlers of baggage in future will find it profitable to deal gently with passengers effects, else they may share the fate of Bill Kelly, the rough and ready porter of the Hotel Lafyette, Lake Minnetonka. With his usual activity, the other day he gave a guest's trunk the grand pitch. It came down heavily, of course, but alas for Bill, a loaded revolver inside exploded, and the bullet landed him dead in the hallway. A new terror is now added to the energetic life of the porter.—[Quebec Chronicle.

A New Industry.

The fellowing is copied from the London Post of August 4:

"To Parents—Unruly girls and boys of any age visited and punished at their homes by a thorough disciplinarian accustomed to administer corporal punishment; all bad habits cured by one or two attendances; fee 5s. for two visits. Address 'Birch,' Box 253, Willing's Advertising Offices, 125 Strand, W. C."

A Logical Illustration.

A layman in Providence who occasionally exhorted at evening meetings thus recently expressed his belief in the existence of Deity: "Brethren, I am just as confident that there is a Supreme Being as I am that there is flour in New York, and that I know for certain, as I yesterday received from there a lot of three hundred barrels fresh, superfine, which I will sell as low as any other person in town."

He Had Some Grounds.

Wibble—"What's the matter with Wagwell?"

Wibble—"He proposed to a deaf and dumb girl some time ago, and now he is suing for breach of promise on the ground that silence gives consent."

A GHOSTLY MANIFESTATION.

Before I tell my story, it will be well for me to make it perfectly clear that it is a perfectly true one. As a lad, and as a young man, neither ghosts nor the idea of ghosts ever troubled me. I heard strange stories of them, told with all the vivid description which would tend to frighten sleep away—told, too, when the wind was howling outside, the rain pattering against the windows, and the only light visible that which found its way through the chinks in the shutters to the "pitch-dark" outside—told when everybody was ready for bed. But they never disturbed my slumbers. I could listen to any number of them at any time, and they never had any effect on me. In fact, I disbelieved them thoroughly, and though I could not doubt the veracity of the narrator I always regarded them as the outcome of a strong imagination, or the result of too heavy and too late dinners. A white tombstone in a churchyard did not frighten me on a very dark night, nor did the mysterious movements of a donkey which had broken into it cause me to start, as he moved in the darkness in and out among the graves, so that I was thoroughly unprepared for anything like a personal experience, and considered myself one of the last persons likely to be affected by anything like a ghostly manifestation.

But now to my story, which I shall tell simply as the affair took place, leaving it to the reader to draw his or her own conclusion.

And to make it quite intelligible I must explain the plan of the house where it happened. The house itself was a large one, built of brick, and was what is called a "flat;" that is, it had no regular up-stairs rooms, though over the ceiling there was a great deal of room under the roof; and the lower inside walls had been carried up to the roof to support it, a doorway being made to get from one part to the other. The walls were thick and the doors and windows were made of heavy hard wood. There was not a pane of glass in the house, and both doors and windows—except two doors, of which more presently—were fastened by unusually strong iron bolts. My wife and I—for my wife was with me and shared all my experiences—always entered the house by the big doorway leading into the large semicircular porch, where our palanquins were kept. Passing on we came to the passage. Going along this we came first of all to the door on our left hand, opening into the dining room. On our right, directly opposite this dining room door, was another door, at the foot of a circular staircase, in the thick wall leading up to the empty spaces under the roof. Straight in front of us was the door leading into the great central reception room which contained no furniture except an armoire, a table and a few chairs. There was a large front door to this room, but it was seldom open, and we rarely used it, our visitors coming mostly through the porch and passage. Going further on we came to our bed room, which contained only our bed, a traveling chest of drawers, which served as a dressing table, a washstand and one or two chairs. Leading out from this was another room which we did not use, simply because we did not need it.

And now I must call your attention to our bed-room door. It was made of wood, the lower half being panelled, but the upper half was fitted with framework to receive panes of glass, which had not yet been inserted. The door had neither lock nor bolt. There was only an iron ring, hanging loosely, by which the door could be pulled to. But it could not be closed, for at the bottom, close to the side on which the hinges worked, it caught against the sill,

"Please, sir, we are afraid to go!" he said in a trembling voice.

"Afraid, my boy!" I exclaimed in surprise; "afraid of what? There is nothing and nobody here to harm you; what are you afraid of?"

"They are afraid, sir!" chimed in the maid.

"Afraid of what?" I again demanded. "Have you seen any thieves about?"

"No, sir," she replied; "but they are afraid to go:" and that was all I could get out of her.

"Come along, boys! and don't be more children," I said to encourage them; "the light is ready for you, and the house will be safely fastened up as usual,"

"True, sir," said one of them, John by name; "but we are afraid. Last night——"

"What?" I inquired in wonder.

"Last night, sir," he went on to say, "there were fearful noises up-stairs where we sleep. We heard men fighting, and we trembled——"

"Nonsense!" I cried. "Cook, what did you give the boys for their supper last night?"

"Only beef and rice, sahib," he replied; "the same as they always have."

"And no more? nothing else?"

"No, Sahib."

"Then you boys were dreaming or heard the rats. I heard nothing and saw nothing. So, come along!"

I went into the house and they followed me. On reaching the door at the foot of the spiral staircase I gave them their lantern (not an open candle, for fear of fire) and one of them again exclaimed:

"We are afraid, sir! we can not sleep up there."

"Nonsense, boys!" I replied, firmly; "there is nothing there worse than yourselves! I am down below, and the maid sleeps in the dining room right under you; there is nothing to cause fear, so go along."

Without another word they took the lantern, and filed off up stairs. When the last had gone I carefully latched the door, saw the maid into her sleeping quarters under the dining-room table, examined all the bolts as usual and went off to bed.

I told my wife what had happened, and she put it down to nightmare on the boys' part. However, it passed out of our heads. We always kept a light burning in our room at night—a small hand paraffine lamp. This was kept on the chest of drawers against the wall opposite the foot of the bed. In course of time I turned it down very low, and got into bed, with my head as usual quite close to the door. It was a small room, rather, and the bed came a'most up to the frame of the door. Meantime, I had, of course, pulled the door to, as far as it would go, but could not actually close it, so it hung ajar at the place where it caught the sill. The framework for the glass we had covered with a curtain.

I was tired and glad to get some rest and sleep, more particularly as I was just recovering from a very sharp attack of a weakening illness. My wife very soon went off to sleep, soundly, and I quickly followed her. The house was perfectly quiet, and I was fast asleep, when!

"Scratch, scratch, scratch, scratch, rattle. rattle, bang, bang. rattle, rattle, bang, scratch!" and up I jumped, upright in bed, my wife jumping up at the same moment. In an instant all the blood in my body seemed to curdle, my face grew pale and cold, and we instantly asked each of the other in a whisper:

"What's that?"

Scratch, scratch, scratch, scratch, rattle, rattle, bang, bang, bang, rattle, scratch, scratch, scratch, at the door close to my head as if a thousand cats were scratching and tearing away furiously at one of the lower panels, and the vibration of the door caused account for it. I must confess I felt hopelessly puzzled, and, without being alarmed, was certainly very uncomfortable. What was the noise? Who or what made it? The iron ring made that awful banging, but what caused the clattering sound and the furious scratching? So going into the dining-room I called to the maid by name, and said:

"Are you awake?"

"Yes, sir," was her reply; and she raised herself on her mattress and threw back the cloth in which she had enveloped her head.

"Why are you awake?" I inquired; "I too can't sleep. Have you heard the rats racing about?"

I shall not forget the look she gave me as I held the small lamp near her and its light lit up her dark face. But the eyes seemed to light up of themselves, and a look of disgusted weariness crept over her features.

"Rats!" she exclaimed. "That's not rats, and I am afraid. I heard them!"

"Heard what?" I asked. "If the sound did not come from frolicsome rats, what made it? There are no people in the house except ourselves, and the boys are up-stairs asleep."

"They are spirits!" she exclaimed, "I heard them, and a row they have been making. I have been listening to them—but I kept my head covered for fear. I heard them rushing with a kind of noiseless step to your door; then scratching and rattling it; then I heard them rush back to the door at the foot of the stairs and rattle, rattle away at the latch; then back to your room again, backward and forward, backward and forward. They have been making a row. They are spirits, and I wish they would rest, for I want to sleep!"

"So do I," I replied. Still her words rather staggered me. Yet account for these noises on any other hypothesis I could not. But spirits! and in my own house, and close to the head of my bed! Strange; but what was it? I was as wide awake as possible. Every faculty was in good working order, and now the utter disbelief of years gone by was to be rudely—and I thought it very rude of them so to intrude on my rest and peace of mind—shattered.

The maid threw her cloth over her head again and retired under the table; but her room, too, was innocent of any thing capable of being turned to account for causing the noise.

Again I returned to my room, but would not tell my wife what the maid said. Quite enough for me to have my own thoughts on the matter without disturbing her peace of mind.

"However," I thought to myself, "if I can put a stop to this I will. If I can only get this door over the bad place at the bottom, whoever or whatever they may be won't be able to make it shake again, and we shall be saved all the clatter. So with a great effort I lifted the door so as to bring it over the uneven place, and then with a strong pull I closed it tight at last.

"Now shake it if you can!" I thought, and, turning down the lamp once more, went off to bed.

Vain hope of peace! The enemy, whoever or whatever the enemy was, seemed to be simply infuriated with my attempt to balk him, for no sooner was my head on my pillow again than the scratching was renewed with tenfold vigor, as if the very door would be torn to pieces. It was simply awful, and I seemed to expect to hear shrieks of anger added to the frightful scratching. I sat up in bed and looked at the door. It could not, and did not, move, and the iron ring hung motionless; but down in that far corner that poor panel seemed to be the point of attack of a thousand fiends. Suddenly I cried out in the native tongue:

been inserted. The door had neither lock nor bolt. There was only an iron ring, hanging loosely, by which the door could be pulled to. But it could not be closed, for at the bottom, close to the side on which the hinges worked, it caught against the sill, which had not been sufficiently planed away to allow the door to shut properly, and so it was always ajar, and could very easily be shaken backward and forward, as it worked on the place where it caught; and in shaking, the iron ring, to which I have referred, clattered against the door, making a great noise in a more or less empty large house.

The only remark I have to make about the other door leading up into the spiral staircase, is that it opened outwards, and was simply fastened by an ordinary door latch.

The affair of which I am writing took place in a large island in the East far away from Canada—in a country full of ghostly stories, and equally full of a belief in all kinds of ghostly manifestations. I had heard, but had taken no notice of them. The native town to which we had gone in search of health contained very few foreigners and fewer acquaintances; consequently we had to "shift for ourselves," and with the small ammount of luggage we took with us found our home in this large house, which we rented from a native. We liked it; the air was fresh, very pure and bracing; medical help was at hand, and with our cook and servants and my pupils we settled in. The house was surrounded by its own grounds, and the kitchen as usual, stood away by itself.

We were simply on a visit; we did not burden ourselves with unnecessary furniture, but were content with buying what few things we needed, and servants and pupils did not add much to our burden, for during the day they were all engaged in one way or another, and, provided they had a fairly comfortable mat or mattress on which to lie, did not care very much where they slept. Cook, a swarthy son of Madras, guarded his kitchen and cooking utensils at night; my pupils curled up on their mattrasses up-stairs, in the "room" at the top of the spiral staircase under the roof; and my wife's maid slept under the dining room table on her mattress, which was removed every morning the first thing and brought in the last thing at night. I always saw them all safely in the house, and go each to his or her own apartment, before retiring myself, and made it my nightly practice to see that all the doors and windows were securely bolted—for we did not care to lose the few things we had with us, which in such a far distant place could not easily be replaced.

The few days we had passed in the house had passed pleasantly and the nights undisturbed, save by the howling of dogs outside, when one night our pupils were later than usual in coming in to retire for the night. I went out to look after them, and found them and the maid all gathered round the bright fire in the kitchen, busy in amusing and interesting conversation. Their eyes were glistening in the firelight, and their laugh was very hearty.

"Come, boys" I said 'it is time for you to be going to rest now. And you," to the maid, "bring in your mattress, for it is night."

Immediately there was a dead silence. The laughter was hushed; gloomy countenances at once appeared, and a kind of furtive inquiring glance was cast from one to the other. Not one of them attempted to move, except the maid. I may here say that the boys' ages ranged from about 10 to 14.

"Come, boys!" I repeated, "come along; it's time for going to rest now; why do you wait?"

Still there was no answer.

"Are you not tired?" I inquired.

Then one vouchsafed an answer.

"What's that?"

Scratch, scratch, scratch, scratch, rattle, rattle, bang, bang, bang, rattle, scratch, scratch, scratch, at the door close to my head as if a thousand cats were scratching and tearing away furiously at one of the lower panels, and the vibration of the door caused the loosely hanging iron ring to make a fearful din as it was brought in contact with the wood.

We listened—breathless! A pause! Only for two seconds, however, and then it set off again, Scratch, scratch, rattle, bang, bang!

"What is it?" I inquired of my wife,

"I don't know,' she replied—she was all of a tremor; but "This won't do," thought I, and out I sprang from bed, the noises meanwhile continuing with unabated fury, and I rushed to the lamp and turned it up. Instantly the noise ceased! I scarcely seemed to think what to be about—if burglars were in the house I was powerless against them—if the noises were of supernatural origin, what then?—if the result of some cleverly designed plan to frighten us, it must be exposed. These thoughts seemed to flash through my mind, and, quick as thought, I slipped on my dressing gown, seized the lamp, and made for the door. It was as I had left it exactly! I pushed it open, and went out into the big central reception room, which the small lamp scarcely lit up, I looked behind the door where the sounds came from, and there was nothing! Next I went carefully to every door and window, looked into every corner, examined the armoire, everything was fastened, the house was perfectly silent—there was nothing!

I went back to my room.

"Have you seen anything?" my wife asked me.

"No," I replied; "everything is fastened, and just as we left it. It is strange."

I turned down the lamp again, and got into bed, wondering all the time what it was and what it meant, and little inclined for sleep.

No sooner was my head on the pillow than—

Scratch, scratch, scratch, bang, bang, clatter, clatter, bang! began again.

I flew out of bed, hurried into my dressing gown, turned up the lamp, again sallied forth, and with the same result. Instantly the noise stopped! All was quiet; every door and window was safely bolted—all as I left it! But, thinking that, perhaps, the natives might be playing tricks on us, I examined the neighborhood of the door, whence the sounds came, very, very carefully. There was no string, no wire either at top or bottom, or nail to which it could be attached. The wall, every inch of which I examined, was solid as bricks could make it. The floor? I examined that, too. It was a beautiful floor, inlaid with different kinds of wood, forming an artistic pattern. Every bit of wood was in its place—there was no trap door, no sign of interference of any kind. Hence there was no trickery, or cunningly devised means of frightening me out of my wits as well as out of bed. I was puzzled and beaten! Again I went off to bed, after turning down the lamp, and again, no sooner was my head on the pillow than—

Scratch, scratch, scratch, bang, bang, clatter, clatter, bang! It went again.

"That's right! Go it!" I cried, as I again sprang out of bed.

"It's getting tiresome, though, "I said to my wife; "I can't make it out! But if I can only get hold of the evil-doer, he shall feel this," for I felt angry at the continued disturbance, and seizing a huge stick with one hand, and the lamp with the other, out I went again. But the noise had stopped as quickly as before, and again all was quiet. Again I examined every window and door—all were safely fastened!

It then struck me that perhaps, as the noise was so terrific and peculiar, possibly my wife's maid had heard it, or could at the door. It could not, and did not, move, and the iron ring hung motionless; but down in that far corner that poor panel seemed to be the point of attack of a thousand fiends. Suddenly I cried out in the native tongue:

"Be quite, and listen. O ye, whoever and whatever ye are," and, strange to say, no sooner did I begin to speak than perfect silence—dead silence—reigned. Listen, O ye, whoever and whatever ye are," I continued, "for I don't know; only yourselves know. Ye are free to come to my house and visit me during the daytime, but now it is night. I am tired and want to sleep, so get ye to your houses! If ye be friends, speak! if ye be not, depart; or if ye will not depart, be quite and enjoy yourselves in peace, for I am tired and want to sleep. So good night!"

Alas? my little address had no effect. Quite the contrary! At it they went again, and I pitied the poor door. If they scratched furiously before, now they seemed to tear away at it mercilessly. How they did peg away at it! and the noise was almost deafening. However, there seemed to be nothing more to be done. I had been out and examined everything. All was safe. I had used plain words and words of persuasion, and they had no effect. So I gave up in simple despair, and left the "spirits" to their own sweet pleasure.

It was now long past midnight, and quite tired and worn out I dropped off to sleep to the music of the scratching and tearing close to my head. Uneasy sleep it was, and in the very early morning I woke to the sweet music of the scratching which still continued!

"I must find out what it is, if I can!" I thought. Just then I heard the door in the porch at the other end of the house open, so I knew some one was going out. Is the mystery about to be solved? No, for the scratching still continued with unabated fury! There was the attack on the panel still going on as hard as ever. But the open door allowed a certain amount of light to get through to our door, and I thought I would avail myself of it.

"I'll catch you this time!" I thought. "If there be springs or trap door, wires or string I'll see what they are."

So whilst the noise was still progressing I very quietly and noiselessly drew myself up in bed, ready for a spring. I stretched out my left hand and pushed aside the curtain over the frame for the glass in the door very quietly and cautiously, sprang out of bed, and in less than half a second my head was through the opening for one of the panes, and I was gazing at the place whence the sound came, and narrowly searching for something, though what I did not know. But quick as I had been, it or they had been as quick, for no sooner was my head through the opening than the noise ceased. There was no wire or string to be seen, no trap-door of any kind; a mouse could not have got away; all was silent.

"I can not understand it," I said to my wife. "But I shall get up now and go for your early coffee."

I partially dressed, put on my dressing-gown, threw open the windows, and was going out to the kitchen to get the usual morning coffee for my wife, when, just as I got opposite the door leading to the spiral staircase, I met the boys coming down. I saw at once there was something wrong. The poor boys' faces were gloomy and of a pallid hue—there was not the usual cheery "Good-morning, sir"—and depression and even anxiety seemed to be written on their countenances.

"How have you slept, my boys?" I inquired of them—and they knew absolutely nothing of my night's experience.

"Slept, sir?" they inquired in return, in astonishment; "we have not slept. How could we?"

"Why?" I inquired.

"Tell him, John," said one of them; whilst the other broke in. "Although you command us to sleep up there again, we can not. We are killed with fright!"

"What is it?" I again inquired.

Then John spoke.

"It was awful, sir, and we can not bear it. It was this. What we heard the night before last we also heard last night, but it was far worse. There were, as it seemed to us, two men up stairs engaged in a fierce struggle. They seemed to be in the middle of the house, under the roof, and they fought desperately. We heard a kind of whispering, quarreling, as it were, but we heard no words. It seemed as if one was wearing boots, and the other was not. Then the one wearing boots ran, and the other ran after him, backwards and forwards, backwards and forwards, all in the dark; down they ran, down the stairs, and we heard them rattling the latch as if they wanted to get out. Back then they would come, and rush past us, and as they passed the air was icy cold! Then they would fight and struggle again, and we heard the whispering sound; then again they would run; the one wearing boots ran first, then the other after him. Down they would run, down the stairs again, rattle the latch, and I was terribly frightened," the poor boy added, almost crying "for once as they were going down one of them seized my leg and dragged me half way down. His hands were like ice," he said, drawing his shoulders together, and shivering at the remembrance, "but he let go and I crawled back to my place again, trembling. This went on for a long time. Then they fought again, and at last the one without boots threw down the one with boots; he then danced about, then fell himself. Then all was quiet."

It was strange, and I was silent. What to think I knew not, nor do I to this day. The other boys confirmed John's statement, and stood looking frightened and sorely puzzled. I am perfectly certain that I was not mistaken; the maid had heard the extraordinary sounds, the movements of "spirits" downstairs, and the rattling of the latch; and now confirmation comes from the boys of something uncanny. In the full floodlight of day I examined every inch of wall and floor near that door, but their was neither mark on it, nor place for string, wire, or trap door near it. All was perfect.

I mentioned this extraordinary affair to a doctor living near, and he and his wife arranged to sleep in the house with us the next night. We spent the evening at his house, and we all went to our own about 9 p. m. Sitting outside, round the door of the porch, I found my servant, together with the son of the landlord, to whom I had sent word of the affair.

"Well, lads," I said, as we approached them, "have you seen or heard anything?"

The landlord's son answered:

"We have not seen anything, but whilst we have been sitting here we heard a sound, as of some one having hurled a big stone against your bed-room door."

"Was any one in the house?"

"No, sir," they all answered.

We went in and examined everything, but found neither stone nor mark.

The doctor and I turned down on a couple of mattresses in the reception room on the floor, opposite the front door. His wife slept with mine; and the boys had again gone up-stairs with the men-servants and the landlord's son, feeling safe in their company. The doctor soon fell asleep, but I kept awake. At about 11 p. m. I heard a steady march over me of one—only one—marching backwards and forwards. This was kept on at a steady pace till 12. Then there was a furious bang at the front door as of a huge stone having been hurled against it. There was then a howling of dogs and then all was has ben going up from the far west for a good many years. But the cry is not for pale, haggard, debilitated women. The pushing western men are not anxious for beauty, but they need healthy wives. A great cry for health is continually going up from thousands of women, young and old, all over the earth. Countless remedies have appeared in answer. A few have succeeded, and none hold a higher place than Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, a sure cure for all those peculiar "weaknesses" and distressing ailments peculiar to the sex.

The race is not always to the fleet, because sometimes a storm keeps the fleet at anchor.

When everything else fails, Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy cures.

As a rule the rich love to display their wealth, except when the assessor comes around.

Get well and stay well. But how shall we do it?

Listen my friend, and the secret I'll tell,
Though, for that matter, there's no secret to it,
As many a man understands very well.
If you're low-spirited, gloomy, depressed,
If nothing tastes good and your nights bring no rest,
If your stomach is foul and your mouth seems much fouler,
And so cross you become that they call you a "growler,"
Be sure that the trouble is due to your liver,
And the blood is as sluggish as sometimes a river
Becomes when it's filled with all manner of stuff.
Clear it out and the current runs smoothly enough.

Go to the drug store and get a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, the great blood purifier and liver invigorator. It is a sure cure for the low spirits and general depression a man feels when his liver is inactive and his blood impure. This remedy makes a man well.

At about 11 p. m. I heard a steady march over me of one—only one—marching backwards and forwards. This was kept on at a steady pace till 12. Then there was a furious bang at the front door as of a huge stone having been hurled against it. There was then a howling of dogs and then all was quiet. I heard nothing more, neither did those up-stairs, but that was the last night I slept in that house. Others tried to live there afterward, but had to leave. What was it?

Now for a bit of history by way of explanation, if it can be explained. The King of the country had a few years before been assassinated—strangled. He was surprised in his palace, and in full dress as he was, chased from room to room by the assassin, until at length he tried to find safety in hiding among the rafters, just under the roof. From his hiding place he was dragged and slain.

The actual regicide died in the house where I lived, on a bedstead close to the door whence all the noises proceeded—he died there about three months before I took the house, within three yards of where my pillow was! Of this fact I was not then aware.

I can only ask, How is it to be explained? and add that this story is absolutely true in every respect.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, SEP. 13, 1889.

Judge Falconbridge has voided the Haldimand election, on account of corrupt practices by agents of the sitting member, Mr. Colter. Haldimand is getting an unenviable reputation. It was always a Reform constituency until a bye election just before the last general contest. Then the Tories bought it up, their member was unseated, and since that time it has been a nip and tuck fight between the parties, each one holding the seat for alternate sessions, followed by a protest and another election. The Reformers thought that they had to fight the devil with his own weapons, and thus far it has been about an even game. They are pursuing a wrong policy. Fight a square, honest fight, let the result be what it will.

THE EFFECT OF DUTIES.

The lumbermen, through their association, declared themselves, some time ago, in favor of unrestricted trade with the United States. The returns show that during the last nine years, since 1880, they have sent nearly five thousand million feet to the American market. The duty on this exportation has amounted in all to $10,000,000, ($9,982,000), or a little over $1,000,000 a year. Canada supplies about one-twentieth of the lumber consumed every year in the States. The duty does not by any means represent the whole loss inflicted upon the Canadian lumbermen through restriction. For, if the duty were removed—it is $2 per 1,000 feet—they would be able to ship to the American market a vast quantity of lumber which now, as they express it, will not bear the duty; that is, there is no profit in shipping it while the tax has to be paid, the $2 eating up the margin.

It is the same with agricultural produce. The Canadian farmer could do a far larger as well as a much more profitable trade with his American neighbors if the customs barriers were removed, for the single reason that stuff could then be sent to that market which under present circumstances will not bear the duty. Water freezes and becomes ice at 32° Fahrenheit. At 31° it is still water, so that the difference of a single degree of cold counts for a good deal. In like manner, the difference of a few cents per bushel will often determine whether an article can be grown and sold profitably or not. The indirect injury done by a duty is almost in all cases more serious than the direct loss which it inflicts.

serious than the direct loss which it inflicts.

PROTECTING THE FARMER.

The last number of the Universal Review contains an article on the effect of high protection in France which possesses considerable interest for the Canadian farmer. In 1882 a high tariff was established in France, though not as high as ours. The scheme was to protect the manufacturer, the artisan and the farmer. In order to benefit the first two named, heavy duties were levied on all foreign wares, while the last was to be made happy and rich by duties on cattle, sheep, wheat, meats and other articles of food. The first effect was to diminish the foreign trade of the country. Then the artizan complained that the price of food and the cost of living generally had been largely augmented, and demanded an increase of wages. This brought the manufacturer to his feet with a protest that the cost of production was so great, relatively to that in England, that he could not hold his own in foreign markets, and that the demand in the home market had also fallen off in consequence of the inability of the people so buy. The farmer, who moves slowly, was next heard from. In 1884 he found that the cost of his implements, clothing, harness, axes, nails—in short the cost of producing agricultural products, had risen enormously, and that as a result the foreign farmer could afford to undersell him, notwithstanding the duties on breadstuffs. On his making these representations, the tariff was increased all round in 1885. Matters, however, grew worse instead of better. The general trade continued to decline, for, of course, the cost of production in every line of industry had gone up, and to that extent the producers were less able than before to compete abroad. But the farmer emitted the loudest complaints, and to appease him the wheat and other duties were in 1887 put up another notch. But his last condition is worse that his first, for the cost of farming is now so great that an abundance of foreign stuff is coming in despite the duties. Last year, for instance, the imports rose 26 per cent., those of barley 19 per cent., and those of oats 77 per cent. A short crop aggravated the situation. As a last recourse, the farmers demand that the present cereals duty shall be doubled, and the duty on live stock increased 30 per cent. Cereals, they say, cannot be grown at a profit, while sheep and cattle are raised at a loss. But the artisan, the manufacturer, and the consumer at large are for obvious reasons, opposed to any further advance in the imposts on food. What the outcome may be it is hard to say.

The French farmer, it will be noted, thought to benefit himself by checking the importation of agricultural produce, but has failed. Canada on the other hand, is an exporting rather than an importing country in that line. It stands to reason, therefore, that our farmers, if they only knew it, suffer more severely than the French from the high tariff system. In their case it is all give and no get. In ordinary years the duties do not add one cent to the price of the products. But every year, good or bad, they have to pay through the nose for the support of the Manufacturers' Association and the brood of minor trusts and combines.

Constant Care.

Constant care is necessary against unexpected attacks of summer complaints. No remedy is so well known or so successful in this class of diseases as Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry. Keep it in the house as a safeguard.

of illegality.

Mr. Gladstone visited the Pondicherre section of the Exhibition on Friday. He was presented with specimens of Indian art. Replying to a speech of welcome, he said the universe was indebted to the French Republic for an exhibition which formed a veritable school for the people of the world, and they should attend it.

WINNIPEG, Sept. 9.—The wheat crop of the great Northwest has been safely harvested. Reports received here from various sections indicate that it will all be grade No. 1 hard. Farmers and business men are happy and confident on account of the large yield and excellent quality of the grain. There are 20 elevators in course of construction in Manitoba alone.

A decree has been issued ordering the beginning of work on the proposed railway to Hankow and that work be begun at both ends of the line. The Emperor, fearing popular distrust enjoins the viceroys to issue proclamations explaining that the railway is essential to the prosperity and influence of China. It is stated that Li Hung Chang is raising a foreign loan to defray the cost of his half of the line.

Victoria, B. C., Sept. 7.—The schooner Lilly, which arrived here Thursday, reports she was boarded on Aogust 6th by the U. S. revenue cutter Rush, and 333 sealskins were confiscated. She was ordered to Sitka, but no prize crew was put aboard, and she came here. She spoke the schooner Kate, which had 350 skins aboard. The Kate reported the Rush had ordered her out of Behring Sea, but owing to a gale was unable to board her. The Rush has thus far seized seven schooners.

Kingston, Sept. 9.—The next meeting of the Irish Catholic Benevolent Union will be held in St. Louis, Mo., in 1890. Archbishop Cleary told the delegates Thursday night that only one-sixth of the population in Canada were christians and five-sixths suffered from heresy. The majority went to church because it was respectable to do so. He also said that the Irish race would be on top in Ireland in a few months. The convention pledged support to Mr. Parnell et al, in securing rights from the "unjust British government."

Montreal Star.—It was on July 11 that the Hon. J. J. C. Abbott sailed for Australia via England to utilize his vast commercial experience in enlarging the trade relations between Canada and Australia. It was on July 30 that the Star announced that the Hon. John J. C. Abbott's real mission was to consult the law officers of the crown in England about the Jesuit act. It was on August the 22 that the Hon. John J. C. Abbott sailed for the land of the sagacious beaver, apparently having forgotten his engagement with the frisky kangaroo on the other side of the world, and with all his vast cargo of commericial lore still unloaded.

The first lady who ever argued a case before the Supreme Court of Wisconsin made an argument this week in the person of Miss Kate L. Pier of Milwaukee, a beautiful young brunette with magnificent raven hair, which hung in a prodigous braid to within a foot of the floor. Her opponent was John J. Sutton of Columbus, one of the biggest and greatest lawyers in the state, but who on this occasion wore a singularly subdued mien. The case argued involves several hundred dollars, and a decision in it was reserved. Miss. Pier graduated from the law department of Wisconsin University a year ago. Both her mother and father are lawyers, and the trio practice together at Milwaukee. Another girl in the family is now studying for the bar. The argument created much interest, the court-room being crowed.

TEA EXTRAORDINARY!

Having recently secured an extraordinary good bargain in tea we intend to share it with our customers.

Heretofore we have given extra good value in Tea at 25 cents per pound, but the fifty chests just received would be "dirt cheap" at 45 cents, and 25 cents is what we shall sell it at. We venture to say and we have had many years experience in the tea trade, that nothing to compare with it has ever been sold in Napanee at that price.

To those who want to save money and at same time enjoy a choice cup of Tea, we say come and get a pound and we feel certain it will cause you to come for more.

Imitating Old Cora Pearl.

Following the example of the late "Cora Pearl," a retired Delilah of fifty-seven winters, who had to appear in the Paris Police Court, had intended to publish her memoirs. They were to be issued, however, in a novel; but the literary project has been nipped in the bud. The frail and aged female had for several years been the friend of a wealthy Parisian, who at one time had sent her letters of a rather gushing character, and these the retired courtesan threatened to incorporate in her autobiographical uovel unless a certain sum of money were paid down. Her former admirer, who was about to effect an advantageous matrimonial alliance, and whose prospects of wedlock would be damaged by the publication of the amorous epistles, accordingly paid some of the money asked, and no more was heard of the Circe until lately, when she resumed her blackmailing operations and importuned her victim to buy his letters from her, as well as a portrait of himself which he had given her with a dedication in verse. The sum demanded was £1,000. In court the ancient lady told the magistrate that she had intended to hand the money over to a charitable institution, as she had mended her ways and was making her peace with Paradise, but Monsieur le President on hearing this merely muttered the word baliverne! or "Bosh!" and sentenced the prisoner to eight months' imprisonment and a fine for her blackmailing propensities.

In his curious weekly, the Mirror, Mr. Stuart Cumberland gives a picture of "Jack the Ripper" as revealed to him in a dream. He says:

The face was thinnish and oval in shape. The eyes were dark and prominent, showing plenty of white. The brow was narrow and the chin somewhat pointed. The complexion was sallow, somewhere between that of a Maltese and a Parsee. The nose was somewhat Semitic in shape and formed a prominent feature of the face. The formation of the mouth I could not very well see; it was shaded by a black mustache. Beyond the hair on the upper lip the face was bare. It was not a particularly disagreeable face, but there was a wild intensity about the dark, full eyes that fascinated me as I gazed into them. They were the eyes of a mesmerist!

From which Mr. Cumberland concludes that the murderer first mesmerizes his victims before despatching them.

Oscar Wilde's Mesmer.

The reception given by Lady Wilde at her house in Oakley street, Chelsea, on Saturday afternoons, are always interesting. The hostess herself, with her ardent love for Ireland and all that is best in literature and art, is most delightful. She is ever ready to welcome any American who has done anything with heartfelt cordiality. Her rooms are darkened and only lighted by lamps with deep red shades, and the contrast from the daylight outside to the picturesque gloom within should be seen or rather felt, to be appreciated. Assembled here are sure to be actresses, novelists, poets, artists, journalists and patriots, and all interests can find sympathizers. Oscar Wilde and his pretty wife are almost always there, and Willy Wilde, a clever journalist, is present at his mother's salon whenever he is in town. Miss Tynte, an æsthetic reciter; Miss Edmiston, a clever actress: Mrs. Mona Caird, who asked the question. "Is Marriage a Failure?" Mrs. Frank Leslie, of New York, and Mrs. Edward Russell, the Delsartian, are among the interesting persons to be met at sweet Lady Wilde's conversazione.—Boston Gazette.—London Letter.

A Bishop With £80,000 a Year.

Somebody has remarked that a Bishop is the most enviable of all human beings, seeing that he has everything the soul can desire in this world, and ought to be secure for the world, and ought to be secure for the next. But on the whole, an Austrian Archbishop is probably more to be envied than any English bishop. The Cardinal Archbishop of Vienna has only about £6,000 a year, it is true, but the Cardinal Archbishop of Olmut has £40,000, the Cardinal Archbishop of Prague has £35,000, and the Archbishop of Eriru has £60,000. Luckier than all is the happy Primate of Hungary, the Cardinal Archbishop of Grau, who has £80,000 a year. Why are so many Austrians so foolish as to be born village priests with £20 a year.—Pall Mall Gazette.

HEALTH.

Feeding the Sick.

It is rarely easy, and almost always very difficult, to persuade the sick to take nourishment in sufficient quantity, and the successful nurse must be rich in expedients. Her persuasive power must be great. She must be patient, and yet firmly persistent, until her whole duty is done. There are certain general rules for her to observe. A few of them we will give. All foods for the sick should be of the very best quality, well cooked, palatably seasoned and attractively served. A savory dish will always sharpen the appetite of one in health, and it must have a stimulating influence upon a delicate patient, to whom the flat and insipid preparations usually offered are loathsome and even nauseating.

Surprise is frequently a useful element in the dietetic treatment of the sick. Something unexpected will often be acceptable, when were the patient consulted and advised of what was being prepared for him, it would take away all appetite for it. Cooking in the sick room is, of course, always forbidden, nor should the smell of food be allowed to reach the patient if it is possible to prevent it. Absolute neatness in the service of food is a prime consideration. There is more to the patient in clean napkins, spotless china, etc., than many think. A slovenly nurse is out of place anywhere. If the doctor directs that certain foods be given hot, he means that they should be hot, and not merely warm, in which condition some are very insipid.

Occasionally one sees the nurse tasting the food in the presence of the patient—a most unpardonable habit. No more food should be at one time taken into the sick-room than is likely to be eaten, and whatever is not eaten should be at once removed. Nurses often leave it in sight, in the hope that the patient may want it a little later, but almost invariably they are disappointed. It is quite a common thing for the physician to find milk in a glass or pitcher standing near the bedside of his patient, and often the appearance of the glass is such that even a person with the strongest kind of a stomach would not care to drink from it. Of all foods, milk probably takes up impurities the easiest. Hence, to keep it exposed to the air of a sick-room or any other bad air is to simply render it unfit for use. A nurse with anything approaching neatness would never allow a glass which has held milk to be used a second time without carefully washing and rinsing. Some consult their own convenience altogether too much in feeding the sick. Food ought to be given at regular intervals when possible.

Fruits as Food and Medicine.

Of all the fruits with which we are blessed, the peach is the most delicious and digestible. There is nothing more palatable, wholesome and medicinal than good, ripe peaches. They should be ripe, but not over-ripe and half rotten; and of this kind they may make a part of either meal, or be eaten between meals; but it is better to make them a part of the regular meals. It is a mistaken idea that no fruit should be eaten at breakfast. It would be far better if our people would eat less bacon and grease at breakfast, and more fruit. In the morning there is an acrid state of the secretions, and nothing is so well calculated to correct this as cooling sub acid fruits, such as peaches, apples, etc. Still, most of us have been taught that eating fruit before breakfast is highly dangerous. How the idea originated I do not know, but it is certainly a great error, contrary to both reason and facts. The apple is one of the best of fruits. Baked or stewed apples will

Did His Duty.

The free and easy manner in which the trial of Sullivan was conducted at Purvis, Miss. the unrestricted tendency of the crowd to lionise the pugilist and the unmistakable trend of local opinion gave little assurance that the affair would be more than farcical; but to the surprise of all, the jury found a verdict of guilty, and now the presiding judge has vindicated the dignity of his office and his own manhood by sentencing the pugilist to one year's imprisonment at hard labor, the extreme penalty of the law. Had he imposed lighter punishment he would have been shamefully derelict in duty, but a knowledge of the prevalent sentiment in Mississippi and of the vagaries of its justice did not tend to fortify public confidence and had Sullivan escaped with a nominal fine, it would have occasioned little surprise. A petition signed by over one thousand people including the sheriff and the jurymen, praying that Sullivan be released with a fine was a formidable document, peculiarly so in that section, but Judge Terrell possessed the courage of his convictions in an eminent degree, and undeterred by the strong influence brought to bear, discharged his duty faithfully and manfully. He knew as every one knew, that a fine would be a travesty, and that Sullivan's sporting friends would pay it cheerfully as one of the legitimate expenses of the fight. At such punishment they could well afford to smile, but imprisonment at hard labor is an entirely different matter and the consternation of the plug-ugly fraternity is easily imagined. It is possible that legal ingenuity may yet defeat the ends of justice, but every right-thinking man will devoutly hope that nothing will impede Sullivan's progress to the penitentiary or shorten his stay in the asylum which should have received him years ago. The man is an habitual law breaker and a curse to society. He is a fair representive of all that is vicious and depraved, and his unusual strength as a pugilist has enabled him to exert a most pernicious influence, far reaching and tenacious. The hulking rowdy, drunkard and wife-beater is a disgrace to civilization and it is gratifying to know that at last he is to be placed with the convicted criminals where he belongs.

Putting Down Drunkenness.

Wonders have been done by the Danish police, it is said, in putting down drunkenness at least in the streets. It is not your brutal patrol waggon method. No, it is the outcome of a refined and civilized age and an educated policeman. If the Danish constable on his beat comes across a drunken man he first gets his address, then hails a cab, politely assists the inebriate into it, and drives off with him to his home, and after ringing the bell deposits the unhappy individual in the arms of his family. If the man is too drunk or cannot remember his address, he is driven to the police station, and the following morning a fresh cab is hired by the constable to drive the victim to his home. "But who pays for all these cabs?" the anxious inquirer demands. The publican who supplied the man with drink is made responsible. We do not advocate this polite method for Canada, but just mention it to show what constabulary courtesy can do. In the state of Georgia the antithesis of this treatment is proposed for the suppression of street drunkenness. A bill has been introduced into the Legislature making it a misdemeanor for any person to get drunk except on his own premises. The bill provides that if a man does get drunk elsewhere than on his own premises he shall be fined $10 and imprisoned ten days; if he does it again the fine must be $20 and twenty days' imprisonment, and the fine

A NEW TEMPERANCE COLONY.

To Renew The Attempt to Found a Model and Happy Community.

"I arrived here," writes Mr. P. J. Spencer (the honorable Secretary of this movement) from British Columbia to the "Pall Mall Gazette," fifteen months ago, and I have explored Queen Charlotte, Vancouver, and the adjacent islands. I have selected Malcolm Island for the colony; it is about two miles wide by twelve miles long; it has two good harbors. It is about 200 miles north of Victoria. The Lieutenant Governor-General signed the minute in council, reserving the island for us, on the 6th of June last. The Government has agreed to give eighty acres of land for every house we erect value £100, and the settler is to be free from all taxes for twelve months. We have already commenced operations; those who can pay their expenses and keep themselves for the first twelve months are the pioneers. To meet the case of those who cannot do this a public subscription has been opened. We are right in the centre of the salmon industry. British Columbia will be a great manufacturing country. Any amount of coal, and iron, timber, &c. The climate is preferable to England, and we hope to have the prettiest village upon the face of God's earth."

It appears from a further communication sent us by Mr. Spencer that all members of the colony will be required to work eight hours per diem and four hours on Saturday. The committee, on behalf of the members of the commonwealth, will take all responsibility in providing work, medical attendance, food, and clothing for the member and his family, and also provide for the scholastic education of the children, and, in the event of the member being sick, still provide as though he were at work, and if he dies to keep the widow and orphans, &c. Each and every member will have the same interest in the commonwealth. The land will be held in trust by the committee for and on behalf of the members, and clauses will be inserted preventing the manufacture and sale of any intoxicating drinks by any member of the C.T.C.C. A clause will also be inserted preventing the trustees from selling or mortgaging the land or property of the commonwealth, and that there shall always be liberty of conscience; that no creed or dogma shall be insisted upon, the only "test" will be a willingness to conform to "the ten commandments and the sayings of Jesus."

The board of Management will undertake and arrange with each member that every lad will learn some trade, and that each girl shall be instructed in household duties, family dressmaking, needlework, nursing, cooking, singing, pianoforte, and etiquette. No girl will be considered a servant, but will fulfil her appointment as a learner. As soon as the children of the members are old enough to perform the sacred duties of marriage, they will first give the Municipal Board three months' notice of their intention, in order to give the Board time to erect and furnish the house and to make all the necessary arrangements. All marriage will be contracted as by law established. Young men having learned their trade will be at liberty to leave the commonwealth and will be at liberty to return after fulfilling the conditions. No member will be called upon to work after the age of 55, but he may do it voluntarily,

How Newfoundland Farmers Procure Manure.

It may interest many to know how our farmers procure manure for their farms. Between the 13th and 20th of June every year, after the seed is all in and cared for, comes the famous "manure-harvest"—the capelin such as peaches, apples, etc. Still, most of us have been taught that eating fruit before breakfast is highly dangerous. How the idea originated I do not know, but it is certainly a great error, contrary to both reason and facts. The apple is one of the best of fruits. Baked or stewed apples will generally agree with the most delicate stomach, and are an excellent medicine in many cases of sickness. Green or half-ripe apples stewed and sweetened are pleasant to the taste, cooling, nourishing and laxative, far superior, in many cases to the abominable doses of salts and oil usually given in fever and other diseases. Raw apples and dried apples stewed are better for constipation than liver pills. Oranges are very acceptable to most stomachs, having all the advantages of the acid alluded to; but the orange juice alone should be taken, rejecting the pulp. The same may be said of lemons, pomegranates and all that class. Lemonade is the best drink in fevers, and when thickened with sugar is better than syrup of squills and other nauseants in many cases of cough. Tomatoes act on the liver and bowels, and are much more pleasant and safe than blue mass and "liver regulators." The juice should be used alone rejecting the skins. The small-seeded fruits, such as blackberries, figs, rasperries, currants and strawberries, may be classed among the best foods and medicines. The sugar in them is nutritious, the acid is cooling and purifying, and the seeds are laxative. We would be much the gainers if we would look more to our orchards and gardens and less to our drug stores. To cure fever or act on the kidneys, no febrifuge or diuretic is superior to watermelon, which may with very few exceptions be taken in sickness and health in almost unlimited quantities, not only without injury, but with positive benefit. But in using them, the water, or juice, should be taken, excluding the pulp; and the melon should be fresh and ripe, but not over-ripe and stale.—[Hall's Journal of Health.

How to Disinfect.

Clothing which requires disinfecting should be submitted for about three hours to a temperature of 230 degrees in a chamber charged with sulphuric fumes from a large quantity of sulphur. The chamber should be so constructed as to prevent the fumes from passing off. No germs can stand this.

After a room has been used by a person sick with any contagious disease, it becomes necessary to disinfect it before it is fit to be used again. This is done by removing and burning the paper on the walls, removing the bedsteads and other furniture, and exposing them to air and wind, and giving them a fresh coat of varnish; by having the mattress made over new and the hair boiled; by burning in the room three pounds of sulphur, and by white-washing, painting and papering the room anew.

Now that it is generally conceded that consumption is caused by germs which multiply in the lungs, a method of disinfecting them, which shall be harmless, has been sought for, but as yet without avail. The vapor of creosote, the oil of the eucalyptus and carbolic acid have been tried, and, to some extent, they may paralyze or stun the germs and prevent their rapid increase, but as the passages of the lungs are delicate, and the vapor cannot be brought very near to them without injury, the good effects are slight. But there is one method which cannot fail to prove beneficial, and that is the inhalation of large quantities of fresh, pure air. This is worth more than any disinfectant for the lungs and can do no harm.

A Finnish newspaper is to be started at Houghton, Mich. It should never contain a continued story.

A bill has been introduced into the Legislature making it a misdemeanor for any person to get drunk except on his own premises. The bill provides that if a man does get drunk elsewhere than on his own premises he shall be fined $10 and imprisoned ten days; if he does it again the fine must be $20 and twenty days' imprisonment, and the fine thereafter for each offence is cumulative.

Where "Red Tape" Prevails.

A paymaster in the United States navy gives an exchange the following account of the "red tape" that must be gone through in making purchases for a man-of-war:—Supposing that a paper of tacks is wanted on board a United States ship on a foreign station, the following is the routine actually required under general order No. 48:—Four requisitions are made out, which are signed as follows:—Officer making the requisition, four times, captain eight, paymaster eight, and admiral four. Bids are sent out to five merchants, which are signed by pay officer five times; merchants bidding, five; acceptance of bid, paymaster, one. Bids are then made out in quintuplicate and are signed by the captain five times; paymaster, ten; senior officer of the board of inspection, five; and persons receiving the money, five. A report is attached by the senior officer of the Board of Survey in duplicate, two signatures, and the officer who has made the requisition signs a receipt on the bill five times, when it is complete, with more than half a hundred signatures.—[Philadelphia Ledger.

Lucky Man.

Visitor (looking through the photograph album)—"This, if I mistake not, is a portrait of your deceased husband."

Widow—"It is."

Visitor (with a well-meant effort to say something appropriate)—"What a fine-looking man he was! And so young! But he has escaped many of the trials and sufferings of this life. Ah, me!"

Widow (with a sigh)—"Yes. He died just as I was getting ready to can five dozen boxes of blackberries."

Ashamed of His Wife's Handiwork.

"How do you do, Sam?" said a colored gentleman to one of his cronies the other day. "Why you no come to see a feller? If I lib as near you as you do to me I'd come to see you ebery day." "Da fack is," replied Sam, "my wife patch my trouserloons so all to pieces I 'shamed to go nowhars."

Didn't Want to be Too Precipitate.

Charlie—"Well, Edith, if you are as fond of me as you say, why don't you promise to marry me?"

Edith—"Well, you see, Charlie, I—I—well, the fact is, I—haven't been to Newport yet—nor Saratoga—nor anywhere in fact but here at Long Branch, and one never knows who might be—that is—well, I wish, Charlie, you would wait until the first of November anyway—I'll tell you then."

A Summer Arrangement.

Husband—What a pity that Emma had to go and throw Mr. Coldsnap overboard, for I bought our coal from him last winter. Now next winter I'll have to pay the full price.

Wife—Calm yourself, husband: she is going to renew the engagement in the fall. You see, she broke it in order to become engaged Mr. to Cooler, the man we buy our ice from.

How Newfoundland Farmers Procure Manure.

It may interest many to know how our farmers procure manure for their farms. Between the 13th and 20th of June every year, after the seed is all in and cared for, comes the famous "manure-harvest,"—the caplin-school. Caplin are a small fish something like the American white fish. They are smaller than herring but much larger than sardines. On the pebbly beaches that fringe the magnificent bays of Newfoundland, they find natural and congenial spawning grounds. About the middle of June, in obedience to the great and universal law of Nature,—the increase and multiplication of species,—they come in immense shoals,—in millions upon millions,—to deposit their spawn upon the pebbly sea-shore. Their mode of depositing the spawn is such as to leave them at the mercy of the innumerable hordes of fishes and fishers that prey upon them. The female is small and smooth, and the male is large and ridged. When spawning they swim in threes, one female between two males; the female fits between the ridges in the males, and they swim parallel, almost as one fish. The males by their pressure aid the female to deposit her spawn, and at the same time they drop their "milt," which fructifies the spawn. It is during this time, while the fish are apparently half-dazed, that the fisherman and farmer reap their harvest. They catch them with seines and cast-nets. With a seine, four or five men in a skiff can easily get from fifty to two hundred barrels of them in a day. The method of seining them is, when the caplin are close to the beach, one end of the seine is fastened ashore with a grapnel and the other end is kept aboard the skiff. The crew row around the great body of caplin and fence in thousands of barrels against the beach. They then dip them out with dip-nets and get many skiff loads—from thirty to fifty barrels in a load,—in one haul. They then land them on wharves or on the beach and haul them away to their farms, where they mix them in the proportion of one load of caplin to five loads of peat, bog or clay. This makes a very strong manure, and as it supplies nearly all the elements of plant food, it forces heavy crops of all kinds. Fishermen also catch them and use them as bait for cod fish. They are a delicious morsel when eaten fresh, and there is a fortune for the man who solves the problem of getting them into the American markets as fresh and as delicious as we get them here. When salted or smoked they make a very good article of food for winter, and many a poor family preserves enough for sale, and to feed themselves, their pigs and hogs for a whole year, till the next caplin-school arrives. Of course, as a manure, they are a god-send to the farmers, many of whom have scarcely any other means of procuring fertilizer in sufficient quantities for their lands. But when looking at the thousands upon thousands of barrels of fresh, delicious fish, so used, it seems almost sinful to destroy such quantities of wholesome and toothsome human food, when so many millions of the race would eat them with a relish if they had the chance.

A Joke that Rebounded.

The Mitchell "Advocate" says:—A commercial traveller, since the elevation of Bishop Walsh, of London, to the Archbishopric of Toronto, is reminded of an occurrence some years ago in a railway car, in which his present lordship took part. An irreverent traveller asked Bishop Walsh, probably not knowing who he was, if he had not heard that in Paris as often as a priest was hanged a donkey was hanged at the same time. The proposed victim of the joke replied in the blandest possible manner, "Well, then, let us both be thankful that we are not in Paris."

Fine Steamships.

The City of New York, except that she is built with a view to record breaking, is very much like any other ocean steamship, but the Teutonic is an innovation. She is the first of several traders ordered to be constructed, and subsidized by the State, that in case of emergency will co-operate with the navy. She recently took part in the naval review off Spithead and was much admired by the Emperor William. The Teutonic is a magnificent vessel—longer than any other ship that ploughs the deep, and as ornate and luxurious as a floating palace. Her saloon of ivory and gold will seat 300 guests, and when illumined with the electric light, is fairylike in its splendour. There is similar lavishness in her library, with its huge cases of well chosen books, and equal taste in her smoke-room, with its rich fittings, delicate decorations, and its imposing paintings of old world navies. Her beautiful lines, her enormous engines, her brilliant lighting are all without previous models, though they indicate very clearly the direction of England's advancement in the future. Except for size and adornment, however, there is not much to distinguish the Teutonic from her seagoing competitors. In length she is 582 feet, in depth 39 feet 4 inches, and in breadth 57 feet 6 inches; while she can boast a displacement of nearly 10,000 tons. Her hurricane deck, which is of great height, is between 80 and 90 yards long, and is unimpeded by the boats, which are all above. At each end of the vessel are strong batteries of Armstrong guns—breechloaders with 6 inch bore; and their efficacy may be gauged by the fact that they possess a range of five miles, and can pierce half a dozen inches of armour when at close quarters. With such an equipment she should be able to beat off at least fifteen out of every twenty assailants, and in the presence of craft with heavier metal she can always show "a clean pair of heels." In a general way the Teutonic will rank as an ordinary liner, but it is part of the compact with the authorities that she shall be ready to obey the Admiralty summons whenever called upon. For this purpose, a portion of her crew are naval reserve men, and, in case of danger, they will not fail to make her an armed cruiser in fact as well as in name.

A Vile Plot Frustrated.

A remarkable interposition of Providence is on record in Paris. In 1766 a young peasant girl went to Paris and was hired as a domestic servant by a man whose reputation was excellent, but who was a hypocrite and a libertine. He made improper proposals to the young girl who refused to understand his meaning or give him any encouragement. This so enraged him that he had her arrested for theft, and secured her conviction by hiding some jewelry in her trunk. The prisoner had no friends to intercede for her and was hanged. The executioner was a novice, bungled over the work, and after repeated attempt to kill the girl imagined he had succeeded, and handed the body over to a dissecting surgeon. The first cut with a knife showed that the girl lived and she was quickly restored. When she opened her eyes she imagined herself in another world, and it was some time before she could be convicted of her escape. Her description of what she saw during her apparent death was listened to with wonder and amazement by her new found friends. She told of lovely parterres with beautiful streams flowing through and round them, of flora and fauna of dazzling gorgeousness, of perpetual sunshine and unmeasurable happiness. The young girl had lived a prosaic life, was poorly educated, and had no imagination at all, if the chronicler is to be credited, and her

HOUSEHOLD.

Old Homes Are Best.

If one runs over the list of the persons known to him he finds very few of more than forty years old living in the houses in which they were born. Of the twenty houses built more than fifty years ago nearest my own, only one is lived in by the family by which it was originally occupied, while most of the others have had numerous successive owners or tenants. Of my own friends near my own age there are but two or three anywhere who live in the houses which their fathers occupied before them. This lack of herditary homes—homes of one family for more than one generation—is a novel and significant feature of new world society. In its effect on the quality of our civilization it has not received the attention it deserves.

The conditions which have brought about this state of things are obvious. The spirit of equality, and the practices, especially in regard to the distribution of property, that have resulted from it; the general change in the standards of living arising from the enormous development of the natural resources of the country, and the consequent unexampled diffusion of wealth and material comfort; the rapid settlement of our immense territory, and the astonishing growth of our old as well as of our new cities, have been unfavorable to the existence of the hereditary home.

There is scarcely a town in the long settled parts of the northern states from which a considerable portion of its people has not gone out in the course of the past fifty years to seek residence elsewhere. Attachment to the native soil, affection for the home of one's youth, the claims of kindred, the bonds of social duty, have not proved strong enough to resist the allurement of hope, the fair promise of bettering fortune, and the love of adventure. The increasing ease and the vast extension of means of communication between distant parts of the country have promoted the movement of the population. —[Scribner's.

Work on Huckaback.

A beautiful burea u cover or buffet scarf is made of a suitable length of fine white huckaback treated as follows: Fringe each end a quarter of a yard in depth; above this draw a row of full faced conventional daisies connected with an undulating stem, and outline the pattern in regular outline stitch with rose colored linen floss. Then, with long needlesful of floss, proceed to darn the huckaback from the fringe up to a few inches above the outline pattern, going up on one line and down on the next with an unbroken thread, leaving the ends long enough to tie in with the white fringe. The material is easily darned with a blunt pointed needle that will readily pick up the cross threads without peircing the goods. When all is done, the flowers which have only been outlined stand up on the pink background in heavy relief.

A stand cover of white linen embroidered in white or colored linen floss commends itself to housekeepers who like things that will wash. One of the prettiest new styles has a border all round of life-sized grape leaves overlapping, embroidered in open stitches. Any one with a clever pencil could make her own design from nature, or one less gifted could use a real leaf for a guide and draw the pencil round it. After the design is ready, buttonhole each leaf all round. The veins of the leaves are done in outline stitch and shaded in honeycomb stitch.

White and unbleached linen damask is much used for all purposes for which linen covers are appropriate. A showy but simple pattern is chosen and this is worked up in all or seeing it done. There is a great deal of knack in bandaging well, and only practice makes this, as it does most things, perfect.

Bandages are used for applying any pressure that may be needed, for fixing dressings and splints, to secure rest to any injured part, etc.

They are usually made of unbleached calico, flannel, linen, muslin, etc. Calico or linen should be washed before use, to take out all the glaze and stiffness.

The length of a finger bandage should be a yard, and its width three quarters of an inch.

An arm bandage should be two and a half inches wide, and three to six yards in length.

A leg bandage should be three inches wide, and eight to twelve yards in length.

A head bandage shou'd be two and a half inches wide, and four to six yards long.

To roll a bandage you should fold the end tightly two or three times, and by so doing make it into a little roll. Hold this by the fingers of both your hands, placing both your thumbs on the top of it. Revolve the roll on its own axis made by the movement of the thumbs, and fasten the end with a pin or a stitch to keep it tightly rolled.

1. Always bandage from within outwards.
2. Begin bandaging from below, and work your bandage upwards.
3. Let the bandage be evenly and firmly applied.
4. Have no wrinkles.
5. When reversing do so on the fleshy part, and never on the sharp edge of a bone.

It is dangerous to bandage too tightly, as that causes constriction, and prevents the circulation of the blood. On the other hand, a bandage that is too loose is almost useless, so that an even pressure is a great thing to aim at.

Choice Recipes.

BLACKBERRY SHORTCAKE.—Make a short cake and roll in two sheets, one thicker than the other. Lay the thinner crust on a well greased baking pan, cover thickly with berries well sugared; lay on the top crust and bake about twenty minutes. Cut into squares.

CREAM PIE.—One large cup of flour, in which put one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, and a small pinch of salt. Break into this three eggs, add one cup white sugar and stir all together. Lastly, add three tablespoonfuls of thick, sweet cream, in which you have dissolved one-half teaspoonful of soda. This makes two pies or cakes.

BLACKBERRY PIE.—Line a pie plate with a good crust; sprinkle a little flour over the bottom, fill with berries, sprinkle over more flour and a cup of sugar. Pour over all a cup of sweet cream and bake quickly.

MOLASSESS PUFFS.—One half cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, one cup of molasses, one egg, one tablespoonful of ginger, one teaspoonful of soda, one cup of hot water, four cups of flour, and a pinch of salt. Bake in gem pans.

RICH JUMBLES.—One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, two eggs, the juice and grated rind of one lemon, one-half teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a teaspoonful of hot water, a pinch of salt and flour to roll out. Roll very thin and cut in rings with a hole in the centre. Bake in a quick oven, watching them carefully.

TOMATO SOUP.—One quart of tomatoes, peeled and cut up, two heaping tablespoonfuls of flour, one of butter, one teaspoonful of salt, one of sugar, a pint of hot water. Boil the tomatoes in the water until soft. Rub flour, butter, and a tablespoonful of tomato together. Stir into the boiling mixture, add seasoning, boil all together fifteen minutes, rub through a colander, and serve with toasted bread. This bread should first parterres with beautiful streams flowing through and round them, of flora and fauna of dazzling gorgeousness, of perpetual sunshine and unmeasurable happiness. The young girl had lived a prosaic life, was poorly educated, and had no imagination at all, if the chronicler is to be credited, and her revelations are the more remarkable in consequence. The scoundrel who compassed her ruin was arrested, but acquitted on technical grounds, but the people "loaded him with well-merited reproaches."

Apple Exports.

And now it is apples. The exports from America to Great Britain in the last fiscal year reached a total of 1,401,382 barrels. Of this quanty 481,756 barrels were forwarded from the port of New York, and 380,175 barrels from the port of Boston. Halifax sent 95,122 barrels, and Annapolis only 3,119 barrels—the total less than one-eighth the quanty of New York and Boston shipments. The United States apple growers, it will be seen, are not only supplying their home market, but beating us all hollow in the British market. And ye certain Grit papers have the audacity to tell our farmers and fruit growers that all they need to make them prosperous is unrestricted reciprocity with the States! It is clear that there is little market in the United States for our apples, but fortunately there is an almost unlimited market in Britain. While we have been grasping after the shadow, the United States producers have been reaching out for the substance. If the Grit press had been in the pay of Canada's enemies, the most ingenious could scarcely have devised a policy so well calculated as the advocacy of unrestricted reciprocity to stifle enterprise and prevent our people from adapting themselves to the changed conditions of the world's markets.—[Moncton Times.

Perfumes.

An interest, an individuality belongs to the persons who attach themselves to some fine old scents, once fashionable but nearly forgotten, and who come to be known by the boquet de Caroline, or the honey wtaer which faintly perfumes their handkerchiefs and gloves. Such fancies belong to the persons not quite young, who yet never grow old, but are a betrayal of ardent sensibilities transformed into tastes and keen remembrances. The dulling of time does not take place with such people, it only refines them. Or the delicate old perfume may be carried by one of those young persons, serious and mature beyond the years, who are condensed romances. One can tell a character, or at least its development, by a parfume readily. One thing is curious, but perfectly natural, that perfumers by trade never care to use perfumes, they breathe so much of them.

His Peculiar Way of Expressing It.

A Russian gentleman who has an American wife met some friends of the latter who were travelling in Europe recently, and among other things which he told them concerning her was the fact that she had been bitten by one of his bloodhounds, that had started out and run amuck, so to say, one day upon his estate. The Americans were filled with horror and were eager in their inquiries in regard to what was done and if there were any evil results from the wound. The Russian, who is of high rank, hastened to reassure them.

"There were no bad consequences at all," he assured them. "I took a hot iron and burned out the wound. It smelled a little like mutton chops cooking, but I didn't mind that."

White and unbleached linen damask is much used for all purposes for which linen covers are appropriate. A showy but simple pattern is chosen and this is worked up in all the pretty stitches at which feminine fingers are so deft, beginning by outlining the design in the stitch generally employed for that purpose.

A Girl's Toilet Articles.

A sensible girl will not keep a lot of cosmetics and drugs on her toilet table, but there are a few articles she should always have in a convenient place. She should have an array of glass stopped bottles containing alcohol, alum, camphor, borax, ammonia and glycerine or vaseline. A little camphor or water may be used as a wash for the mouth and throat if the breath is not sweet. Powdered alum applied to a fever sore will prevent it from becoming very unsightly and noticeable. Insect stings or eruptions on the skin are removed by alcohol. A few grains of alum in tepid water will relieve people whose hands perspire very freely, rendering them unpleasantly moist. A few drops of sulphuric acid in the water are also desirable for those whose feet perspire freely. We should always recommend care in the use of scented soap; in many cases the perfume is simply a disguise for poor quality. A good glycerine or honey soap is always preferable. Of course, one may rely on scented soap from a high class manufacturer, but it costs more than it is worth. In addition to the soap for bathing, white castile should be kept for washing the hair. Occasionally a little borax or ammonia may be used for this purpose, but it is usually too harsh in its effects.

When Women Should Marry.

Probably the best time for the average woman to marry would be any age between 24 and 36. It is not said that no woman should marry earlier or later than either of these ages: but youth and health and vigor are ordinarily at their highest perfection between these two periods. Early marriages are seldom desirable for girls, and that for many reasons. The brain is immature, the reason is feeble, and the character is unformed. The consideration which would prompt a girl to marry at 17 would, in many cases, have little weight with her at 24. At 17 she is a child, at 24 a woman.

Where a girl has intelligent parents, the seven years between seventeen and twenty-four are the period when mind and body are most amenable to wise discipline, and best repay the thought and toil devoted to their development. Before seventeen few girls have learned to understand what life is, what discipline is, what duty is. They cannot value what is best either in the father's wisdom or in the mother's tenderness. When married at that childish period they are like young recruits taken fresh from the farm and the work-shop and hurried off to a long campaign with out any period of preliminary drill and training, or like a school boy removed from school to a curacy without being sent to a theological hall.

Who can help grieving over a child-wife, especially if she have children and a husband who is an inexperienced and possibly exacting boy-man? The ardor of his love soon cools: the visionary bliss of her poetical imagination vanishes like the summer mist: there is nothing left but disappointment and wonder that what promised to be so beautiful and long a day should be clouded almost before sunrise.

Hints About Bandaging.

I question if, even with diagrams, anyone can learn to bandage properly, says a writer, without being actually shown how to do it of salt, one of sugar, a pint of hot water. Boil the tomatoes in the water until soft. Rub flour, butter, and a tablespoonful of tomato together. Stir into the boiling mixture, add seasoning, boil all together fifteen minutes, rub through a colander, and serve with toasted bread. This bread should first be cut in thin slices; should be buttered, cut into little squares, placed in a pan, buttered side up, and browned in a quick oven.

CORN OYSTERS.—One cupful of flour, half a cupful of melted butter, three tablespoonfuls of milk, two teaspoonfuls of salt, one fourth of a teaspoonful of pepper, one pint of grated corn. Pour the corn on the flour, and beat well; then add the other ingredients, and beat rapidly for three minutes. Have fat in the frying pan to the depth of about two inches. When smoking hot, put in the batter by the spoonful. Hold the spoon close to the fat and the shape of the oyster will be good. Fry about five minutes.

She Wears Man's Clothing.

There is one woman in Missouri who holds a written permit from the Governor of that State to wear a man's dress "anywhere in Missouri outside of cities of 10,000 inhabitants." Her name is Emily Paxton, and she was brought up on a farm by a lady named Conkling, to whom she was given by her father when one month old, on her mother's death. At 15 years old she was taken to Pike county, Missouri, by Mrs. Conkling's brother, and began to work on his farm. By his direction she put on male attire, and for 23 years she has continued to wear it except when visiting a city. She does all "kinds of farm work except chopping," but her favourite occupation is breaking horses to harness. Of these she herself owns three, and has charge of 13. For three years, in partnership with a man, she owned and worked a reaper, until it became so far worn out that the repairs made its further use unprofitable. She cut on an average 10 acres of grain a day. At another time she hauled logs to a saw mill. At present she lives with a family named Willis, at Farmer, Pike county, Mo., an elderly couple and the husband an invalid. She is treated like their own daughter. She has entire charge of their farm of several hundred acres. Although Virginians, and she is a very light quadroon, they show great consideration and regard. Almost everybody knows her in Pike, Audrain, and the adjoining countries, and treats her with respect, though she is known to be a woman in male attire. She wears male dress "because it suits her work," and she prefers outdoor work because she dislikes confinement in the house, and can earn better wages. She owns two tracts of land in Greeley county, Kan., one a homestead claim which she took and made good by actual residence and improvements, the other a "tree claim," on which she has set out ten acres of trees. She disliked the loneliness and isolation of her Kansas life, and says she can do better by carrying on a farm for others than by working on her own.—[Philadelphia Ledger.

"What kind of a piece of ice do you call that?" demanded the irate housekeeper, as she gazed upon the infinitesimal lump which the man had brought. "Why, that won't last long enough to pay putting it into the refrigerator." "You'd find it more economical," replied the iceman, "if you would take ice by the season; but, you know, you said you'd get it as you want it." "Yes," responded the housekeeper, with some acerbit, "but I won't want it as I get it."

YOUNG FOLKS.

THE P. R. A. J. SOCIETY.

When Mrs. Burton received a letter from her sister, Mrs. Graham, asking whether Annie Graham could stay with her aunt and cousins from September till the following January, she was much pleased. Annie was twelve years old, just the age of Tom Burton; and as the four other children were much older, their ages ranging from eighteen to twenty four, she thought it would be very pleasant for Tom to have a companion of his own age. The whole family thought a bright little girlwould be an agreeable addition to the household circle; but when Annie came they were much disappointed. Her appearance was pleasing. She had a trim little figure, bright black eyes, pretty dark curls, and, tho' her features were rather irregular, her expression was both amiable and intelligent; her manners, too, were graceful and refined; but she was painfully shy. She seemed troubled if spoken to, and even a glance would cause her to shrink as if trying to hide from every eye. The thought of going to school seemed so distressing that Mrs. Burton dropped the subject and allowed her to stay at home.

Tom was disappointed, and complained to his mother that he could not get acquainted with Annie.

"Never mind, dear," said Mrs. Burton. "I think you will get on together nicely when the ice is once broken"; but Tom feared it never would break.

Tom was a good boy, in the main, tho he had a very quick temper, and he was a good looking boy, but—his hair was red. Now, as some people object to red hair, I should like to describe Tom's as auburn or golden or tawny; but the truth is, that if ever hair was red—genuine, unmistakable, unmitigated, fiery red—that hair was Tom's, and Tom knew it. Poor boy! he couldn't help knowing it, for he had been teased about it from his earliest recollection. His trials began with his elder brothers at home, but they culminated at school when the boys found how it plagued him to have any allusion made to his hair. Battle after battle did Tom fight to compel silence on the subject, but all in vain.

One day when Annie had been at her aunt's for nearly a week, Tom rushed home from school and burst into the sitting-room, where the family were assembled, in such a plight that his appearnce was greeted by a chorus of reproof and remonstrance.

"Dear me, Tom," said fastidious Miss Clara, "you look as tho you had been rolling in an ash-heap."

"The sleeve of your jacket is half torn out and your collar is hanging," said Miss Julia.

"Hello, Tom, what's the matter with your eyes?" said Will. "They don't match; one's blue and the other's black."

"Sullivan's nothing to you, Tom," said Bert. "You're a regular fighting phenomenon."

"Tom, dear, I hope you haven't been fighting again," said Mrs. Burton.

"Yes, I have, Mother," said Tom. "The fellows won't let me alone, and I won't stand being called Carrot-top by any one."

"Nonsense!" said Miss Julia. "What harm does the name do you?"

"A rose by any other name," quoted literary Bert.

"The boys are only in fun," said Miss Clara.

"And your hair is red, Tom," said Will, eying the said hair critically, with the air of having his attention called to it for the first time.

"You should try not to give way to anger about such a trifle, dear," said Mrs. Burton.

of Mr. Punch, and other suggestive objects.

Tom and Annie were in the highest spirits as they sat side by side, writing and numbering the remarks and jokes—"missiles," as they agreed to call them. Annie's shyness was quite forgotton, her black eyes shone, and she was full of animation. Bedtime came before the stock of "missiles" was exhausted.

The next day Mrs. Burton again suggested Annie's going to school, and she made no objection. Annie was very much liked by teachers and pupils, and she was much less shy than usual; for, if she did not succeed in forgetting her unfortunate nose, she was cheered by the thought that any remarks made upon it would swell the number recorded in her blank-book, and she was becoming very anxious to excel Tom in this regard. Annie thought that her being a stranger gave Tom an unfair advantage; but Tom said that was balanced by the fact that "the fellows knew he would thrash any one that spoke of his hair." Tom did not know that it was his very rage at such allusions that tempted the boys to make them. Before long his old enemy, Sam Whitney, returned to the charge.

"Hello, Woodpecker," he called out to Tom, "I wish you'd get your hair cut. If you don't I'll have to get a pair of green goggles to wear if you are going to sit in front of me.

"Get them then," said Tom saying to himself, with a feeling of satisfaction, "That makes 107." Sam was surprised at Tom's coolness, and kept on with speeches intended to be provoking, which Tom quietly recorded in his book, bringing his number up to 112. Tom and Annie had agreed that a joke repeated should count the same as a new one, Annie sagely remarking that old jokes were the most provoking of all.

After a time so many such que tions arose that at Will's suggestion they made up a set of rules, and formed themselves into a secret society of two members, each wearing a badge, on whith was inscribed the mystic letters P. R. A. J. S., signifing "Personal Remarks and Jokes Society." They each carried a little notebook, in which they made notes in a kind of short-hand of their own invention, to be afterward copied into the larger book. Of course, these badges and note-books excited the curiosity of the other pupils, but Tom and Annie could not be persuaded to divulge their meaning, till, one day, Annie said:

"Tom, I feel very sorry for Cornie Scott. She is a dear girl, but she is rather stout, and some of the girls make fun of her. Cornie never gets angry, but I found her crying to-day, because Ida Loring called her a porpoise. Suppose we invite her to join our Society?"

"Agreed," said Tom, "if you will let me invite Ned Warren. He's a good fellow, but some of the boys laugh at him, because he's cross-eyed.

The Society, thus enlarged to include four members, began to hold regular meetings, at which each member was addressed by a name that had been originally bestowed in derision. Annie was Sword-fish, Tom, Woodpecker, Ned was known as Bat, while Cornie cheerfully responded to the title of Porpoise. Each had a book, modeled after those originally made by Tom and Annie, and diligently collected "missiles," tho it was soon evident Cornie's would exceed all the others, her list growing at a wonderful rate. The Society grew more and more to be a social club, and was soon jointed by Charley Gibson, a freckled boy, enrolled as Leopard, and Emma Davis, a tall, thin miss, who meekly bore the title of Giraffe.

The P. R. A. J. Society was kept up during the whole of Annie's stay, and it proved more useful than many societies more pretentious.

HOME OF THE WHITE ANTS.

A Pillar of Clay About Five Feet High, with a Complicated Interior.

A letter from Australia says: "Upon the brow of a small rounded eminence there stood a sort of pillar of clay about five feet high, which had once filled up the center of a hollow tree, the shell of which had been, from time to time, broken and burned away. This pillar was the work of white ants. As it interfered with the working of the plow, I commenced breaking and digging it down, not without some difficulty.

"The clay, which was surprisingly stiff, hard, and dry, broke off in large fragments. At length, near the level of the surface of the ground, a rounded crust was uncovered, looking like the crown of a dome. On breaking through this the whole city of the ants was laid bare—a wonderful mass of cells, pillars, chambers, and passages. The spade sunk perhaps two feet among the crisp and crackling ruins, which seemed formed either of the excavated remnant of the tree or a thin, shell-like cement of clay.

"The arrangement of the interior was singular. The central part had the appearance of innumerable small branching pillars, like the minutest stalactitic productions. Towards the outer part the materials assumed the appearance of thin laminae, about half the thickness of a wafer, but most ingeniously disposed in the shape of low elliptic arches, so placed that the center of the arch below formed the resting place for the abutment of the arch above.

"These abutments again formed sloping platforms for ascent to the higher apartments. In other places I thought I could discern spiral ascents not unlike geometrical staircases.

"The whole formed such an ingenious specimen of complicated architecture and such an endless labyrinth of intricate passages as could bid defiance to art and to Ariadne's clew. But even the affairs of ants are subject to mutation. The great city was deserted—a few loiterers alone remained to tell to what race it had formerly belonged. Their great storehouse had become exhausted—even the very roots had been laid under contribution, till at last its myriads of inhabitants had emigrated to begin anew their operations in some other soil."

Eel Skins for Rheumatism.

A reporter the other day paid a visit to Billingsgate and made some inquiries. One of the largest eel dealers in the great London fish market gave some interesting information on the subject.

"Well," he said, "I know of numbers of cases in which they have been used with complete success. They are stretched on a board and dried; then to make them pliant they are slightly moistened and tied around the suffering limb. They are worn as garters, anklets, bracelets and armlets. They are even worn around the waist—next to the skin, of course—for lumbago and sciatica. Hundreds of cabmen wear them and swear by them; and I have a number of gentleman customers in the country who ask me to send them eel skins to give away to the poor people of their districts. Persons who have once worn them will never be without them if they can help it. But I cannot tell you what medicinal property they possess; perhaps after all it is only warmth for of course they must form an almost air-tight bandage, like a piece of gutta percha or goldbeater's skin. Perhaps it is only fancy, and that goes a very long way, as you probably know. Why, I have heard that a skein of silk tied round the waist will cure lumbago, or round the knee will cure rheumatism in the leg. Now aying the said hair critically, with the air of having his attention called to it for the first time.

"You should try not to give way to anger about such a trifle, dear," said Mrs. Burton. "You should cultivate a forgiving spirit."

"This fighting must stop, sir," said Mr. Burton, sternly. "Don't let me hear any more of it."

Then, to the utter astonishment of every one, another voice was heard, and Annie Graham spoke, voluntarily, for the first time since she had entered the house. She spoke in a clear, rather high pitched, slightly plaintive voice, that gave distinctness to every word.

"I know just how you feel about your hair, Tom, for it is just the way I have felt a great many times."

Every one was amazed: even Mr. Burton laid down his paper when Annie spoke, and every eye was fixed upon her. Tom was as surprised as the others, but he said:

"How can you know anything about it, Annie?" with an appreciative glance at Annie's dark curls. "Your hair isn't red."

"No," said Annie, solemnly, "it's my nose."

"Why, that isn't red, either," said Will, laughing.

"No," said Annie, in the same clear, plaintive voice, "but it's so large. It is dreadful to have such a nose; it seems to cast a shadow over my whole existence." Will opened his mouth, seeing a chance for another joke, but, at a sign from his mother, he shut it again, and Annie continued:

"I think a large nose is even more trying than red hair, for you can dye your hair, or cut it off and wear a wig, or it may turn gray; but a large nose can never possibly grow smaller, and, as you grow older, it will look even larger. I never can forget my nose. It has been laughed at ever since I was a little, tiny girl, and every one that saw me would say: 'What a large nose that child has!' The girls at school laugh at it, and one of them was angry at me, and nicknamed me 'Sword-fish,' and the others took it up. I dread to go to a new place. I dreaded even to come to see you, and go to school here, on account of my nose."

Annie paused, and Tom, whose own trials had taught him something in regard to personal sensitiveness, said:

"I don't think your nose is bad-looking at all, Annie; and, even if it were a great deal larger than it is, it couldn't be so bad as my red hair, for it doesn't give a chance for so many jokes. After any one has said it is large they can't say any more."

"Oh, you do not know," said Annie, "the number of jokes that can be made on a large nose. I believe they would fill a volume."

"Those on my hair would fill a whole set of volumes," said Tom.

"Suppose you put the matter to the test," said Will. "Each of you take a blank-book, and write in it all the personal remarks and jokes you can recall, and see which has the most."

"Agreed," said Tom. "I'll bet I'll get the most."

"And I feel sure that I will," said Annie; "but we will try."

By the time evening came Tom and Annie had each a blank book in readiness. Miss Clara helped to make them, and they were very pretty. The covers were of stiff, cream colored paper. On Tom's was painted a boy's head, crowned by a carrot of brilliant orange, while around the edge ran a fantastic border of poppies, torches, flamingoes, comets, and other objects of sanguinary hue. On the cover of Annie's book was a swordfish, and the border was made up of elephant's trunks, crane's bills, heads [illegible] of Giraffe.

The P. R. A. J. Society was kept up during the whole of Annie's stay, and it proved more useful than many societies more pretentious.

When it came time for Annie to return home, there was general regret at her departure.

"We shall miss you very much, my dear," said Mrs. Burton. "You have been like a little sunbeam in the house. I hardly thought that would be so when you first came to us, a little maiden all forlorn."

"We had only to wait till the ice was broken," said Miss Clara.

"And I think," said Annie, laughing, "it was my big nose that broke the ice."

"Or my red hair," said Tom.

"Your hair may have melted it," said Will.

And Tom never winced, but only thought: "Another joke! That makes 253!"—[N. Y. Independent.

Plain Talk.

With its habitual ignorance of all subjects requiring work and study, the Rochester "Democrat" (Rep.) says that for 140 years previous to the sale of Alaska to the United States "Russia enjoyed undisputed sovereignty over the waters of Behring Sea." Read what Secretary Adams wrote on the 22nd July, 1823, to our Minister in St. Petersburg in regard to Russia's claims to exclusive control of Behring Sea:—"The United States can admit no part of these claims. Their right of navigation and of fishery is perfect, and has been in constant exercise from the earliest times after the peace of 1783." How the "Democrat's" greatest statesman on earth will get Great Britain to acknowledge what we disputed so emphatically, no one can tell; but if Mr. Blaine should engage in any such tremendous undertaking, we can readily imagine what kind of a hole he will leave his organ in.—[New York Post.

Culture in the West

A teacher who had asked a girl to purchase a grammar received the following note from the little girl's mother:

"I do not desire that Mattie shall ingage in grammer, as I prefer her to ingage in more yousful studies and can learn her to speak and write proper myself. I went through two grammars, and I can't say as they done me no good—I prefer Mattie to ingage in German and drawing and vokal music on the piano."

Tea is so little an article of necessity in France that the total consumption in 1888 for 38,000,000 of inhabitants was only a little over 1,000,000 lb., the greater part of which was probably consumed by English, American, and Russian visitors and residents. The average per head of the population was 13½ grammes, or less than half an ounce. The use of tea, instead of increasing, is diminishing, as the average per head was 14½ grammes in 1886 and 1887. Coffee, on the other hand, increases in favour, and the consumption has more than quadrupled since 1841, and nearly doubled since 1861. It reached its maximum of 136,000,000 lb. in 1886, and was 134,000,000 lb., or more than 3½ lb. per head, in 1888.

Life on a Cuban Plantation.

In Dakota and Manitoba the employment on single wheat estates of a hundred reapers and an aggregate of three hundred laborers for a season has been regarded as something unprecedented in agricultural industry; but on one sugar estate in Cuba—"El Balboa"—from fifteen hundred to two thousand hands, invariably negroes, are employed, who work under severe discipline, in watches or relays, during the grinding season, by day and night, the same as in the large iron-mills and furnaces of the United States and Europe. At the same time there are few village communities where a like number of people experience the same care and surveillance. The male workers occupy quarters walled and barricaded from the women, and the women from the men. There are in all villages an infirmary, a lying-in hospital, a physician, an apothecary, a chapel, and priest. At night and morning mass is said in chapel, and the crowds are always large. There is of a Sunday less restraint, though ceaseless espionage is never remitted. On these days and in parts of holidays there are rude mirth, ruder music, and much dancing. This picture is given somewhat in detail, because it illustrates how all-pervading and tremendous are the forces that are modifying society everywhere, in civilized, partially civilized, and even barbarous countries, conjointly with the new conditions of production and consumption.—[Popular Science Monthly.

"The Imperial Bagman."

Emperor William of Germany well deserves the name of "The Imperial Bagman," given to him by London humorists. Hurrying from the naval review at Spithead, he immediately appeared conducting the sham fight at Spandau for the entertainment of the Emperor of Austria. The most interesting feature of this display was the use of the new smokeless powder which is the latest invention relied upon to increase the efficiency of small arms. Wherever William the German sovereign goes it is not the people of the country that he visits or peaceful institutions that he inspects. It is the army or the navy that he is everywhere anxious to see, in his eagerness not to keep the peace, but to study the most approved methods of making war. The essentially military character of European monarchies is a fearful feature in present civilization, and the Emperor William seems to be the very incarnation of restless warlike rule. How different was the course of his father, "Frederick the Noble," in observing foreign lands! But the spirit of Frederick has died with him, and dragoonism dominates the Empire he sought to lead in the paths of peace. That general harmony cannot long be reserved during the strain of the rivalry between nations in warlike equipment and construction, is certain. European powers must inevitably soon fight or disarm, and the ascendency of the element typified by Germany's young Emperor does not tend toward disarmament.

Time for Action.

CHINESE AND THEIR WAYS.

They Know Better Than Any Other People What Economy Means.

The Chinese are preeminently economical, whether it be in limiting the number of wants, in preventing waste, or in adjusting forces in such a manner as to make a little represent a great deal. The universal diet consists of rice, beans, millet, garden vegetables, and fish, with a little meat on high festivals. Wholesome food in abundance may be supplied at less than a penny a day for each adult, and even in famine times thousands of persons have been kept alive for months on about a halfpenny a day each. This implies the existence of a high degree of culinary skill in the Chinese. Their modes of preparing food are thorough and various. There is no waste; everything is made to do as much duty as possible. What is left is the veriest trifle. The physical condition of the Chinese dog or cat, who has to live on the leavings of the family, shows this. They are clearly kept on starvation allowances.

The Chinese are not extremely fastidious in regard to food; all is fish that comes to their net, and most things come there sooner or later.

CERTAIN DISTURBANCES

of the human organization, due to eating diseased meat, are well recognized among the people, but it is considered better to eat the meat the cheapness of which is certain, and run the risk of the consequences, which are not quite certain, than to buy dear meat even with the assurance of no evil results. Indeed, the meat of animals which have died of ordinary ailments is rather dearer than that of those which have died in an epidemic such as pleuro-pneumonia. Another example of careful, calculating economy is the construction of the cooking pots and boilers, the bottoms of which are as thin as possible that the contents may boil all the sooner, for fuel is scarce and dear, and consists generally of nothing but the stalks and roots of the crops, which make a rapid blaze and disappear. The business of gathering fuel is committed to children, for one who can do nothing else can at least pick up straws and leaves and weeds. In autumn and winter a vast army of fuel gatherers spread over the land. Boys ascend trees and beat them with clubs to shake all the leaves; the very straws get no time to show which way the wind blows before they are annexed by some collector.

Similarly professional manure collectors swarm over all the roads of the country. Chinese women carry this minute economy into their dress.

NOTHING COMES AMISS TO THEM;

if it is not used in one place it is in another, where it appears as a thing of beauty. Foreign residents who give their cast-off clothes to Chinese may be assured the career of usefulness of these garments is at last about to commence. Chinese wheelbarrows squeak for want of a few drops of oil, but to people who have no nerves the squeak is cheaper than the oil. Similarly dirt is cheaper than hot water, and so, as a rule, the people do not wash. The motto, "Cheaper than dirt," which the soap dealer puts in his windows, could not be made intelligible to the Chinese. To them the average foreigners are mere soap wasters.

Scarcely any tool can be got ready made, it is so much cheaper to buy the parts and put them together for yourself, and as almost everybody takes this view, ready made tools are not to be got. Two rooms are dimly lighted with a single lamp deftly placed in a hole in the dividing wall. Chinese, seem to be capable of doing anything by means of almost nothing. They will give you an iron foundry on a minute scale of completeness in a back

A Love Romance of Royalty.

The Princess Dagmar, before she became the wife of the Czar and relinquished her own name in favor of that of Marie Feodorovna, has also had her girlish romance: "She was engaged to his elder brother, the Czarevitch, a tall, handsome man, with fine clear-cut features, closely resembling his beautiful mother, and she loved him with all the fervor of a young ardent heart. In 1865, at Nice, the Grand Duke Nicholas fell from his horse and was so badly injured that his life was despaired of. His fiance hastened to him, and never left his side till he breathed his last. The succession to the throne devolved upon the Grand Duke Alexander. He stood by the deathbed of the Czarevitch, who, in presence of the Emperor and Empress, placed the hand of the weeping Dagmar into his, saying to her with almost his last words: 'Marry my brother; he is true as crystal, and I wish it.' Enforced by political reasons, this bequest was law to the bereaved girl.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the forumla of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nerveus Debillty and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. —R. H. Potter attended the Picton fair and was one of the successful ones with stock as usual.

—Mayor Carscallen has been playing the "Tory brother" in great style this week and has been exhibiting himself in anything but a creditable manner. It seems that one Frank Judd has been employed by the corporation in enforcing the dog by-law. In the discharge of his duty he captured and impounded the dog of one Charles Bartlett. This man Bartlett figures as something of a pugilist, having been fined a few months ago for an attack on Mr. Vanluven. Bartlett met Judd on the market square on Wednesday morning and gave him a severe beating, kicking and striking the poor man in a shameful manner. Judd sought redress from the Mayor; but as Bartlett is a good Tory, it would not do to offend him, so poor Judd was put off on various pretexts. He then went to the Police Magistrate and laid an information against Bartlett for an assault. The case was to have been tried yesterday afternoon at four o'clock, but Bartlett, after trying to get the matter settled, went to Judd and told him that the Mayor wanted to see him down at his office. It was then nearly four o'clock. Judd went down to Carscallen's office and was kept there on various pretexts until Bartlett had been before the Police Magistrate and had the case dismissed because of the non-appearance of the complainant. Instead of protecting a corporation official in the discharge of his duty, the Mayor lends himself to screen a guilty party. It is not a very comforting thought that we have as a chief magistrate a man who will lend himself to such a piece of business. We believe that there has been a shameful miscarriage of justice in this matter.

School Board Meeting.

The School Board met in the council room Tuesday Sept 10th. Members all present except Messrs. Fralick, Preston and Templeton.

Minutes of previous meeting read and confirmed.

A communication from Education department received, advising the payment of $4 for matriculation fees.

A communication from Provincial Treasurer's Department enclosing check for $469 half year grant to High school.

The committee on buildings, recommend the removal of the folding doors in the room on the right side of the hall in the High school building, and the re-adjustment of the seats, in order to afford more accommodation. Adopted.

The committee reported that they had engaged Mr. Long as teacher in the High school at a salary of $800 per annum.

A number of accounts were passed and ordered to be paid.

Died of Grief.

It is our sad duty to record the death of Mrs. Ellen Campbell McHenry, widow of Alexander McHenry, which sad event took place last Saturday evening at her late residence in this town. On the 1st September her son, Prof. Donald C. McHenry, died at Niagara-on-the-Lake, and his remains were brought here and placed in the Napanee cemetery on the 3d of the month. The shock was more than the grief-stricken mother could bear, and on Saturday evening 7th September, she quietly yielded up her spirit to join the loved ones who had preceded her to a world where sorrow is unknown.

Donald, whom she loved as only a mother can, was gone, life seemed to have lost all charms for her, and she died; literally of a broken heart, in the seventh-eighth year

—Just look at the label on your paper and see if you are in arrears for THE EXPRESS. If you owe us anything please pay up at once.

—Quite a number of Napaneeans went to Picton on Tuesday expecting to return by the evening boat. For some inexplicable reason the Rathbun Co'y cancelled the boat so that many were seriously inconvenienced.

—If you want a jolly time go to the Harvest Home excursion to Kingston and Alexandria Bay, per steamer Hero, to-morrow. Tickets only fifty cents. Boat calls at Deseronto, Adolphustown, Bath and other Bay ports if flagged.

—On Sunday morning next, Rev. S. Card will occupy the pulpit of the Western Methodist church; subject "The True relation of a converted person to God and to Heaven." Service at 10·45 a.m. In the evening Rev. J. B. Clarkson will conduct the service.

—W. D. Madden is the only authorized agent of the C. P. R. in Napanee and if you are going to Manitoba, British Columbia or in fact any point on the C. P. R. you will find a great advantage if you purchase tickets from the authorized agent. Call or write to W. D. Madden for maps, folders and all reliable information. adv.

—Word has been received of the death of William Henry Hayes at Seattle, Washington Territory. Deceased was a nephew of William Hayes of this town and lived with him for many years. He married a Miss Norris of Napanee and she survives him. Deceased also leaves a mother, Mrs. James Burns, of Syracuse, N. Y. to mourn his loss.

—The improved Pease Furnace has a larger heating capacity than any other warm air furnace invented. The fire pots are heavier than those of any other. the Prairie Province.

—Fred Freeman went back his name by indulging in tangle leg. He started out with the idea that being a freeman he could not be enslaved, but alas for the frailty of human nature, he found that a freeman cannot fool with forty rod dead shot, without Jerry getting on his track and making him another kind of a man.

—Francis Martin is in gaol here awaiting trial at next week's assizes, on two charges of rape. Messrs. Herrington and Warner have been retained to defend him. We have been unable to learn particulars, but are told that Martin lives near Tamworth and that he is charged with attempting to outrage his two daughters, aged fifteen and sixteen years respectively.

—The case of Wilson re the Grand Trunk railway has been settled by the company paying Mr. Wilson $1700, each party paying their own cost. We understand that the cases of Vanslyck vs. the G. T. R. and Webster vs. the G. T. R. have also been settled, but don't know the terms. These cases were to have been tried at the assizes next week.

—The Toronto Industrial Fair is now in full blast and is more attractive than ever. On Monday and Wednesday of next week there will be especially low rates on the Grand Trunk and doubtless hundreds will avail themselves of them. The Industrial will not close until the twenty-first of this month and every day next week there will be special features. Canada's Great Fair ought to be visited by everyone.

—Through the efforts of W. D. Madden, the popular ticket agent of the C. P. R. we are able to announce that the Canadian Pacific Railway have consented to send a car load of Northwest products to our fair, the 8th and 9th of October. To visit Napanee it means a lot of work and expense to the Company, but we are sure it will be thoroughly appreciated and enjoyed by our people and hope it will pay the company in the end. One thing certain, we are not slow to appreciate enterprise and push and we will not forget the C. P. R. when the N. T. & Q. reaches Tweed. Ample space has been reserved in the palace for the C. P. R. and we predict that their display will be the attraction at the fair.

—The passengers on the steamer Ella Ross on Wednesday morning had a lively experience while coming up the Bay from Picton. When opposite Thompson's Point the steamer ran quite close to the schooner Hanlan. The schooner was standing in for the Prince Edward shore but suddenly came about, right under the bow of the Ross. Of course a steamer is expected to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel but in this case the wheelsman managed to hit the Hanlan a glancing blow on the quarter, doing her considerable damage. The davit, on which the yawl hangs, crashed through the side of the Ross, completely demolishing one of the staterooms and wrenching one of the heavy irondavits from its position and badly twistingit. The inner wall of the stateroom was forced into the cabin, the door being thrown on the table, at one end of which a number of passengers were eating their breakfast. There was almost a panic on board until the actual amount of damage was ascertained. The yawl of the schooner was badly stove in. The wheelsman of the steamer was clearly at fault, and this lesson ought to convince him, as well as other steamboat men, that it is well to give sailing vessels a wide berth, and not to needlessly endanger the lives of passengers. A number of Napaneeans were on board the Ross, and don't care for a repitition of their experience on Wednesday morning.

Donald, whom she loved as only a mother can, was gone, life seemed to have lost all charms for her, and she died; literally of a broken heart, in the seventh-eighth year of her age.

Mrs. McHenry was the youngest daughter of the late Archibald Campbell, and has always resided in this section. One of the oldest residents of this town informs us that he knew Mrs. McHenry for nearly sixty years, and that she was a member of the Methodist church when he first became acquainted with her.

Mrs. McHenry was a resident of Napanee for many years and was universally loved and respected by all who knew her.

Two daughters, Miss McHenry and Mrs. Alex. Henry, survive to mourn the loss, pernaps the greatest, the loss of a dear, kind mother. The bereaved have the sympathy of the whole community.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1889. VIII, No. 44.

IN MEMORIAM.

The Late James Allen.

We believe that we are safe in saying that there was no one better known in this county than the late James Allen, who died at his home in Napanee on Sunday last, after an illness of several months. The subject of this sketch was born in the township of Ernesttown, near the village of Wilton, on the 7th of May, 1825. The earlier portion of his life was spent on the farm with his parents, and while there he was surrounded with the best of influences, and they made an impression which lasted through life. Arriving at the age of manhood he went to Odessa and engaged in the milling business with the Booth Company. He remained in Odessa but a short time, and then went to Morven, where he remained about twelve years, being engaged in lumbering and jobbing. In 1853 Mr. Allen married Charlotte Johnson, and to them were born six children, only two of whom are left to mourn the loss of a loving father. In 1867 James Allen moved to Napanee, and in the same year was appointed chief of police, a position he retained until his death. Mr. Allen was a conscientious servant of the public, and performed his work well. Possessed as he was of a kindly heart, he dealt leniently with wrongdoers, trying to make them better men instead of crushing them with an iron hand. Deceased was a well known and highly respected member of the Methodist Church, he having connected himself therewith about thirty-five years ago. As class-leader, steward and local preacher he served his church, and always with acceptability. In temperance work his voice was frequently raised, and he was looked upon as one of the most earnest of the advocates of that great moral reform. James Allen was possessed of a great deal of natural ability, and he always regretted that he had not availed himself of his privileges and acquired a better education. He was a good man and was respected by all, by none more than by those who knew him best.

For twenty-two years he faithfully served this town as chief of police, and growing up with the town and knowing all of its history, he was looked upon as an authority on all matters partaining to this municipality. His place will not easily be filled.

Mrs. Allen and two daughters, Emma, the wife of Mr. Williams, of Toronto, and Helen, who resides at home, are left to mourn his loss. They have the sympathy of the entire community in their great affliction. Their sorrow is lessened by the knowledge that he whom they loved died trusting in Christ, and that there is no doubt about his having "gone home" to his reward.

The funeral, on Tuesday afternoon was very largely attended, the town officials, town councillors, firemen, members of the Masonic fraternity and a large number of citizens following the remains to the church and thence to the grave in the Morven cemetery. The body was taken to the Western Methodist church, which was Forestry.

To the Editor of the EXPRESS:

SIR,—The following article from the New York Garden and Forest is of importance to Ontario, as we have made too many errors of a similar nature in clearing. Perhaps you would allow it space in your columns. It is from the pen of one of the best informed writers in the United States.

Yours, etc., C. W. PHIPPS.

Toronto, Sept 27, 1889.

FORESTS AND CIVILIZATION.

We might have had some real forestry here in the State of New York if we had been sufficiently advanced in the art of living; if we had the interest of the public welfare and the perception of our obligation to coming generations, which are necessary to the development and persistence of civilization. The entire Adirondack wilderness should have been held permanently in the possession of the state. Then a real school of forestry could have been established somewhere in the woods, and young men could have been trained in the practice of this art, and they could have been employed in the care of the forests and woodlands of other portions of the country. The whole tract of 8000 square miles was originally heavily wooded. The timber could have been cut off as the trees matured, and, of course, should have been so cut off. Nothing could be more absurd than the notion that trees should never be utilized or removed. Whenever a tree has come to its best it should be cut down, and its wood applied to some useful purpose, so as to obtain its value, and in order to provide for a succession of generations of trees, and thus for the permanent life of the forest.

If the Adirondack forests had been thus intelligently managed and administered they would now have been for a long time yielding an increasing revenue to the people of the state. The whole population would have been greatly benefitted by the reduction of taxation. Every man and woman in the state would have been richer today—would have had more of the means of subsistence and of comfort and happiness than at present. Every child in the state would have been born to a better inheritance, and into more favorable conditions than now. The forests would have been better now than ever before, and they would have gone on increasing in value to the people of the state, with the increasing density of population, and on account of the exhaustion of the timber-supply in regions fit for agriculture.

The Adirondack region is not fit for agriculture. No part of it is suitable for any other than forest-conditions, and these should have been maintained forever. It is indeed impossible to disturb these conditions very extensively, or to remove the forests permanently, without destroying the region itself and annihilating everything that makes it of any value. I doubt if an instance of more obvious and complete adaption of a region to a special and very largely attended, the town officials, town councillors, firemen, members of the Masonic fraternity and a large number of citizens following the remains to the church and thence to the grave in the Morven cemetery. The body was taken to the Western Methodist church, which was appropriately draped in mourning, and a solemn funeral service held, conducted by Rev. S. Card, assisted by Revs. David Wilson, Dr. Gardner and A. B. Chambers. The vast church was thronged and seldom have we seen so many people at a funeral in Napanee. The funeral was under Masonic auspices, the deceased having been a prominent member of that order for many years.

In conclusion we can only say, James Allen was an honest, upright, earnest Christian man, and the respect shown his memory on Tuesday last was well deserved.

Belleville Fair.

Last week several of our enterprising horsemen attended the largest show ever held in the county of Hastings, and as usual returned with spoils of the Egyptians. Below we give a list of some of the winners :

Class 1, Thoroughbred Horses.—Stallion 3 years old and upwards, R. H. Potter's "War Cry," 1st prize ; Stallion any age, R. H. Potter's "War Cry," diploma.

Class 2, Road or Carriage Horses.—Single gelding or mare in harness, over 15½ hands, H. S. Milling ; under 15½ hands, R. H. Potter's "Little Fred" ; Stallion 3 years old, W. H. Hutchison's imported Cleveland Bay "Ingmanthorpe Lad," 1st prize, and for stallions any age, diploma ; Mare or gelding 2 years old, W. H. Hutchison's imported filly "Victoria," 1st prize, and for mare any age, "Victoria" was again victorious. This promising youngster did the same kindness at the Kingston show, and carried off first prize and diploma. We hope Mr. Hutchison will show "Vic" at Toronto next year, where many a worse one has carried off first honors.

Class 4, General purpose Horses.—Stallion 4 years old and over, D. Lucas, 1st and diploma ; 1 year old, Robt. Brisco, 1st ; 3 year old, W. H. Hutchison's imported coach horse, Prince of Orange, 2nd.

Class 5, Heavy Draught Stallion.—4 years old and over, R. H. Potter's "Victor Bell," also "Victor Bell" and 3 of his get ; 3 years old, W. H. Hutchison's shire horse, Melton IV.

In the free for all trotting race Little Tommy captured first place in three straight heats.

In sheep—C. W. Neville, although a good sound Grit, went in for monopoly and carried off all the prizes in the classes in which he exhibited his magnificent sheep and pigs ; in fact not being satisfied with his success in this line, he actually captured the prize horse and part of a buggy, although they belonged to a Tory, and were very much the worse for the escapade around the grounds. We understand the prizes captured by Mr. Neville, leaving out the horse, amounted to the biggest half of a $100. Again we say, come and see all these prize animals at the Lennox show next Tuesday and Wednesday at Napanee, the home of the prize winners of the Bay of Quinte district.

ditions very extensively, or to remove the forests permanently, without destroying the region itself and annihilating everything that makes it of any value. I doubt if an instance of more obvious and complete adaption of a region to a special and particular use can be found in the whole world. Nature made this region for the permanent and everlasting growth of forests, and this sole and exclusive adaption to a most important function should have been recognized.

As I said years ago, if the Adirondack forests could be saved by legislation, one of the best possible measures would be "An Act for the Discouragement of Agriculture in the back woods." The lumber business is not by any means the only destructive agency at work here. Tens of thousands of acres, entirely unfit for any use but forest growth, have been stripped of trees, and by cultivation and pasturage have been rendered incapable of reproducing the only crop for which the land ever had any adaption. It is strange—if anything in human folly is strange—to see so many people persist in the effort to "farm" where the soil is so meagre, and the country is so high and cold, that no profitable return for their labor is possible. This thin film of soil disappears after a few years, leaving only the bare, inert sand or gravel, and as most of the "farming land" here is rolling or hilly, the slopes soon begin to break down and wash away. Great gullies are formed, which grow wider and deeper every year, till vast waterless tracts of shifting sand, or of clay and gravel, varied only by rock-ledges and boulders, stretch before the unhappy traveler where once grew noble forests fed by perennial springs.

The region was meant to be let alone. It has no natural fitness for agriculture. It is pitiful to see the scanty growth of vegetation which the farmers toil produces here cut off by frosts in both spring and autumn and in many places, even in the middle of summer, while in the Southern States of this country there are millions of acres of fertile soil lying untilled beneath most genial skies. The effort to farm these inhospitable lands has also been the source of a huge proporation of the fires which have destroyed so much of the remaining forest. Land is cleared by being burned over, and in a dry time the fire extends from the fallow to the woods, despite the best efforts to keep it within bounds, and it is common saying in the woods that such a conflagration is often a convenient accident for the farmer as he plants corn the next spring in the burned woods without any clearing whatever, and raises a crop in the ashes. A great deal of the "farming land" here has been brought into cultivation in this way. It is all, from beginning to end, a most wasteful and suicidal process, and the inevitable end, the ruin and disappearance of the soil itself, is speedily reached. Man has no power to create a new world. He has not yet learned how to take care of the one which he inherits, but his ability to wreck and exhaust it is very great.

Lord Coventry frequently acts as judge in the principal horse rings of England and is a man of unblemished character, 51 years of age, and married to a daughter of Earl Craven, by whom he has a very numerous family.

A STRANGE LEGACY.

CHAPTER IV.

"You know what your grandmother did to-day, Kate?" her father said calmly.

"She told me she had altered her will, papa, but didn't say how."

"Did she say nothing more about it?"

"She only said that you should never complain that she encouraged me in disobedience. I don't know what she meant, but she told us so."

"Us?" growled Dottleson. "Who else heard her say so?

"Dr Lakeworth was there, papa."

"He knows all about it," father.

"I was in granny's room all the time he was there, but she didn't mention it to him at all."

"I daresay not. But mark my words, Kate: there's a very good understanding between your grandmother and Mr. Lakeworth."

Kate did not feel called upon to make any reply, and Mr. Dottleson resumed. "Since Sir Alfred took upon himself to place Mrs Lamshed in this fellow's hands, I can't prohibit his coming here; but when your grandmother has gone, he will never see the inside of my house again."

He had not considered that his daughter would not be aware of the old lady's condition, and only sought to impress upon her that she must dismiss Charles Lakeworth from her thoughts.

"I hope there is time enough to think about that, then, papa.'

"A few days, I believe. Sir Alfred gives her until the end of the week. To-day's Wednesday."

His rage and disappointment had made him utterly callous, and his daughter heard him with a feeling of repulsion she had never known before. He left her before she fully realized the meaning of his words, and when it came home to her, she forgot all else in the blow which had fallen upon her. It would be a terrible loss to her. Mrs. Lamshed had done much to replace the mother who had been taken from her in her infancy, and Mr. Dottleson, for ever absorbed in the cares of business, had sadly neglected his duty as a father. Now the fiat had gone orth: she was to be deprived of her best friend and her lover in a few days. She could not save the first; but Kate made up her mind there and then about the second: no power on earth could separate them without Charles Lakeworth's consent, and she knew that it was not likely to be given. She would say nothing to her father for the present; it would only increase his troubles; and though she was far from feeling any sympathy with him she shrank from adding fuel to the fire which blazed so fiercely already.

Thursday morning broke wet and windy. Mrs Lamshed was visibly sinking, and Kate could not hide from herself that even the brief span of life given by Sir Alfred was likely to be too long. Charles Lakeworth came in early, and his first glance at Kate showed him that she knew the truth.

"Who told you?' he asked in a whisper.

"Papa did, last night," she answered.

The old lady, who had been lying half asleep, was roused by his appearance at the bedside, and made an effort to sit up. Kate understood her movement; and with Lakeworth's assistance made her comfortable with pillows in the position she seemed to desire. She remained silent for a few minutes, as though endeavouring to remember something she wanted to say, and at last spoke: "Call your father, Kate."

Mr. Dottleson's strident voice was audible in the passage below, demanding the immediate presence of his daughter. Kate went to the door and called him. He came up, and even while he did so the end came. Mrs. Lamshed's hand slid gently from those on which it rested, and the eyes which were watching him so eagerly grew fixed and dull. It was all over—she was dead.

The rain beat fiercely upon the window, and the autumn wind moaned through the leafless branches in the square outside. Within, the three stood mutely round the bed, unwilling to disturb the stillness which had last been broken by the voice they were never to hear again. Presently, Mr. Dottleson drew himself up and softly left the room. The real character of the man asserted itself when he was once more alone. "Just in time," he murmured in a whisper which had a tinge of awe in it—"just in time." Had Mrs. Lamshed lived only five minutes longer, she would have heard his promise to let his daughter marry Charles Lakeworth as soon as he was satisfied that the income derived from his profession was sufficient to support a wife. Having before him the dread of Dr. Lakeworth inheriting Mrs. Lamshed's money, he was determined that his own loss should not be the means of removing his objection. However, fate ordained that he should be unfettered by any such promise, and he assured himself that it would be long before consent was wrung from him, now that he could forbid Charles Lakeworth the house without consulting the feelings of any one else. Kate's did not count—she was barely twenty, and could not be expected to know her own mind yet. At all events, he knew what was best for her, and would exercise his own discretion in a matter so vitally important to her well-being.

"I won't disturb them now," he reflected cynically; "they know that the farewell they say to day will be a long one; and Kate, no doubt, is a good deal upset by her grandmother's death."

He saw neither his daughter nor her lover again that day, though the latter remained in the house until dark. Had opportunity offered, he would have told the young man what his decision was, and have ordered him to cease all intercourse with Kate from that day forth; but his mind was too full of speculations as to the provisions of Mrs. Lamshed's last will, and he was disinclined to go out of his way to add a fresh element of trouble to that which already reigned in the house.

Time dragged slowly by until Monday, when the funeral took place, and Mr. Reginald Slimp arrived for the purpose of acquainting Mr. Dottleson with the contents of the document he had prepared on the preceding Wednesday, under Mrs. Lamshed's instructions. It would be hard to say whether astonishment or delight was predominant in Mr. Dottleson's mind when he read the will. His mother-in-law had left her property in trust to himself until the day his daughter Kate should marry with his consent, when it was to be made over to her; the income derived therefrom being set apart for his sole use and behoof until that event should take place. Should Kate marry during her father's lifetime without first obtaining his permission, her wedding day was to be signalised by the transfer of her grandmother's money to the Central Asia Missonary Society, to be devoted to such purposes as the administrators of that institution should see fit. Mr. Slimp was the sole executor.

Foreign Missions were Mr Dottleson's special antipathy, and Mrs Lamshed had borne this in mind when she dictated her will. When in the heat of the moment she ordered the solicitor to be sent for, she contemplated making a far more radical write a long passionate letter to Charles, telling him the substance of the conversation she had just had with her father, and begging him to name a place where they could meet.

"If I'm not to see him here, I'll see him somewhere else," thought Kate as she laid down her pen. "Papa isn't likely to throw away a thousand a year when he sees I'm determined to marry him."

"She'll soon get over it,' mused papa as he climbed into the City omnibus that morning. "She isn't likely to throw away a thousand a year in hard cash, when she understands that I have made up my mind."

Kate was so thoroughly satisfied with the soundness of her reasoning, that she troubled herself much less about her father's prohibition than he anticipated, whilst he felt that it needed little vigilance to protect so strong a position as that which he now held.

He therefore decided that he would carefully abstain from referring to the matter at all for the future. He knew that his orders regarding Dr. Lakeworth's exclusion from the house would be obeyed, and though he had passing doubts as to whether that would put a stop to the young people's friendship, he thought it best not to draw the reins too tight all at once. Time would complete what he had begun, and harsh treatment might drive Kate into something foolish.

So he remained in happy ignorance of the fact that his daughter and Charles Lakeworth made a practice of meeting regularly at the lodging occupied by a Miss Amelia Mumbole, who was proud to call the young doctor her nephew, and would do anything for him that he chose to ask. When Miss Dottleson's letter telling him that the servants had been directed not to let him in when he called, and asking if he had any relation or friend at whose house they could meet reached him, he put on his hat and went straight to his aunt Amelia in Barton Terrace. Miss Mumbole gladly welcomed the chance of taking part in anything which would give a little interest to the monotonous humdrum life she led, and her sitting-room thus at once placed at her nephew's disposal whenever he might want it. The tryst was thoughtfully provided was in very frequent requisition; and one afternoon about three weeks after Mr. Dottleson had closed his door to Charles Lakeworth, it witnessed a meeting which requires some notice from us. The two were sitting over the fire, and the considerate Miss Mumbole reclined on the sofa as far away as possible absorbed in the pages of the "Queen."

"Has your father said nothing about me yet?" asked Charles. It was a question he put as often as he saw Kate Dottleson.

"Not a word. He has never mentioned your name since the day I told you of."

"What do you think it means?"

"I suppose he imagines that I've forgotten you," laughed Kate.

"We can't go on like this forever, you know; my work is gradually increasing, and for your sake I must push on."

"I don't intend to go on this way any longer, Charley. I'll make one more attempt to get papa's leave, and if that fails, I have thought of a plan to make him give it."

"How will you manage that?"

"I'll tell you to-morrow. I can't say for certain that it will succeed, but we must try."

They parted soon afterwards, and Kate went home to Blakewood Square. She had no hope of obtaining Mr. Dottleson's sanction by begging, and her mind was full of the scheme by which it was to be wrested from him.

She remained silent for a few minutes, as though endeavouring to remember something she wanted to say, and at last spoke: "Call your father, Kate."

Mr. Dottleson's strident voice was audible in the passage below, demanding the immediate production of his umbrella; he was just on the point of leaving for business, and Kate lost no time in running down to him. "Papa, wait a minute. Granny has just asked for you."

"I'll see her this evening; I'm late as it is."

"But, father, please come now; it may be too late this evening."

Mr. Dottleson threw down his hat, and followed his daughter up-stairs, muttering something about "morbid nervousness." He was smarting sorely under the recollection of yesterday, and had not intended to pay more attention to his mother-in-law than common decency demanded of him. His manner softened when he entered the from and he took his stand at the foot of the bed, for he saw in her face that she would not detain him long. He spoke as gently as he could; he tried to forget his wrongs for the time, knowing that he was in the presence of Death.

"What can I do for you?" he asked.

Mrs Lamshed did not answer at once; she took Charles Lakeworth's hand in hers and reached with the other for Kate's to place within it as they stood, one on either side of the bed; then laying her own upon them, she raised her eyes to meet those of her son-in-law. "Promise," she said earnestly.

All Mr. Dottleson's angry disappointment rushed upon him with uncontrollable power as he grasped her meaning, and the group waited for him to reply. He turned sharply and strode over to the window, whilst the three maintained their position, watching him in silence. He stared steadily out on the dreary square, hardly conscious that he saw anything, engulfed as he was in the storm of conflicting passions which the appeal had roused. What was he to say? He had been taken at a disadvantage, and would not thus be tricked into giving way; he would not make a promise he must regret for the rest of his life to sooth the last hours of one who had treated him so maliciously as Mrs. Lamshed. But even in his voiceless rage there awoke within him a feeling of something like envy as he saw the mighty difference between his own narrow-minded sordid nature and that of the dying woman, whose last breath was spent in pleading for the happiness of those she loved. He recalled the time, twenty years ago, when, as a struggling, poverty-stricken clerk, he married Dorothy Lamshed, against the wishes and advice of her parents. Her mother had opposed the union firmly; but when it had taken place in spite of her, she never turned her back upon them in time of need. Then came the days of his success in the world, when Mrs. Lamshed had acknowledge dher shortsightedness, and made him her heir after Dorothy died. The leading points in his life, in which his wife's mother had borne a part, passed rapidly through his mind, and upon no single act of hers could he lay a reproachful finger, saying, "This was unjust," or even "This was unkind." would such a woman have so changed towards him at the eleventh hour? Were she suspicions as to the doings of yesterday wrong, after all? He stole a look round: Charles and Kate still bent across the old ady with hands clasped beneath hers, whilst she looked at him in dumb appealing patience. He would grant this last prayer of hers, almost the only one she had ever made, but under conditions. Obstinate pride, if nothing else, forbade his giving free consent to the marriage after he had declared it to be impossible; he owed it to himself. He came back to his station at the foot of the bed and collected himself to speak but special antipathy, and Mrs Lamshed had borne this in mind when she dictated her will. When in the heat of the moment she ordered the solicitor to be sent for, she contemplated making a far more radical change in its terms than she afterwards thought would be either just or prudent. She had intended to strike out Mr Dottleson's name, and leave all she had unconditionally to Kate; but she reflected that her son-in-law's conduct hardly merited such treatment as this, and that, moreover, such a step would place him in direct conflict with his only child, by enabling her to defy his authority. Firm in the conviction that her grand-daughter and Charles Lakeworth would remain true to one another, she trusted to Mr. Dottleson's better nature to yield to their wishes in time. When he saw that the two were bent upon marriage, it was hardly likely that he would continue his opposition, particularly if the total loss of the estate to the family were made the penalty of discountenance. Her aim was to compel his sanction to a union she had set her heart upon bringing about, and, as we have seen, she was called away in the very act of trying to obtain it.

Mr. Dottleson lost little time in placing his veto on Charles Lakeworth's visits after Mrs. Lamshed's death. To give him his due, he went about the business with less bluster than might have been expected, for his mother-in-law's will had given him an agreeable surprise, and it made him generous. To use his own expression, he held all the trumps, and could afford to play his hand easily. He took Kate to book first, and with all the delicacy he could command—it was not much—pointed out that as her lover was not just such a man as he could conscientiously approve of, he must request her to give up all communication with him. The attack was a failure. Kate firmly but respectfully declined to throw over the man to whom she had given her promise. Mr. Dottleson reminded her that she had no right to make any engagement without obtaining his sanction. Kate admitted that there was truth in this; but called his attention to the fact that he had given Charles Lakeworth permission to come to the house when he declared his attachment, and had never withdrawn it. If that did not justify her action in promising to marry him, she couldn't help it now; she had given her word, and intended to keep it.

Mr. Dottleson, very majestically, would be glad to know what she proposod to do. Kate candidly admitted that she proposed to ally herself with Charley as soon as he was in a position to make her his wife, and hoped that her father would not withhold his consent. Mr. Dottleson hastened to assure her that he would never permit his child to marry a man who has revealed such a character as Dr. Lakeworth in his paltry attempt to impose upon poor Mrs. Lamshed. Kate hotly repudiated the insinuation, and any one's right to make it.

Mr. Dottleson's knowledge of the world compelled him to adhere to his opinion, and he capped this remark by hinting that when Dr. Lakeworth was made acquainted with his objections and the terms of Mrs. Lamshed's will, his affection for Kate would probably cool down. Miss Dottleson, who inherited a small share of her father's temper, retorted angrily, that if he thought that, there was no necessity for him to keep them apart.

Mr. Dottleson smiled a smile of superior wisdom, and brought the discussion to a close by telling his daughter that he preferred to be on the safe side, and must therefore forbid Dr. Lakeworth's visit to Blakewood Square.

To that, Kate had nothing to say; she could not dispute any orders her father pleased to give in his own house, however deeply they affected her. She shrugged her shoulders, and left the library in silence, to the scheme by which it was to be wrested from him.

Trifles.

"Moments make the year, and trifles life."

It w s only a little word
Spoken to one in pain,
Yet sweet as the song of bird
It returned again and again.

It was only a few simple flowers
Touched with the breath of spring,
Yet they whispered of sunshine and showers,
Of new life on the wing

It was only a tender caress,
A touch of peace and calm,
Yet upon a soul's distress
It fell like healing balm.

It was only a gentle letter,
From out the heart of a friend,
Yet all the hours grew sweeter
That the message had been penned.

It was only a warbling note
Erom one of God's sweet birds,
A little earth breasted blue-coat
Singing his songs without words.

It was only some soft fleecy clouds,
White as the wings of a dove,
Slowly sailing in crowds
O'er the infinite blue above.

It was only a sentence or two
From the page of a favorite book,
Yet all the long day through,
A heart fresh courage took.

It was only—so on and on,
For life is a chain of rings,
And earth's purest pleasures are won
By heeding the little things.

Mrs. Mushroom—No; I heard "Tristan," but I left just a few days before they done "Isolde."

Thomas A. Edison, in a recent talk about his phonograph, said: For seven months I worked from 18 to 20 hours a day upon the single sound "specia." I would say to the instrument "specia," and it would always say "pecia," and I couldn't make it say anything else. It was enough to make me crazy. But I stuck to it until I succeeded, and now you can read a thousand words of a newspaper at the rate of 150 words a minute, and the instrument will repeat them to you without an omission. You can imagine the difficulty of the task that I accomplished when I tell you that the impressions made upon the cylinder are not more than one-millionth part of an inch in depth, and are completely invisible, even with the aid of a microscope.

HEALTH.

September Weather.

The "unhealthiness" of September weather is proverbial. The cold nights, succeeded as they are by sultry days, the miasma arising from the decaying vegetation of summer, all tend to make this an unhealthy month, and one when disorders of the stomach are especially prevalent. This month the housewife must watch with renewed vigilance her cellar and sinks to see if any neglected corner may not contain the seed of pestilence in dirt and mould. A coat of whitewash on the cellar wall now, before the flies have disappeared, will make the house a more wholesome habitation. All sinks and waste pipes at this season should be thoroughly cleaned out with copperas or some other disinfectant, dissolved in warm water, at least once a week, in order to destroy all latent germs of disease which may come from such a source. Special care should be taken to guard children, invalids, and old people at this season from chill by providing heavier clothing. A complete outfit of light wool underclothes will do more than anything else to insure the wearer against the sudden changes of this month. Wise mothers invariably put light cashmere stockings on their children now, without waiting till frost, remembering that if the feet are kept warm half the battle against the danger of disease is over. Little children and any persons who are troubled with disorders of the digestion should be provided with heavy flannel bandages to be worn over the abdomen before the heavy winter flannels are put on. Especial attention should be paid to the bed clothing and an abundance of blankets kept at hand to be used during chilly nights. An open fire, kindled night and morning on the hearth of the family living room, will chase away a crowd of miasmic spectres, and make the cheeks of all the children rosy and their eyes sparkling. There is nothing more beautiful and more wholesome than this open fuel in the "melancholy days" when the leaves are falling and the woods aflame with the beauty of the asters and scarlet lobelia, and the swamps are azure with the gentian flower.—[N. Fruit as a Medicine.

Fresh, ripe, perfect, raw fruit is safe and healthful at all seasons of the year, and amid the ravages of disease, whether epidemic, endemic, or sporadic, general, special or local. Under proper restrictions as to quantity, such fruits as named will cure diarrhœa, aid in removing a colic, cold, fever, or any other disease whose treatment requires the bowels to be kept freely open; for this effect fresh ripe fruit is acknowledged to have the requisite properties; but to be used advantageously in health and disease, the following rules are imperative: Fruit should be eaten ripe, raw, fresh and perfect. It should be eaten no later than four o'clock in the afternoon. No water or fluid of any description should be swallowed within an hour after eating fruit. To have its full beneficial effect, nothing else should be eaten at the time fruit is taken. It is to the neglect of these observances that erroneous impressions prevail in many families, and to an extent too, in some instances, that the most luscious peach or apple, or bunch of grapes is regarded as that much embodied cholera and death.

A Salt Water Bath at Home.

To make a substitute for sea-bathing for those who must stay at home, procure a large, soft sponge—if it is high priced at first, it will pay better in the end; take every night a sponge bath of very salt water—about a cuptul of rock salt to a quart of cool water—and rub off afterward with a moderately rough crash towel, just hard enough to get in a comfortable glow.

Mr. Gladstone allows all the people in his neighborhood at Hawarden freely to use his splendid library of 20,000 volumes.

During a recent inspection of tobacco factories in England one maker was caught cutting up brown paper for cigarettes, while another was flavoring his fine old Havana cigars with a solution of licorice. The smokers will get very little sympathy from the anti-tobacconists in this matter. Brown paper, so far as we know, is harmless, and licorice is good for colds. Either is much better than tobacco, which, according to eminent anti-tobacconists, comes from a plant profusely covered with clammy hairs, which are said to absorb malarious atmosphere, and a plant profusely so filthy that the only animal known to use it is the African rock goat. Even the goat would prefer the licorice and brown paper if it could get them.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the forumla of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. 15,000 LIVES LOST.

The Greatest Disaster Known in the History of Japan.

BIG FLOODS AND LANDSLIDES.

Whole Villages Buried Under Avalanches from the Mountains.

The regular mail steamer Gaelic has arrived from Yokohama, bringing details of the overwhelming disaster in Japan. The province of Kii, in the southwestern part of Japan, has been visited by the greatest tragedy in the history of the country. Probably more than 15,000 people have been killed, several towns have been wiped completely off the face of the earth, and others have been nearly demolished. The catastrophe was occasioned by floods in the western part of the province and by the crumbling of a mountain which buried six villages under a huge mass of rocks and earth.

The early part of August was remarkable for its rains, and the rapid rise of the rivers soon became alarming. The banks of the Kinogawa River, a stream over 100 miles in length, broke near the city of Wakayamo on Aug. 19, and a mountain of water, like that which swept through the Conemaugh valley when the dam above Johnstown broke, rushed out among the fields and towns, wrecking houses, bridges, fences, temples, and all things in its path. In this district 200 houses were carried away and 5,000 were ruined by the water, leaving 30,000 people dependent upon the local officials for food.

Lower down the embankments of Hidakagown were also destroyed, flooding the cultivated fields and adjacent towns. Out of sixty houses at Wakanomura but two remain standing, and more than fifty people lost their lives.

An official of the Nishimura district office, who arrived at Wakayamo on the evening of Aug. 22, reports that at about 4 P. M. on Aug. 19 an inroad of water took place at Sanabemachi, and in a few moments the floors of buildings, in the vicinity were covered. Many houses in the district were carried away, and about 300 persons are said to

HAVE LOST THEIR LIVES.

All villages within an extent of ten miles are more or less submerged. In Chorai-homura several hundred houses were washed away, leaving only eleven buildings standing. Many persons are reported to have lost their lives in this district also.

The volume of the river Kinokuni, an adjacent stream, swelled to an extraordinary extent, the rise being in some places as much as 13 to 18 feet above the normal level. No bridge over the stream could withstand the force of the flood. The river steadily rose from about 6 o'clock in the evening, until at last near midnight it began to overflow its embankments, and about four miles from the city of Wakayama the banks at the village of Iwahashi were washed away. Immediately the village and its whole neighborhood, including about forty-eight other hamlets, were covered by the raging water. The depth of the flood is said to have been from 5 to 15 feet.

The neighborhood of Osaka has also suffered very severely. From a telegram received by the home office from the Governor of Osaka it appears that in the districts under his authority relief is being given to several thousands of people. The embankments on the Yodogawn and Inkedapaigawn rivers were broken at several places on Aug. 21, and considerable damage was caused to farming while many houses were swept away of ground. There, however, they were not fated to be safe, as the mountain of Sugi-Tama, which is at the back of the temple, suddenly came down on the village in an avalanche, burying the entire village under ground, only the upper half of the temple being left to view."

A special correspondent, who made his way laboriously over the ruins, says:

"Villages of Nagato No-Mura, Tanise-Mura, Uyenoike-Mura, and Hayashi Mura, along the course of the Totsugawawoo, were all buried under ground by the crumbling away of the Umiyabara Mountain. All the villages of Ui, Nagatono, Numata-Hara, and Asahi, at the entrance of the Totsugawa Go, face each other, and can be seen across the river, but, there being no boats between these places, no help could be rendered. The villages of Uyeno-Chi, Takatsu, Kawatsu, and several others were all either under ground. The number of deaths in these villages has not yet been ascertained, but, as all outlets were blockaded, the loss of life must have been appalling.

SWEPT AWAY OR BURIED

"The villages of Kaseabaya, Uchihara, Takigawa, Nojiri, Yamasaki, and Taana were also entirely swept away or buried by the overflow of rivers and the crumbling mountains. The damage along the lower course of the river and the villages skirting it has not yet been ascertained, but it is supposed that out of fifty villages comprising Totsugawa Go all have suffered more or less from the disaster, and it is a mooted point if one has escaped.

"In all these villages farms, rice fields, and houses are supposed to have been nearly or quite destroyed. The exact number of deaths in this small region is not yet known, but the district officials place it between 4,000 and 5,000."

The coal mines at Patezato Mura, Yoshino Gori, also caved in, and forty miners are missing. In Shiono Mura a landslide occurred.

CRUSHING TO DEATH

eight persons, besides which forty are missing who are supposed to have been buried alive. While the extent of territory affected here it not so great, the suffering in this district is appalling. It is impossible to furnish aid to all the thousands of sufferers, and many must die of hunger and thirst. The losses in lives and money will never be known, as whole towns have been wiped from the earth with no survivor to tell the story.

As an instance of the disaster it may be mentioned that the Portuguese gunboat Roi Lima, on her voyage along the coast, was greatly obstructed by the wreckage of roofs, timbers of houses, &c., so that on several occasions she had to stop to prevent damage to her screw. This debris extended at least ninety miles along the coast. This is the greatest disaster Japan has known for centuries, and further details can only bring stories of more desolation and more suffering than have thus far been related. The Japanese newspapers, after careful estimate, think the loss of life does not fall below 15,000.

An Old Liquor License.

The question of selling liquor on Sunday is one which the clergy were called to adjudicate upon two hundred years ago as they are to-day. One of the earliest inn keepers in the colony, Jean Boisdon, lost a profitable monopoly for not adhering to the regulations. His license required him to establish himself on the great square of Quebec, close to the church, so that the parishioners might conveniently warm and refresh themselves between the services. He was, however, forbidden to entertain any person during high mass, sermon, catechism, or vespers.

HOW TO KEEP YOUNG.

BY HARKLEY HARKER.

Keep up with the times.

That is, read what is going on now, today.

The newspaper is a very battery foe. If you turn it over only to find "Who is dead?" If you take little interest in present happenings, but are mournfully entertained with some dry old editorial; if you habituate yourself to admiring a former age to the exclusion of this—you will not keep young long.

Welcome new things.

When you hear about the electric car, do not promptly scowl and say, "It can't succeed." Rather eagerly believe in it. Say at least, "I wish it could succeed. I want to see something better than the noisy, dirty steam-engine. Hurrah! I believe in lightning." Make yourself believe in the new, because it is new. You are on the side of anything new. If any new idea presents itself, rapping for recognition, be sure it finds a friend in you. Let a new thing be two-thirds received by you and only one-third "Stand and prove yourself."

If possible, be the advocate of a thing rather than a juryman on it. A new writer, his new book, a new candidate for office, a fresh voice in song, the latest actor—all possible young things that promise to make the world happier, or better, or easier under its burdens, gave them your hand. Do it among the first; not among the reluctant last. Stand with the boys, not with the old fogies. Be like the morning light, not like evening lamp-light. Take the first views of new things. If they seem pointed in the right direction, gaze on them in the sunlight rather than after dark.

Look forward, and not backward.

Talk about what is going to be next year, five, ten years from now. Men will laugh at you and call you a fool; but you will be here, young and hopeful still, when the dead past has buried its dead. You are going to do better in business next year; your health will be stronger in the cool weather; your spectacles will improve your eyesight, and enhance your good looks; your wayward boy will settle down next year; your golden age is to come.

Now, it is no small task to keep this forward look in an ugly world like ours. Most men give it up. Hence most men grow old fast. I heard a man of thirty-two years say last week, "I'm getting on in life fast toward the meridian. Just think of it, in ten years I shall be forty-two. I shall soon be gray. My father was gray at forty-five. I have not prospered as I ought to. If I do not make my fortune within the next eight years I never shall." Poor dunce! He reminded me of the old lady who roused her daughters at four o'clock on washing-day morning by pounding the stovepipe and shouting, "Girls, here it is Monday, to-morrow is Tuesday, next day's Wednesday, and not a thing done yet."

Reader, as you look forward, claim the future as yours. Trust your middle age. Do not belie the years of your ripest powers. You may "succeed" when you are past sixty. The ten or twelve years then to follow may be worth all the years that went before. You will be better fixed to enjoy them.

Enjoy a laugh.

This you can do, or the reverse, just as you please. A man can insist on having his fun, or he can let it slip, just as he pleases. The fun is going on all the while. But fun comes from the east, not the west; that is the best fun is new; it happens while you are passing. I sat, yesterday in the window of a hotel, feeling rather old. I saw a cab-driver dash up and stop. He ments on the Yodogawn and Inkedapaigawn rivers were broken at several places on Aug. 21, and considerable damage was caused to farming, while many houses were swept away or otherwise injured. In Hongamura 180 houses were washed away and thirty persons were killed. In Higashipo Murogori and Nes[illegible]Murogori several hundred houses were demolished and considerable loss of life is reported. In Hidakagori 380

HOUSES WERE CARRIED AWAY

and seventy houses were more or less damaged, while 120 persons lost their lives and fifty others received more or less severe injuries. About 5,000 persons

NARROWLY ESCAPED DEATH.

A telegram from Wakayamo says that many houses in Tschigawara and Shikiya, which are situated close to Kumanagawa, were carried away and many lives lost. The buildings of the Kumano Shrine, except one or two small temples, were all swept away, but the Sacred Image was saved. According to the report from Jeninu, in Higashi Murogari, about one-fourth of the buildings there (over 500) and 100 persons were swept away. The Hikawga River rose 28 feet above the ordinary level, and villages close to the river flooded, in consequence of which about 150 houses were washed away, many persons being drowned. Seventy-eight houses and the Miwake police station at Shusan were also carried away.

Owing to several landslides which occurred close to the source of the Hidakagawa vast numbers of trees, some of which were very large, were uprooted and swept on to the fields, where several thousands are now lying.

Inquiries as to the condition of various villages along the river have not yet been completed. In Goto there are still two feet of muddy water. About 1,200 houses of the villages close to the Tomitagawa were swept away and over 500 persons are reported to have lost their lives.

Another telegram from Wakayama, dated Aug 26, announces that according to the investigations made up to that date the total number of houses carried away in Nishi Murogori was 1,092, while 508 others were demolished and 440 houses were more or less damaged. The number of deaths there was 863.

Other villages suffered much loss by the floods and the number of dead cannot be accurately determined, but for the province of Kii it will fall below 10,000. Bloated bodies and covered fields for miles around, and it will be months before the survivors can preceed with work. The loss in money is roughly estimated at $6,000,000.

Relief has been sent to the ruined district, but inadequate facilities for collecting and distributing provisions will make the suffering intense, and in the outlying districts many will die from starvation.

The same rain which ruined the western part of the province of Kii by flood also wrought a most singular and ruinous disaster in the eastern section of the same province. The "Kansee Kippo," published at Osaka, gives a clear account. It says:

"Since Aug. 18 Totsugawa-Go district has been visited with very heavy rains, and at dawn on the 19th it was discovered that the rivers were rising rapidly. People in the neighborhood of Amano-Gawa, fearing an inundation, made preparations, for the emergency.

"While they were thus employed mountains suddenly crumbled away, obstructing communication between Tsujido Mura and Sakamoto-Mura, and the waters in the rivers, which rose in consequence, covered the houses in Tsujido-Mura, the people fleeing to the temple on an elevated piece conveniently warm and refresh themselves between the services. He was, however, forbidden to entertain any person during high mass, sermon, catechism, or vespers. Some of the early tavern-keepers had a thriving trade and became men of wealth and importance. In Talon regulations they were forbidden to furnish food or drink to any hired laborer, not were they allowed to sell to persons residing in the place. They were supposed to accommodate travellers and strangers putting up in the cities or towns. One Montreal innkeeper was fined for permitting the syndic of the town to dine under his roof.—[Montreal Gazette.

A bootless attempt—To get up-stair, without being heard by your wife.

An old bachelor, who has just died at Earishofen, left to his servant two shillings a day, to his dog one shilling, to his cat sixpence, and to some of his nearest relatives five shillings, ten shillings, or £1 as legacies. The rest of his fortune becomes the property of the parish.

Queen Victoria was much pleased while in Wales with the music of the Welshmen. She especially liked their singing and their manipulation of the harp. At one dinner eight harpers played during the banquet. Six of them were brothers under the leadership of their father, who appeared in full bardic costume, with a cap of antique form, blue robes and a red girdle. One Sunday a few choristers were brought thirty-five miles to sing at the Queen's private service.

Boston is afflicted with fleas. They are of the wickedest kind and bite with a savageness that has a tendency to drive the average resident of the Hub into something like frenzy. The obtrusive insect, says the Post, seems to make his appearance in the best quarters of the city, and naturally enough people are slow to confess the fact—but this sort of thing will out. The companions in misery one after another confess, and then the drug stores experience a boom in insect powder. But the flea continues to flourish in spite of the rigid measures to suppress him.

the best fun is new; it happens while you are passing. I sat, yesterday in the window of a hotel, feeling rather old. I saw a cab-driver dash up and stop. He unlocked a box under his seat, took out a canvas pail such as oats are fed from, shook it out, walked round in front of his bony nag, showed him the empty pail, folded up said pail, returned it again to the box and locked it. You should have seen that horse's countenance. Even yet I haven't decided what it all meant, nor whether the horse said as he looked up at us in the window, "You see, gentlemen, what I live on—promise." But it was all very amusing to myself and one other gentleman by my side. Three others of our party were looking straight at the scene and never saw it; they wondered what we were laughing at, and even when we told them, could hardly catch the flavor of this passing fun, whiffed on the lazy breeze of a torrid day.

Enjoy young people.

To some men and women this comes natural. To others it costs an effort to keep step with youth. Some elderly people say, "Young people are too noisy. They are never satisfied. They always want to go somewhere else, or do something new. They vex me." Very well. Get left, then. I do not mean to teach irreverence for age. The kindly deference for superior wisdom, so pleasing to riper years, is one of the handsomest adornments of youth. And an old simpleton is a nuisance. To dye the gray hairs of honor is not to my mind. I am not ashamed of my years. I do not force my stiff, old-fashioned dancing on young ladies at a time they want the handsomest young fellow in the room. I know my place, and often "two is company, while three is a crowd." But if I can make myself agreeable to young people, without playing the buffoon, I know I am the gainer by contact with their fresh young life. I will help, not hinder, their morning-hour joys of life. Happy is he who has children of his own, who will keep him young, if he will only let them. The contagion of youth cannot be explained. Last year I set out a young maple between two old elms. It is curious, but true—the elms this year have no leaf worms; heretofore, for three years they have been stripped by worms. Was it because the youthful life of the maple somehow has been communicated to them that the aged fellows are so clean this year?

Avoid revenges.

The storing up of ugly thoughts, and following out hatreds, is the worst of aging agencies. I met an old friend in Baltimore last week. He is several years my junior. We sat together in college. "How old he looks!" exclaimed my wife. Yes; this reason is a family lawsuit bequeathed to him by his dead father. Following up his father's enemies is making him an aged man before his time. His spirit is bitter. His wealth will be great; but I would not pay his price—nineteen years of fighting! Forgive, and you will grow young with every such act. It is Godlike to forgive, and eternal youth sits on the throne of the universe. I challenge you, reader, to find a youthful old man who has many hatreds, who loves to fight, who enjoys punishing an enemy, who is cruel. Happiness, Dumas says, makes even a wicked man good. Be that as it may, a happy disposition makes an old man young.—[New York Weekly.

A Precious Relic.

"That's a very funny old cane you have got there. I'd like to buy it from you."

The Origin and Distribution of the Globe's Inhabitants.

M. de Quatrefages, the leading French ethnologist, in presenting the second part of his "Introduction to the Study of the Human Races" to the Academy of Sciences, has given an interesting summary of his general conclusions with regard to the origin and distribution of mankind. Neglecting the minor differences, he estimates that there are no fewer than 72 distinct races in the human species. All these descend or branch off from three fundamental types—the black, the yellow, and the white—which had their origin at the great central mass of Northern Asia, which is thus the cradle of mankind. Representatives of these different types and the races which sprang from them are still to be found there. The whites, according to M. de Quartefages, appear to have originated on the west of the central mass, the yellow on the north, and the blacks on the south. The whites extended westward and northward, giving birth to three secondary types—the Finnish, the Semitic and the Aryan, if we except the Allophyles, which form a separate group. Their area of distribution is continuous, as in that of the yellows, because of the extensive land surface of the Eurasian Continent. The yellows spread eastward and crossed into America. The whites and yellows checked or blended with each other, producing many varieties of man. The blacks, or Negro type, which originated on the south of the central mass, was forced by the nature of the Continent, and probably by the attacks of the whites and yellows, to go south into Africa and east into the Indian Archipelago, or Melanesia. The proto-Semites arrested their distribution in the north of Africa, and the mixture of the two races gave rise to the negroid populations. In the centre and south of Africa the blacks continued in their ethnic purity until the infiltration of other races from Europe and the north of Africa in modern times. Those which remained in their original homes became blended with the whites and yellows, giving rise to the dravidian populations which pass by shades into three fundamental types. As for the Allophyles, represented by the race of Cro Magnon, they occupied parts of Europe and North Africa, from which they extended to the Canaries. The three fundamental types also found themselves in Oceania; the Allophylian whites occupying Polynesia, the blacks Melanesia, the yellows Malasia. The latter were, according to M. de Quatrefages, the last to come into the maritime world. The peopling of America dates from the Quatrenary period, and is due to migrations of different types—Allophylic white and yellow blending with the local Quaternary races, which also belong to the yellow type. Europe, since the Tertiary ages, has received only Allophylian whites, Finns and Aryans. Having regard to the constant and various migrations of the human races in past times, and the resulting amalgamation of the varieties, whether due to conquest and violence or peaceful diffusion, M. de Quatrefages justly observes that the number of races now existing in a pure state is exceedingly restricted, if indeed there is a single one which can be accepted as such. Perhaps some little groups, protected by their isolation, such as the Mincopies, may show an identity of characters attesting their ethnic homogeneity.

A Ridiculous Question.

"Do you enjoy good health?" asked Brown of his friend Jones. The reply of Jones was short, sharp and to the point. "Why of course I do, what fool doesn't?" Everyone enjoys good health when he has it. But some people do not have it to enjoy. Sick headache, biliousness, constipation, deranged liver, and a host of ills, real and imaginary, are their heritage. Thousands of persons cure and prevent these distressing complaints by taking Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets. Small, sugar-coated and easy to take; one a dose.

describes the condition of those persons who are said to be "going down hill," or "going into decline." There is an indescribable weakness of the system, a general lack of vitality. They cannot tell what the matter is with them. They only know that they feel miserable in mind and body. They are gloomy and despondent. They have tried this and that remedy prescribed by their friends or the doctors. They have failed to receive any benefit from them. They reach the conclusion that there is no help for them and that they must die. Now the fact is that the trouble originates, in nine cases out of ten, in impure blood. There is poisonous, effete matter in it that ought to be got rid of. But how can this be done? Simply by taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, which acts on the blood and various organs of the body in such a way that the man or woman using it seems to be made over.—reconstructed. It is guaranteed to benefit or cure all cases of disease for which it is recommended, or money paid for it will be refunded.

OFFICE MARKET SQUARE. 4488ly AGENT

The Napanee Express.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, OCT. 4, 1889.

A number of additional hands have been engaged and the work of completing the post office is being pushed a little more rapidly. Uriah found that THE EXPRESS in this, as in the majority of cases, voiced public opinion, namely that the extravagence and waste ought to be stopped. At the present price of barley it takes over seventeen bushels of that grain per day to pay the salaries of the Inspectors alone. What do the farmers think of such waste?

Masterly inactivity is the rule with the Tory Government, and is illustrated in Napanee by the way the Postoffice building contract is being spun out. Work which should have been completed a year ago is still unfinished and may yet be caught by frost before completion. And this is the way the government business is being conducted throughout the Dominion. Nothing is done in a reasonable time except it be to rush through a big railway to benefit the party. Even respectable Conservatives are beginning to complain that two bosses to three men is rather stiff.

Mr. Laurier's addresses in Ontario have done an immense lot of good in quieting the tempest-in-a-teapot storm raised by disguised Tories playing the roll of equal righters; in directing the attention of the people to the obvious duties of being tolerant and of aiming with unabated vigor at the great object all should have in view, viz: The building up of a common Canadian nationality by all classes and creeds in the Dominion. In another respect Mr. Laurier's visit has been opportune; people now know that there are Frenchmen and Frenchmen; that there are Tory Frenchmen and Liberal Frenchmen, and that it is with the Tory Frenchmen we have to reckon for all the nefarious jobbery which has been going on. Mr. Laurier reminds one of the Hon. Mr. Dorion who worked hand in hand with the Hon. George Brown in the great Clergy Reserve and Representation by population struggles. Intelligent, calm, dignified, with confidence in himself and in the ultimate glorious triumph of liberal principles, he meets the foe with a dignity which inspires awe, and drives back into their insignificant shells the loud mouthed croakers who seem to have only one object in living and that is to shout, right or wrong—shout.

There is a good sized row looming up over the appointment of a lighthouse keeper for the lighthouse on "The Brothers," just south of Amherst Island. The island on which the light is situated is said to be

The North-West Settler.

The crops in the North-West Territories have suffered severely this year from drought. Hay was a failure and in the Regina district some farmers have ploughed up their wheat and oats, or turned their cattle in. A farmer in the neighborhood of Qu'Appelle writes that for some time past he has abandoned the all-wheat style of farming and taken to raising stock; but, he says, "I shall want feed for them this winter, and I don't see how I can import it from the States, the railroad rates and the tariff together being an enormous tax." Just so. When there is a short crop in Canada a few lucky farmers may make a little money, for the N. P. undoubtedly helps them to obtain good prices, though it robs them then and always by exalting the cost of what they have to buy. But the bulk of the farmers, more especially those who require cheap fodder for their cattle, find the duties on foreign produce a serious handicap. Let us suppose that this Qu'Appelle settler should determine to sell eight steers worth $25 a piecein order to obtain a supply of American corn and oats. If the steers were sold to an American buyer, the Qu'Appelle man would have to pay the United States duty, viz., $40. The reason of this is that Canadian exports of cattle to the United States are too insignificant relatively to the American supply to affect the market price. This would leave the settler $160 wherewith to make his purchases. He buys 160 bushels of corn at 50 cents and 320 of oats at 25 cents. On reaching home the Canadian Customs Officers collect 7½ cents per bushel on the corn and 10 cents on the oats; or $44 in all. The net result is, therefore, that the settler suffers an absolute loss of $84 on a $200 transaction; and this at a time when he needs all the help he can get. But his troubles do not end here. In order to keep the roof over his head the settler during autumn and winter must buy manufactured goods. He requires sugar, cotton, implements, iron goods such as nails, etc., and clothing; and on each and every one of these articles the law wrings from him a tax which goes into the pocket of the home manufacturer. To be more correct Mr. Bowell seizes and holds him while the gentlemen of the Ontario combines relieve him of the amount in the name, not of Barabbas, but of British connection and other fine symbols.

Protection is a fraud upon the farming class everywhere, but it is a positive scourge in a new region like the North-west. The special census of Manitoba and the Territories taken in 1885 and 1886, revealed the fact that the government estimates of population had been altogether fallacious—that thousands of those who had gone in had pulled up stakes and crossed the line. The N. P. is undoubtedly responsible to a great extent for this state of things. The settler has to compete in the world's market after paying heavy railroad tolls to the seaboard, yet the government deliberately increases the cost of production by compelling him to buy in the dearest market, which in addition to its dearness, is far remote from his farm. A good test of the prosperity of a young community is found in what is known as the accretive immigration, that is, in the immigration which is attracted by the settlers themselves sending prepaid passages or money to bring out their friends. In several parts of the United States 60 per cent of the immigrants are secured in this way; whereas there is reason to believe that in our Northwest the proportion does not exceed one per cent. In other words, the policy of the government does not satisfy the settler, and therefore even when he himself stays he makes no effort to get friends and relatives about him.

over the appointment of a lighthouse keeper for the lighthouse on "The Brothers," just south of Amherst Island. The island on which the light is situated is said to belong to Mr. R. H. Finkle, of Bath, and he is said to have made improvements thereon to the extent of some hundreds of dollars. He now wants the position of lighthouse keeper but the government seem unwilling to grant his very reasonable request. The reason of the government's unwillingness is the fact that Warden Filson is also an applicant for the position, and that Uriah Wilson rather favors the appointment of the Amherst Island representative. The government hate to lose the Finkle influence at Bath, and as they can safely count on Mr. Filson's support every time, the position will likely be given to the Bathite. He deserves it anyway, that is if faithful allegiance to party counts for anything. Uriah is finding that patronage is not a nice thing to have. The Herring and Hearns appointments were anything but popular with his own party, and he cannot afford to alleniate many friends at the present juncture. He is therefore dealing very gingerly with this lighthouse appointment.

Barriers to Trade.

At this season of the year, when the farmer is getting in his crops, it is well that he should have some idea of the height of the barriers that shut him out of his nearest and best market. Here is a list of the United States duties on the leading agricultural and other natural products of Canada

Cattle, Horses and Sheep	20 p. c. ad. val.
Barley, Corn and Oats	10 cents per bushel.
Wheat	20 do
Coal (bituminous)	75 cents per ton.
Copper Ore	2½ cents per pound.
Dried Cod and Herring	½ cent per pound.
Salt Herring	$1 per bbl.
Pickled Mackerel	$2 per bbl.
Flax	$25 per ton.
Hay	$2 per ton.
Iron Ore	75 cents per ton.
Malt	20 cents per bushel.
Stone	20 p. c. ad. val.
Salt	8 cents per hundred.
Butter and Cheese	4 cents per pound.
Beans and Peas	10 p. c. ad. val.
Potatoes	15 cents per bushel.
Lumber	$2 per M.
Wool (clothing and combing)	10 cents per pound.

It should be borne in mind that in all or nearly all cases the Canadian exporter pays the duty for the simple reason that our exports to the States are not sufficiently large to affect the market price over there. Thus one of the largest items of export is lumber; yet though we send $10,000,000 a year we supply only one-twentieth of the annual consumption of the United States. Another point of great importance is this—that if these duties were removed it would be possible for us to vastly increase our export trade. Thus any lumberman will bear witness that the $2 duty on his product prevents him from shipping huge quantities of second-grade or inferior material. That is, the duty is sufficiently high to exhaust any possible profit left after paying the cost of production and transportation. The farmer can see for himself by referring to the Canadian tariff how much he is taxed when he undertakes to buy from the States the goods which are manufactured cheaper there than here. Our manufacturers are hampered by the United home market which prevents them from resorting, as the Americans do, to the specialization or subdivision of labor and machinery. Is it not clear that if the custom houses on both sides of the line were closed both countries would be benefited? This is what the Liberal party is seeking to accomplish, and in the United States events are rapidly making for the same end.

cceed one per cent. In other words, the policy of the government does not satisfy the settler, and therefore even when he himself stays he makes no effort to get friends and relatives about him.

Progress of Inventions Since 1845.

In the year 1845 the present owners of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN newspaper commenced its publication, and soon after established a bureau for the procuring of patents for inventions at home and in foreign countries. During the year 1845 there were only 502 patents issued from the U. S. Patent Office, and the total issued from the establishment of the Patent Office, up to the end of that year, numbered only 4,357.

Up the first of July this year there have been granted 402,413. Showing that since the commencement of the publication of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN there have been issued from the U. S. Patent Office 402,166 patents, and about one third more applications have been made than have been granted, showing the ingenuity of our people to be phenomenal, and much greater than even the enormous number of patents issued indicates. Probably a good many of our readers have had business transacted through the offices of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, in New York or Washington, and are familiar with Munn & Co.'s mode of doing business, but those who have not will be interest in knowing something about this, the oldest patent soliciting firm in this country, probably in the world.

Persons visiting the offices of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 361 Broadway, N. Y., for the first time, will be surprised, on entering the main office, to find such an extensive and elegantly equipped establishment, with its walnut counters, desks, and chairs to correspond, and its enormous safes and such a large number of draughtsmen, specification writes, and clerks, all busy as bees, reminding one of a large banking or insurance office, with its hundred employees.

In conservation with one of the firm, who had commenced the business of soliciting patents in connection with the publication of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, more than forty years ago, I learned that his firm made application for upward of 100,000 inventors in the United States, and several thousands in different foreign countries, and had filed as many cases in the Patent Office in a single month as there were patents issued during the entire first year of their business career. This gentleman had seem the Patent Office grow from a sapling to a sturdy oak and he modestly hinted that many thought the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, with its large circulation, had performed no mean share in stimulating inventions and advancing the interest of the Patent Office. But it is not alone the patent soliciting that occupies the attention of the 100 persons employed by Munn & Co., but a large number are engaged on the four publications issued weekly and monthly from their office, 361 Broadway, N. Y., viz: The SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEMENT, the Export Edition of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, and the Architects and Builders Edition of the SCIENTIEIC AMERICAN. The first two publications are issued every week, and the latter two, the first of every month.

TEA EXTRAORDINARY!

Having recently secured an extraordinary good bargain in tea, we intend to share it with our customers.

Heretofore we have given extra good value in Tea at 25 cents per pound, but the fifty chests just received would be "dirt cheap" at 45 cents, and 25 cents is what we shall sell it at. We venture to say and we have had many years experience in the tea trade, that nothing to compare with it has ever been sold in Napanee at that price.

To those who want to save money and at same time enjoy a choice cup of Tea, we say come and get a pound and we feel certain it will cause you to come for more.

THE FARM.

During the summer a great deal of rubbish collects in the garden and perhaps in the orchard. All this ought to be raked up and burned, or otherwise disposed of. If left on the ground it furnishes feeding for insects.

Orchards run out and need renovating as well as fields. First, turn over the grass sod and manure well. Then a thick coating of ashes around the trees is necessary. Soft, home-made soap made with lye potash, mixed with water, applied with a brush to the limbs has a fine effect.

Turnips and cabbages, when fed to milking cows, should be given directly after milking, in such quantity as they will eat up at once clean, and no more given until after the next milking; when fed on such vegetables the milk should be exposed to the air by leaving the cans unstopped as much as possible.

As a rule white clover springs up on land that has been well dressed with wood ashes, and though it affords excellent pasturage it is a very persistent weed if it is allowed to grow where it is not wanted. Cutting it off only causes it to grow more vigorously. It should be pulled up by hand from among rows of vegetables.

To our friends engaged in feeding hogs just now, the lesson to be received from all reports up to the present time would be: Dispose of your hogs as early in the coming season as you can get them in a nice shape for the market. It does not look as if high prices later on will rule unless from causes now not to be discerned.

An honestly made implement, well cared for, ought and usually does last fifteen or sixteen years; but, mainly from a lack of shelter and care, it does not last on an average that length of time. Careful farmers should have plenty of well-ventilated, dry storage for tools and implements. Nothing pays a better interest on cost.

It takes less care and skill to raise scrub horses that will sell for $75 to $100 than to breed to an imported stallion with $25 to $50 service fee and raise a horse that will sell at $200 or $300. It is just that care and skill that pays the enterprising farmer and breeder.

Some care is required in feeding oats of the new crop before they are dried out. Some horses have poor digestion and are easily thrown into colic by such scouring and purgative feed. Unless you know the horse's habit well, then feed a less quantity of old oats at a higher price, and you will be better satisfied with the result. Oats are not thoroughly dried out until cold weather, though if properly cared for the danger from feeding them soon becomes very small.

The most profitable cow is the one that will give the most milk for the amount of food consumed, and in the end the greatest amount of good beef. This is the sort of cow for most farmers, as well as dairymen; and should be procured and carefully bred from. It should be borne in mind that there is much in breds, much more than these acquainted with only inferior stock are aware of; in truth there is more profit derived from good bloods than there is from good feeding of stock from inferior blood. The average farmer cannot well afford to look to milk alone, nor to beef alone for his profits, he must have the two combined to the best degree attainable. Every farmer, however, cannot skilfully breed up; in truth, but few can well select and classify animals in breeding, and fewer still reach the highest attainable results, yet every farmer if he but tries can procure good [illegible]

There are in many places complaints that the potatoes are diseased by what is called "dry rot." There are some instances in this locality, but the most of the people around here, have not yet got their potatoes out of the ground.

The people here are busy doing their fall work, knowing that they must work for the season is swiftly passing bye.

It is rumored that we are going to loose one of our neighbors shortly. Mr. G. E. Deline is going to move away.

Mr. John A. Lott is building a new house in this vicinity calculating to move into it this fall.

We had the pleasure lately of enjoying the company of our esteemed friends Messrs. James Shannon and William Vanest, from the vicinity of Enterprise, who were here trying their luck with the fish. Am sorry to say they met with very poor success.

GOHEBYDD.

Centreville.

Last night there was a most successful musical and literary entertainment in the Town Hall, Centreville, under the auspices of the Methodist Church at that place J. C. Drewry, of the Napanee EXPRESS, presiding. The entertainment consisted of music, readings, recitations and addresses. Revs. Stratton, Crossley and Harrison, Misses Stratton and Dunkley; and Mr. Jewell, of Napanee, gave a programme which was most pleasing, The church choir also assisted.

The Centreville Fair, so far as the attendance was concerned, did not come up to expectations, but the display in the Hall was most excellent, surpassing anything hitherto attempted. The display of live stock shows a vast improvement on former days, and was a credit to the township of Camden. We hope the prize animals as well as a crowd of people will visit the county fair to be held in Napanee next Tuesday and Wednesday.

Stella.

Mr. Sproule has gone to Kingston where he will take a college course.

The Amherst Island Fair was held on Thursday, October 3rd. Dinner was served at the Marksman hotel. The show suffered terribly from the rain.

Mr. John Wright was the guest of his sister, Mrs. Wm. Allen on Sunday.

Rumor has it that it will be a close race between Messrs. Finkle and Filson as to who will get the position of lighthouse keeper.

Mrs. David Thompson has bought John Wright's house on church street.

Hugh Fleming has purchased a residence on bridge street.

Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Neilson spent Sunday last in Conway.

Master John Cousins is slowly improving.

Mr. Hugh Fleming is erecting a new drive house and stable for Mr. John McDonough, the proprietor of the Royal hotel.

There was a big dance in Stella last night, as a sort of wind up to the Fair. The boys were anything but quiet.

From Bad To Worse.

Scrofula leads to consumption. From three to six bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters will cure scrofula, salt rheum, erysipelas, boils, pimples, blotches, tetter, shingles, scald head, sore eyes, and all skin affections, by cleansing the system and removing all impure matter that causes bad blood.

truth, but few can well select and classify animals in breeding, and fewer still reach the highest attainable results, yet every farmer if he but tries can procure good breeds, and if he cannot improve them, can at least keep them from deteriorating.

To those of our readers who make barley a principal crop on the farm the following note from the columns of the Mark Lane Express, London, will be of interest: "The farmers of Canada are still anxiously considering the question of a profitable market for their barley. If existing obstacles are removed, it is said that a very profitable market will be found in Great Britain. But Chevalier Barley is best adapted to the wants of the British brewer, and that is not the variety of barley usually raised in Canada. This is a matter in which the Canadian Minister of Agriculture has taken a deep interest, and he has acted under the conviction that, with a suitable variety for planting, and the removal of difficulties arising out of careless marketing, a great export trade might be opened up with varieties from India, Great Britain and Denmark. Those from Germany, Russia and California now being tested, one part of the question may soon be answered. The matter is certainly receiving thorough attention and good results seem assured." In the present indifferent attitude of the United States markets it is to be hoped that a market in Britain may open up ere long.

With swine, as with cattle, the best breeds pay best in the main. The hog that makes the most pork for the amount of food consumed, and does it at the earliest age possible, is the most profitable hog. Cholera is the chief source of loss in this stock, as the cattle-plague is in cattle, and one year with another the loss by these causes is very great. For these maladies perhaps the best known remedy is wholesome food and drink, and all access to any other, especially impure water, even water of long standing, strictly guarded against. The writer believes that he saves his hogs when the cholera is prevailing by confining them in high, airy places, and giving wholesome food and strictly fresh water.

TEN GOOD THINGS TO KNOW.

1. That salt will curdle new milk; hence in preparing milk porridge, gravies, etc., salt should not be added until the dish is prepared.

2. That clear, boiling water will remove tea stains and many fruit stains. Pour the water through the stain, and thus prevent it spreading over the fabric.

3. That ripe tomatoes will remove ink from white cloth; also from the hands.

4. That a tablespoonful of turpentine boiled with white clothes will aid in the whitening process.

5. That boiled starch is much improved by the addition of a little sperm, salt or gum-arabic dissolved.

6. That beeswax and salt will make rusty flatirons as clean and smooth as glass. Tie a lump of wax in a rag and keep it for that purpose. When the irons are hot, rub them first with the wax rag, then scour with a paper or cloth sprinkled with salt.

7. That blue ointment and kerosene, mixed in equal proportions and applied to bedsteads, is an unfailing bedbug remedy, as a coat of whitewash is for the walls of a log house.

8. That kerosene will soften boots and shoes that have been hardened by water, and render them as pliable as new,

9. That kerosene will make tin teakettles as bright as new. Saturate a wollen rag with it. It will also remove stains from varnished furniture.

10. That cool rain-water and soda will remove machine grease from washable fabrics.—The Sanitarium.

HOME DRESS MAKING.

A piece of ribbon velvet, and one of Valenciennes insertion, each an inch and a quarter wide, will answer for Figure No. 71, which is a dressy basque for home wear, using a fine nice woolen skirt with it. Either do without a lining, making bag seams at the shoulders and sides, or use one of white sateen. Cut the lining out first, then sew the strips of ribbon and insertion together, laying the edge of the velvet over that of the insertion. The vest is of white crape or surah, laid in fine pleats, and hooked up invisibly.

The full sleeves are of net puffed at the top, where they are strapped with velvet, and finished with lace edging beneath a band and a bow of the velvet ribbon. The high collar has strips of ribbon, and, a rosette in front of lace and ribbon. On the lower edge is a deep lace frill, and at the waist line are two rosettes and straps of velvet.

The new basques for early fall gowns have a blunt point in front, sides just to the waist line, and a pointed back, slashed to the waist, one or two Vandyke tabs or the "habit" design, which is narrow, flat, and usually left open up the middle seam.

To prevent such short basques from pulling up, thus leaving an undesirable space between the skirt and edge, sew two safety-hooks on the basque edge on each side, and work silk loops on the skirt just below the belt to correspond.

The most jaunty basques are either fastened with flat buttons under a fly, or hooks and eyes. Jacket basques promise to be in high favor with young ladies. They may be cut short and round like a Zouave jacket, or square across the waist line similiar to the Eton garment; in either case the square "habit" or bluntly pointed back is in good taste.

The sleeve represented in Figure No. 74 is more appropriate for thin or soft materials than those of a heavy weight. It is full, shirred at the bottom to form a frill, gathered in two rows over the elbow, and again at the arm-size. The outer or cap piece is pleated in the arm-size and shirred below to form two frills, which are doubled, not hemmed.

Figure No. 75 is stylish for woolen and silk goods; plain or brocaded silk looking well with cashmere, and embroidered or braided galloon for the trimming on the fronts, collar, cuffs, and belt. The coat has a princesse back with sides that are cut off at the waist line and arranged like gathered sides to the skirt, lifted a trifle in front.

The jacket fronts are turned back to form short revers, have one dart on each side, coat sleeves slightly gathered over the top, draped cuffs of brocade, and a band of the trimming below. The full plastron is fastened in Breton style over a tight fitting lining with a pointed belt at the waist. The skirt front of brocade requires two breadths of silk, with a seam on each side—not in the middle.

The jacket basque has Eton fronts, "habit" back, rolled collar, coat sleeves, and a trimming of the braiding. The blouse vest is of blue surah laid in side-pleats, and a sash from the left side-seam ties on the right side.

Figure No. 77 is suitable for wash, silk, or woolen goods. It has but one seam, the inside one, which is sloped as illustrated. The sleeve is gathered over the top and at the back on the lower edge. A cuff of velvet, silk, or embroidery is turned up over the edge.

ened in front with a passementerie ornament corresponding with those on the collar, cuffs, and top of the sleeves.

The blouse is made over a close-fitting lining, and fastens invisibly in front. The top part is shirred in puffs imitating a yoke, back and front with full sleeves, gathered towards the back. Bands of galloon, ribbon, or velvet furnish the necessary garniture.

All sleeves are full, even those of velvet, which are to be worn with cloth, cashmere, or silk, velvet-trimmed dresses. They are simply gathered, tucked, puffed, or draped at the top by cutting the outside wide and long enough to catch in loose folds here and there above the elbows. Sleeves on street dresses are sufficiently long to cover the wrists.

Turned-over frills for collars and cuffs will be worn in the house after they are given up for the street. Blouses of surah, flannel, or cashmere will throw the jersey in the shade this winter. They are made over a lining, worn with a belt, have the skirt part outside of the dress, full sleeves, and a shirred, tucked, or smocked yoke.

Figure No. 81 is a blouse of India silk, with the French turned-over collar and cuffs of the material, knife pleated, a ruffle around the lower edge, and the Directoire frill from the throat to the waist line, tapering to the belt, of silk, buckled in front.

The silk is without darts, but the lining has the usual number, and the back is in one piece, with the fulness at the waist held by the belt. The coat sleeves are gracefully full over the top.

Cloth basques to wear with odd skirts and plastrons have jacket fronts. Old basques are remodeled by cutting the fronts off at the waist line, adding jacket over fronts, girdle and sleeves of velvet. Habit basques of cloth to wear with striped or plaid woolen skirts have basques added across the fronts and sides, with cross or Newmarket seams.

The velvet jacket fronts that will remodel an old basque, or add elegance to a new one, may be cut short and round, or square across at the waist line. A narrow gimp to trim the edge is a matter of taste and expense only. The velvet must match the shade of the dress or plastron.

The invisible fastening of basques, so often alluded to, is made with hooks and eyes put on so as to alternate, first a hook, then an eye on the same side, which prevents any unhooking; but as this is very wearisome to fasten, many dressmakers use small safety-hooks and eyes, the latter set under the edge, so that only enough of them peeps out to slip the hook over.

Another plan is to use a separate fly, with buttonholes worked in it, sewed to the right side of the basque, and caught to it here and there between the button-holes, and then have very flat buttons on the other side, allowing a good lap, as none of these invisible fastenings must give the slightest hint of how they are held.

ture of black and green silk worked galloon. The French waist is without darts in the outside material, being full on the shoulders, and gathered to a slight point in front, with two bands of the trimming arranged in deep points.

The sleeves are gathered at the arm-sizes, and in to deep cuffs made of two bands of the galloon sewed together; the collar is of the same. A black moire sash is folded and passed around the waist, so as to preserve a sharp point back and front, and ties in the back. The waist hooks invisibly.

The full skirt has two bands of the trimming as a border, broken, however, by three narrow pleats of black surah on each side. The border could be omitted across the back, if desired, and the pleats be of the cashmere. The combination of black with gray, blue, green, and old rose is a stylish idea;

Figure No. 73 represents a remodeled jersey, though the design would be equally appropriate for a cashmere or cloth basque. The lower edge is of a round shape, with a border of moire silk tapered to a point in front, and running up each side as revers.

The vest may be of the woolen material, moire, or surah, with a collar of moire, and fastens in Breton style, sewed down on one side and hooked over on the other, or hooked invisibly. A moire ribbon crosses the front at the waist line, and should tie in loops and ends on the left side. The sleeves are slightly full over the top, and trimmed with moire cuffs.

Plastrons in fichu style, folds from each shoulder crossed at the waist line under a sash belt, remain in vogue with the now fashionable jacket fronts on coats and basques.

The short, wide Incroyable revers turned over the arm-size are stylish with the Directoire frill, which is a knife-pleated ruffle of silk, lace, or silk muslin about four inches wide, sewed on the scalloped edge of a basque or a waist from the neck to the waist line, ened in front with a passementerie ornament corresponding with those on the collar, cuffs, and top of the sleeves.

The blouse is made over a close-fitting lining, and fastens invisibly in front. The top part is shirred in puffs imitating a yoke, back and front, with full sleeves gathered in to band cuffs, and puffed at the top by gathering them in the arm-sizes and on each side for a short distance down the sleeve.

becoming costume for woolen or silk goods. If the extreme plain appearance is not desired, the basque may be trimmed with cuffs, and collar of soutache, velvet, etc. The coat sleeves are given an easy fit by a few gathers over the top, the collar is high, and the short basque has a pointed back.

The skirt is laid in three kilt pleats in front—three on each side turned toward the centre—with flat sides and full gathered back, which has the left edge cut to form a few jabot folds, with the upper part laid in a cluster of folds caught under a false pocket by two buttons.

design made over an ordinary coat sleeve lining. Two materials are shown, the darker being gathered along each seam, and caught here and there on the lining to keep the fullness in place.

The upper part is gathered over the top and on the lower edge, and then caught right side of the basque, and caught to it here and there between the button-holes, and then have very flat buttons on the other side, allowing a good lap, as none of these invisible fastenings must give the slightest hint of how they are held.

Cuffs are merely a wristlet band on the full shirt sleeves, or deep and pointed on Directoire coats. Leg o' mutton sleeves fit very closely about the wrist, and are prettily finished with turned-over cuffs of knife pleated muslin or lace.

When a skirt front is made full, with two or three tucks drawn up by ribbon or tape the tucks must be folded upward, and from one inch and a half or two inches deep when finished, according to thickness of the material.

Panels of silk, gathered in several rows over the hips, may have the gathers over a cord if wished, as any such individual fancies are now stylish if well done and becoming to the wearer. She who invents some trifling but striking "fad" in dress is now considered a fortunate and brilliant woman,

British Columbia.

VICTORIA, B. C., Sept. 30.—The past summer has been one of the driest seasons that has ever been witnessed in this far-off Atlantic Province. Notwithstanding the great drought, crops and cereals of all kinds have done remarkably well. The prairie folder, however, has not yielded to a thrifty point, in consequence of which cattle will suffer during the approaching winter. Stock ranchers fervently pray for a moderate winter. Last winter it was too mild, only 20° one morning in the Empire Valley, outside of which the thermometer registered at zero and above freezing point. In the Nicola Division farmers have suffered greatly from the grasshoppers having devoured nearly all their wheat crops, as also grass in hay meadows. Under the unfortunate circumstances Nicola people are selling their cattle at a sacrifice. They have got to do it, as they have no fodder for winter's feed.

Pretty Hard on a Poor Sport.

He had just come in from a day's fishing in the perch pool, and was in the act of opening his mouth to tell of his exploits when his wife, closing the book which she had been reading, said.

"Oh, it's you, George dear. I'm glad to see you back. It was so dull with you away that I took up the Bible to pass the time, and was reading the Book of Revelations as you came in. That's a wonderful book. And, just think, it says, 'All liars shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone.' Have you caught anything?"

"No, Mary," he answered; "I didn't—catch—a thing, but I thought, as I went out to get fish, we might as well have a string, so I called at the fish store and bought these."

She said she was glad to get the fish and talked to him with much cheerfulness; but he was gloomy and preoccupied, and scarcely said a word in reply, and in a short time, giving the excuse that he was tired, went off to bed.

HANGED WITH A SMILE ON HER LIPS.

The Last Woman who Suffered the Extreme Penalty in British Territory.

The last instance, so far as we are aware, of the hanging of a woman in British dominions was that of Louisa Collins, who in January this year was executed in Sydney for the murder of her husband, Michael Peter Collins. The woman belonged to the lower order of life, and had been exceedingly handsome. She married an elderly man named Andrews, who was considered well off in the circle of laboring folk to which he belonged, and by him had five or six children. They lived about eight miles from Sydney, on the shores of Botany Bay. In 1885 a young man named Michael Peter Collins lived in the house, more as a personal friend than a lodger. It soon became apparent to Andrews that an illicit connection existed between his wife and Collins; and the result was that, the latter was turned out of the house. He still, however, continued to visit the woman secretly. Shortly afterward Andrews fell ill, and after lingering a few weeks, during which time he was attended by a doctor and nursed by his wife, he succumbed.

Scarcely was his body cold before the woman posted to Sydney to claim a sum of money for which his life was insured, and the same night she and Collins, with some of their less reputable neighbors, indulged in a dance, followed by a debauch, in an adjacent house. The medical man who had attended Andrews entertained no suspicion, and gave a certificate in which death was ascribed, be it noted, to gastro enteritis. Within a week Louisa Andrews became Louisa Collins, and the newly wedded pair continued to reside in the same locality. Collins was a weak-minded young fellow, and perverted by the woman, became utterly worthless, continually losing his employment and falling into the habits of an idler, a drunkard, and a gambler. Eventually he seems to have lost the affections of the woman who had made him what he was, and in 1888 he fell ill and died. A similarity between his symptoms and those of his predecessor, Andrews, excited suspicion. A post-mortem examination revealed in his body. Arsenic was found in the house, and Louisa Collins was arrested. The body of Andrews was, by the direction of the Coroner, exhumed, and a minute quantity of arsenic was discovered in the coffin.

The woman was committed to take her trial on the the two charges of poisoning. The case for the Crown was overwhelmingly strong and the defence was very weak. Without entering into details, it may be mentioned that the woman obtained the poison in the form of a vermin preparation known as Rough on Rats. Although the case was perfectly clear and there was no conflict of medical testimony, five Judges in turn presided at her trials, and four juries being unable to agree were discharged. This is probably owing to the fact that the feeling in favor of the abolition of capital punishment is very strong in Australia. At the fifth trial, which was presided over by Sir Frederick Darley, the Chief Justice of New South Wales, the jury agreed to a verdict of guilty.

The country concurred in the verdict, and on Jan. 21 last the murderess was hanged in Darlinghurst jail, Sydney. Throughout all her trials this woman, who seemed to lack the most ordinary moral perceptions, preserved an air of complete indifference, and she walked to the scaffold with a firm step her lips curled in a mocking smile.

HOUSEHOLD.

Infants' Dresses.

The clothing of a young infant should be selected with the greatest care. Not only months of fretting caused by the irritation of ill fitting clothing, but the future health of the child may depend upon its clothing in infancy. All clothing for young children should be made of soft, fine material with felled seams and simple trimmings, which will not irritate the flesh which is softer than the rose-leaf. Lace is more suitable than Hamburg or needle-work because the edge of even the softest needle-work may chafe the skin. For the young infant under a month of age a simple slip of plain white nainsook is the most suitable dress during the day, to be exchanged for a cambric night-slip at night. After the child is a month old it may be put into dresses with yoke, yet many mothers retain the slip-dress till the child is three or four months old. One of the essentials is abundance of dresses so that changes are at hand in case of emergency, besides the regular daily change of clothing given the child at its bath hour. English nainsook, which comes without a dressing, dimity and English long cloths are the chosen materials for infant slips. These dresses are usually one yard long from the neck and are finished in dainty wardrobes with a three-inch hem-stitched hem or hand-hemmed hem with a cluster of two or three fine hand-run tucks above it or with two groups of tucks separated by a row of feather-stiching. The little yoke dress measures usually a yard to a yard and a quarter long from the yoke and the yoke measures from three or four inches in depth. This little yoke is made of hem-stitching or tucked and feather-stitched or finished with solid embroidery or lace. The bottom of the yoke-dress is much more elaborately finished than the edge of the slip and usually is finished with embroidery or hem-stiching and tucks, or tucks and insertion. There is considerable fancy now for a straight edge, either a hem-stitched hem or a hem with a wide insertion above it. A sash about four inches wide finished to match the dress should accompany each slip and dress. Many of the more elaborate robe dresses, such as are used for christening or any dressy occasion, are made with yokes of real Valenciennes lace and trimmed on the bottom with two or three rows of the same lace four inches wide and a cluster of fine tucks above the rows of Valenciennes. One such long dress is all an infant needs, but it is wise to provide at least six plain slips and six yoke-dresses, or six more slips, as the mother chooses. When the child is six months old or so, according to the season of the year and the health of the child, it is put into short clothes. The long clothes are then usually cut down so that they barely cover the feet. If the child we with ordinary rapidity at the age of a yar the skirts will just clear the floor when it stands and be suitable length when the baby walks. It is considered in the best taste to put nothing but white on an infant under a year old. No sprig of forgot-me-not or rose-bud is used in color, even on the little wrapper, till the baby is older. The wrapper is a non-essential article of clothing yet many mothers prefer it to the old-time blanket of flannel or merino. Exceedingly simple wrappers are made of cheese-cloth tufted, but cannot be recommended from a utilitarian standpoint because they are difficult to launder.

Caring for Shoes.

Shoes are one of the expenses of a toilet that may be reduced only by care. A worn disgrace and the line certainly does look better when all of a kind are hung together. The main object is to hang them so they will dry best, and if the baby is crying or the dinner burning it isn't wise to stand sorting over your basket to find a stray towel or shirt to hang with the others of its kind. Use plain wooden clothes pins and keep them dry in a bag or basket where they will be clean. If they are allowed to remain wet they will leave a black mark upon clothes. Take the clothes line in each week after the clothes are dry, but it is convenient to have an old piece left out permanently for drying odd pieces, for dish towels or airing clothes. The galvanized wire line is recommended for use only for its convenience; it is thought to wear out fine clothes.

A Ladies' Club.

The favorite ladies' club in London, where ladies' clubs are well known and very successful, is the Alexandra, named after the popular wife of the Prince of Wales, of couse, who has more things and people named for her than any other woman in the United Kingdom, not even excepting the Queen. It is the very smartest and most exclusive association of the sort in England—only those who have been presented at Court being eligible for membership—and just now there is a very pretty quarrel distracting the organization. No male creature over twelve years of age is allowed to darken its threshold, and even the attendants are all women to a man—so to speak. It has several bedchambers on the upper floor, and even the most carefully guarded woman is allowed to spend a night in London and put up at this Club. It is not in the least masculine in its tendency, there is no drinking allowed except of wine with meals, no games are played for money, and heretofore there has been no smoking, but last month on the committee board was written up a motion to add a smoking-room, and the motion was signed by two well known and titled ladies. Next day, below this proposal was written, "Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones propose that Lady Quelquechose and Lady Nemo are not fit members of this Club." And then there was such a monkey and parrot time that the Club really began to resemble a man's organization.

Host and Guest.

It is a tribute to both sides when people of different families can stay a fortnight in each other's houses and part with as high regard as when they met. But whether your beds and cooking are to your friend's liking or not, whether her manners suit your notions or not, one rule is binding on both if you would consider yourselves well-bred—that the confidence between host and guest is sacred.

Your guest is not to be "talked over" after she leaves; neither the holes in her stockings, nor her soiled petticoats, nor the way she lay abed mornings, nor the way she liked to attract attention, nor her appetite for Baldwin apples, anye more than she is to report what a shabby table you kept, or how dull the evenings were, or what a curious old lady your deaf aunt was.

Canned Peaches.

In canning peaches, one pound of sugar and one quart of water to four pounds of peaches are correct proportions. Weigh the peaches after they are pared and the stones removed, and throw into cold water. Put the sugar and the measured water into a preserving-kettle; let it stand over the fire until the sugar is dissolved, stirring constantly. Drain the peaches, and put them up once in the syrup; then move the kettl

The End of a Man-Eating Tigress.

The Forest School students, who are now out in the district of Jounsar, getting practical instruction in Indian forestry, happened to be encamped at the Forest chowkey of Mundali, some twelve or fifteen miles beyond the station of Chakrata. On the day of their arrival they heard of a buffalo kill close by; but being midday, they placed a man on a tree to keep off vultures and crows and intended returning themselves later in the evening to sit up for the tigress. Long before the appointed time, Mr. Ormaston and Mr. Hansard, the latter a student in the Forest School, saw their watcher runing frantically back toward the camp. On questioning him they found he had just seen the tiger coming up the revine toward the kill. They immediately took up their rifles and went off in search. Keeping fifteen or twenty yards apart, they walked rapidly off. But they had not proceeded far when, without the slightest warning, Mr. Ormaston, who was below, heard a groan, and saw Mr. Hansard suddenly borne down to the ground, with the tiger on his back. He was taken unawares, and it was a critical moment, but he stood his ground and kept his nerve, and in the next moment a 12 bore bullet went crashing through the tiger's spine. This brought her, mortally wounded, rolling down toward him, but a second shot stopped her further career.

As the camp was only a few hundred yards off, Mr, Ormaston hurried off for assistance. On returning they found Mr. Hansard, who evidently also rolled down the hill, lying insensible a few feet away from the long dreaded murderous tigress of Jounsar. On removal to camp Mr. Hansard soon recovered consciousness, but strangely remembered nothing of what had happened. He had been severely mauled about the shoulders and face, a tooth having nearly pierced his right jaw. He has been removed to the Chakrata Station Hospital, and, though his injuries are severe, he is doing favorably and is likely soon to recover. Mr. Ormaston is a very young officer just out from Cooper's Hill, and had joined the Indian Forest Department a couple of months ago. He had never before seen a tiger, and was not a practised hand at large game shooting in an Indian jungle. Consequently he deserves all the more credit and praise for his great nerve and presence of mind in a moment of such unusual and unexpected danger, and to him the Forest Department owes the life of one of its most promising students.

He Could Hope.

"So," he said in a broken voice, "you refuse to marry me."

"I do," she said, calmly and firmly.

"And I may not even hope?"

"Yes," she responded thoughtfully, "you may hope."

"And why," he asked with renewed fervor, "do you say I may hope."

"Because," she rejoined softly, "this is a free country."

Crushed.

Mr. Banklurk (at the close of the game)—What do you think of me as a ball player, Miss Minnie?

Miss Minnie—I think you'd make a splendid swimmer.

Mr. Banklurk—A swimmer? Why so?

Miss Minnie—You strike out so beautifully, you know.

Caring for Shoes.

Shoes are one of the expenses of a toilet that may be reduced only by care. A worn out shoe is not possible of renovation; no amount of skill will make it pass as new. The only possible way to save in shoe leather is to care properly for the shoes while wearing them. A writer in the Brooklyn "Eagle" makes some very wise suggestions about the proper care of shoes.

"Particular attention should be paid, in every home, to the care of shoes. Where there are children there is generally an accumulation of shoes partly worn and wholly worn, and these are all thrown in the bottom of the closet together and must be assorted when wanted. When taken out they are sometimes moldy, because they are thrown in damp and dirty. Many of these are of no use to the possessors, but are hoarded up with the idea that some day they will be needed; yet rarely is this true, as they are put away in such a rough condition that when taken out they are generally unfit for use. Shoes that are worn regularly, if cared for, will last much longer than if neglected. A French kid shoe, if kicked around on the closet floor or under the bed, will not last as long, or look as well as one inferior in quality if properly cared for. When shoes are taken off they should be wiped with a soft cloth, and after airing a little while, oiled or polished and put in a box by themselves, or a shoe-bag, and when wanted for use can be taken out ready for wear. It is not advisable to use much of the dressing, so fashionable for ladies' and children's shoes, as most of them crack the leather and ruin it. I have seen expensive shoes, the tops all cracked open in less than a month by the use of the dressing; therefore, unless you can find one that has been well tested, it is better to use a little sweet oil colored with black ink and rubbed well in. For some years past I have used a polish that has considerable glycerine in it, and found that it preserves the shoes wonderfully, always keeping them new looking. If a lift begins to wear off the heel, I have it attended to at once, and never take off the shoes without wiping all the dust from the crevices and putting them carefully away. The result is that I have worn one pair of boots every day for one year, and another year for a house shoe. I have a pair of boots that were made to order, for which I paid $8, have worn them every day for two winters, or rather from October to May, and shall wear them another, and perhaps two seasons. In the spring, I rub them well with oil and put them away carefully, and in the autumn they look as good as new. Never wear a shoe unbuttoned, if you care to have it shapely. Never put wet shoes close to the fire to dry, as it harden them and makes them difficult to put on. When taken off the foot wet, smooth into as good shape as possible, and rub them as dry as you can with an old soft cloth, then put them in a medium warm place to dry. If your shoes get muddy, wash them off with cold water, and rub dry with a soft cloth. This can be done quickly, so that the leather may not get wet through, then pulled into shape and left standing until quite dry. After this use a little good polish and the shoes will be as fresh as if quite new."

To Wash Flannels Properly

soak them in warm soap suds for a half hour, then wash by squeezing rather than rubbing; rinse in water of the same temperature. Transferring from hot to cold water and rubbing soap directly on to flannel causes it to full in a short time. Very nice housekeepers insist that clothes hung out haphazard are a removed, and throw into cold water. Put the sugar and the measured water into a preserving kettle; let it stand over the fire until the sugar is dissolved, stirring constantly. Drain the peaches, and put them up once in the syrup; then move the kettle back on the fire and let them stew gently until they are tender; then arrange carefully in jars, and fill to overflowing with the syrup, then seal, and set aside to cool.

Beyond the Gates.

Sometimes in dreams I see it,
This city fair and grand;
Its doors of jasper brightness
Stand forth on either hand,
'Twas here the pilgrim tarried,
And here good cheer awaits
The weary one who enters
At the opening of the gates.

Each window is an opal
With hues born of the noon,
Through which rich perfumes wander,
Caught from the air of June.
And here are sandals waiting
In which the weary feet,
New shod in royal splendor,
May roam the shining street.

Oh, City of the Beautiful,
Could waking heart forget
The gardens where the lilies
Like crystal flakes were set
Where heaven's doves in sunshine
Like rainbows went and came?
Where the sun woke swathed in azure,
And died on fields of flame?

Here, too, are fountains playing
To cheer this heart of thine.
And meadows flush with violets
And winds as rich as wine;
While each thing glad and beautiful
The loving soul awaits,
When once the veil is rended,
And we stand within the gates.

Dear City of the Holy,
For the walks of palm I long;
For the love that maketh lovely,
For the faith that maketh strong.
For thy green and growing cedars,
Thy lakes of silver calm,
For the peace past comprehension
That floods thine isles of balm.

Take Thou my hand, my Saviour,
The way is dark and wild.
Far off, a star, the city shines
It beckons on Thy child.
Joy! joy! they come, the beautiful;
A myriad host awaits,
And heaven refulgent floods my soul
At the widening of the gates!

HARRIET MABEL SPALDING.

He Had Lost His Grip.

A middle aged man with a troubled look on his face stood on the corner near the Central depot and attracted the attention of a passer by who inquired:

"Can I do anything for you, sir"

"Stranger," said the man, "I've lost my grip."

"Oh, brace up," said the other in a cheery voice, "you'll get hold again if you push in. It happens to us all some time or other."

"I'm afraid I'll never get it again," said the other sadly.

"Nonsense, man. Don't give up now when they've just discovered the elixir of life," advised his friend. "Take hold again like a man."

"What air you talking about?" asked the other, "I lost my grip with four new shirts in it, a new westcoat, a pair of suspenders, and my wife's photygraft. Just give me a chance and you'll see whether I'll take hold or not," and he walked off with a suspicious look at his late adviser.

YOUNG FOLKS.

FINE AND FANCY PIGEONS.

Most boys are fond of pigeons: they are nice pets and are easily kept. All the known varieties can be traced back to three originals—the Stock-dove, the Ring-dove and the Turtle-dove. Fancy pigeons have been developed by the ingenuity of breeders, and there are no less than forty-four independent species, each of which contains several varieties. They all have some peculiarities in shape, plumage or flight, and the boy who can promptly name all of them is not only a keen observer, but also something of a naturalist. The leading fancy pigeons, sometimes called artificial varieties, are the Fantails, Pouters, Tumblers, Shakers, Croppers, Trumpeters, Jacobines, Runts and Nuns.

The Jacobine has a hood or ruff of feathers, which grows on the back of the neck and encircles the head of the bird. It gets its name from the resemblance of the hood to the cowl of the Jacobine monks. The head is peculiarly small and the eyes are bright and pearly. Yellow is the best color for them, and their value depends on the length and bushiness of the appendage. The Nun gets its name from a similar tuft, which resembles a nun's veil thrown back from her face. The most perfect of the Nun variety are white, with the head and tail of another color, black preferred. Some go so far as to insist that at least six of the flight feathers must be of the same color as the head and tail.

The Fantails are black, blue or red in color, but the choice ones are white. It is a fine, showy pigeon, with a tail of from twenty to thirty-six feathers, which it spreads out like a fan. It struts about like a peacock, its wings spread and its tail so erect as to touch the back of its head. One with thirty-six tail feathers is considered a perfect bird. In rearing the young they must have more nest room than other young pigeons, or the tail feathers will be injured, which will affect the beauty and the value of the bird.

The Trumpeter is generally black-mottled, has short, feathery legs and a tuft of feathers at the root of the beak, and sometimes a hood at the back of the head. It utters a sound not unlike a trumpet.

The Tumblers derive their name from the singular habit of tumbling or rolling over and over in their flight. They are considered among the best of fancy pigeons, if they have all the points.

The Carrier is a noble-looking bird, with long neck and head erect. Around each eye is a circle of loose skin, ranging in color from a dull orange to a fiery red, the latter color preferred. There are wattles of soft flesh around the bill, white in the ordinary bird, but black in the most valuable kind. The plumage is generally dun colored or black, though in some rare cases the bird is blue pied. In training them when quite young, flights of a mile are sufficient at a time; the distance can be increased as they acquire strength and experience. They must be fed, but not overfed, before starting. If hungry they will turn aside to hunt for food; if overfed, they will be likely to loiter. They must be watered or thirst will lead them to seek to quench it, and no boy could blame them for doing that. Another thing is essential, they must be taken in a box or covered basket to the place where they are to be let loose. When liberated a good bird will at once rise high, and after making several circles in the air, it will start off in the direction of its home with an unerring certainty that has something wonderful in it. These pigeons were very useful years ago in carrying messages before telegraph and telephone were invented. Pigeon-cotes may be made round, square, triangular or eight-sided. They should be placed on a pole out of the reach Nationalism In England.

Although the Nationalistic movement in America still lacks several months of being a year old, its influence has already passed from America to England, where, as here, it is appealing to many people who hitherto have not been perceptibly affected by any form of socialism. Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward" is gaining an extensive circulation there, and one of the most significant evidences of its influence is its effect upon one of the most prominent of public men, Professor James Stuart, of Cambridge University. Professor Stuart is a prominent member of Parliament as well as an eminent man of science. His attention was called to Mr. Bellamy's book by Mr. Holiday, the well known artist, who, like William Morris, takes a deep interest in social questions. Professor Stuart was so impressed that he at once began the drafting of measures, for introduction into Parliament, suggested by the book and in harmony with its ideas. But it must be remembered that an introduction by him is a guarantee rather of rejection than of passage. The professor is regarded as a viewy politician, and his influence in the House of Commons is far from being as great as his friends anticipated for him. Other prominent persons in England are reported to have been equally influenced by Mr. Bellamy's work, and it has been proposed to form Nationalist clubs there on a plan similar to those organized in the States for giving definite form to the movement.

A STUDENT'S WILD LIFE.

Love, Elopement, Embezzlement, Penitentiary, Escape, Tragic Death.

John Hester was a well to-do farmer of Huron County, Ohio. He had one pretty daughter, who was sent to Oberlin to school. There she attracted the attention of an untamed youth from Michigan, whose wealthy parents had intrusted him to the refomatory energies of Oberlin, and no sooner had the youth declared his sudden passion than, without waiting for the sanction of the Michigan parents, she took him to her father's home in Huron County, and married him on the instant. The young man's parents were at first obdurate, but it was not long until the young people were invited to dwell under their roof. All went smoothly for some time. The young husband seemed a miracle of reformatory zeal, and a place of trust in his father's bank was given him. But soon he began again to find vice attractive, and one morning, while the wife had gone on a visit to her happy childhood's home in Huron County, he was missing from the bank, and so was $70,000 of the bank's money. It was supposed that he had gone to his wife, but that young woman and the Hesters professed such entire ignorance of his whereabouts and such grief over his sins that the detectives were led into paths of inquiry.

After several weeks of fruitless search, however, a clew was given them which led to the suspicion that the fugitive was making efforts to have his wife join him. On a certain day the officers were in Mansfield, where they suspected an appointment had been made. Sure enough, Hester and his daughter alighted from an omnibus before the hotel, and in a few minutes a single carriage drove up with one man in it. The young woman made a rush for the carriage, but the officers were there first. Considerable resistance to arrest was offered by the young fellow, who was armed, and in the excitement John Hester walked rapidly into the open country with a portmanteau in his hand. It was ascertained afterward that Hester, who was then an old man, walked, in that day and part of the next, the entire distance that lay between Mansfield and his home in Huron County—about forty miles.

The young man was taken back to Michigan, tried and sentenced to a term of years in the penitentiary, but no trace of the money was found. Within a few months after his imprisonment he escaped from the penitentiary with a horse thief, who introduced him into his line of business and into genteel housebreaking. After a few weeks of partnership this precious pair of scamps, while hiding one night in a swamp, fell into a dispute over a valuable watch, which belonged to neither. In the struggle which followed the young Michigander was stabbed to the heart, and in the morning his dead body was found by the officers in the swamp. The horse thief was afterward traced by means of the watch, and was tried and hanged for murder.

Fight with a Polar Bear.

In July, 1886, two whale-boatts were sailing leisurely across Shanta Bay in the Ochotsk Sea, when the harpooner remarked, "A big seal on the port bow, sir." This "big seal" proved to be an immense Siberian bear, which, caught on the ice floe in his search for seal, had taken to the water, and was swimming for land, a distance of at least five miles. From experience we knew this chap would be a formidable antagonist on shore, and any interference on our part would have been carefully considered. But this seemed a sure thing and safe, so to take in our sail and to get a harpoon and place ready was the work of a few minutes. It required no maneuvring to approach the old ncrring certainty that has something onderful in it. These pigeons were very eful years ago in carrying messages before graph and telephone were invented. ove-cotes may be made round, , triangular or eight-sided. They be placed on a pole out of the reach of cs and mice and sheltered from the cutting winds by a near by wall. The breeding cells should be large enough to prevent over-crowding, and it is very essential that the air should pass through them. There should be a projecting ledge in front of each cell or tier of cells, upon which the pigeons can perch. Each pigeon knows his own domestic retreat and will sit upon the perch in front of the opening with a keen sense of proprietorship.

The dove-cote should be lined with slate or plastered with cement to keep it free from vermin, which pester the birds very much. Sometimes the woodwork is made so that it can be taken apart and scrubbed. A loft in the roof of a house furnishes a good dovecote. The entrance should be in the gable and the main points are freedom from dampness, free access for air, plenty of room and safety from cats.

Pigeons begin to breed at the end of nine months, and breed every month, except in very cold weather. The nest boxes should be kept clean and should be changed after the birds are a few days old. Clean water must be kept constantly within their reach. The patent food and water boxes and bottles are good contrivances. They keep the birds from wasting the food, which they are apt to do. Salt is an occasional luxury to them and gravel is necessary, as it assists them in digesting their food. They are also fond of pecking at old mortar.

When pigeons get sick they indicate it by a loss of flesh, by refusing food, by sitting in a moping way with their feathers puffed out and their wings drooping. In most cases want of cleanliness proves to be the cause, and the best remedy is to fumigate the feathers with tobacco smoke to kill the vermin. Pigeons are subject to a disease called the roop. The wet roop is caused by dampness. It is a bad cold, and two or three peppercorns every other day is a good remedy. The dry roop is the wet roop with a cough added, for which cloves or garlic is a remedy. Another disease is the canker, which occurs when the birds fight and peck each other.

The exposed sore spots should be rubbed every day with a salve made of honey and burnt alum. When pigeons are generally out of health, which is likely to be while moulting, a little stimulating food, like hemp seed, will be good for them. Keep them warm and dry while they are changing their feathers, and put saffron and old rusty nails in the water they drink.—[Philadelphia Press.

Too Much For Him.

A letter just received from London says that the other day a thief broke into a mansion in Belgravia early in the morning, and found himself in a music room. Hearing footsteps approaching, he hid behind a screen.

From seven to eight o'clock the eldest daughter had a lesson on the piano.

From eight to nine o'clock the second daughter took a singing lesson.

From nine to ten o'clock the eldest son had a violin lesson.

From ten to eleven o'clock the other son took a lesson on the flute.

At eleven all the brothers and sisters assembled and studied an ear-splitting piece for piano, violin, flute, and voice.

The thief staggered out from behind the screen at half-past eleven, and, falling at their feet, cried out—

"For heaven's sake, have me took to the station, but cheese the bloomin' band!"

Other prominent persons in England are reported to have been equally influenced by Mr. Bellamy's work, and it has been proposed to form Nationalist clubs there on a plan similar to those organized in the States for giving definite form to the movement.

Substance of Happy Wedlock.

Children are the keenest of observers and the most practical of deducers; indeed, their deductions are often more astonishing than agreeable to their elders. Though we laugh we do not always enjoy having our weakness revealed to us by the babblings of babes.

Six little children were at play, and whether it was that they grew tired of familiar games, or that that innate principle, "It is not good for man to be alone," craved expression, they determined to have a wedding. John, aged eight, should marry Hatty, aged five, and brother Harry would speak "the words that bind."

Now, Harry had never heard a marriage ceremony, and was entirely ignorant of the prevalent pledges; but was he at a loss?—not he. He knew what papa and mamma considered of paramount virtue, and surely what they each so eagerly desired must constitute the requisites of a happy married life.

The candidates for wedlock were requested to stand side by side, and gravely obeyed.

"Hatty, will you get up in the morning and see that John has his breakfast in time, and that he has good things to eat, and never has to wait for his meals?'

'John, will you give her all the money she wants?"

That was all, but does it not contain the quintessence of married felicity?

The Prince of Monaco.

One of the best know sovereigns of Europe is dead. He was Charles III., Prince of Monaco. He was 70 years old, and he had ruled 33 years. His kingdom was the smallest in the world, having an area of but eight and thirty-four hundredths square miles, an army of 72 officers and men, and a population of less than 8,000; but his people were all noble, the Monacans having been ennobled in a body by Charles V. of Spain. In one respect the Monacans are a fortunate people. They pay no taxes for the support of the Government. These are provided for, and the expenses of administration taken care of, and the Prince has been enriched, by the tribute from the Monte Carlo Casino, the famous gambling establishment in the world. The Prince having provided for his revenues became deeply interested in philanthropic and scientific pursuits, and was an authority upon practical charity. His benevolence, however, receives sad commentary in the ignominies, ruin and suicide of the devotees of the tables which gave him opulence. He became partially blind many years ago, and resided most of the time in Paris. The Prince's son is said to be opposed to the gambling contracts, and will endeavour to abolish the Casino. He can afford to, with his magnificent inheritance. —[Rochester Democrat.

The "fan"-shaped waist gathered at the front and back is as popular now as at the beginning of the season.

The London Lancet comes out as the champion of codfish, which, it says, are habitually starved and tortured by fishermen. After they are caught "they are "immersed in the swells of smacks, and on "arriving in port some forty of them are "tightly crammed into a fish chest which is "kept under the water, often until they all "die from confinement and starvation." When in the smack wells it is said they are sometimes "specially secured by the tails to prevent them devouring each other."

this chap would be a formidable antagonist on shore, and any interference on our part would have been carefully considered. But this seemed a sure thing and safe, so to take in our sail and to get a harpoon and place ready was the work of a few minutes. It required no maneuvring to approach the old fellow, so with a full, straight head, a harpoon was fairly planted in his back.

Talk about transformation scenes—with a terrible snarl he leaped out of the water, he pulled at the harpoon until his brown sides bulged—with teeth and claws he crushed and twisted the Australian ironwood harpoon-pole into a thousand slivers. He "took' our line "hand over hand" until it spun through the "chocks" as if fast to a running whale. Failing to clear himself, he suddenly rushed for our boat, and before the order to "Stern all for your lives" could be obeyed both feet were on the gunwales, and we were only saved from capsizing, and perhaps something worse, by the prompt action of the harpooner, who slashed old bruin's paws with his sheath knife until he let go wild with pain and rage. All this had taken place in a moment, but we had learned in that brief time that a Siberian bear in the water was not to be fooled with. Once out of his reach we took great care not to get into his clutches again, and a skillfully-thrown lance soon decided in our favor. It was a two hour job to tow him in shore, but we felt amply paid by steak for supper and the sight of a bear that, although poor in flesh, must have weighed more than 1 000 pounds.

Made a Fool of Herself.

Mr. Jason—A nice fool you made of yourself at that sociable last night.

Mrs. Jason—Me? How?

Mr. Jason—Yes, you, telling Mrs. Chally that her baby looked good enough to eat.

Mrs Jason—Well, what's the matter with that?

Mr. Jason—Oh, nothing, only you know that they start as missionaries to the Cannibal Islands next week.

The Very Thing.

Juvenile Customer (doubtfully)—"I'm afraid you haven't any ribbon of the kind I want. Mamma said I must be sure to ask for mouse color." Salesman (equal to the emergency, producing a bolt of fiery red ribbon)—"That's what this is—crushed mouse color. How many yards."

Carpets are seldom troubled with mothworms except where hatched in a dark illventilated space and where it is moderately warm. It is for this reason no doubt that carpet-houses are seldom, if ever, troubled by them, the stocks in larger houses beging disposed of between seasons. Nearly all the trouble from moths emanates from the furniture, the burlap inside the outer covering being their best field for work, where they can be free from annoyance and find plenty to eat. Many furniture-dealers realise their danger, and cleanse burlap used with naphtha. It is when the worms are either tired of their food or it lacks the nourishment that they desire that they seek an outlet and drop upon the carpet. Cleansing carpets by the naphtha process is regarded as the surest and most satisfactory where there is the slightest suspicion of moth eggs or worms. It is especially adapted to pile carpets. Caution should be exercised as to the purity and clearness of the naphtha used and the thorough extraction of the grease, else the dirt adheres more easily than before. Where carpets are to remain in storage for some time, the odour can be left in the carpet. A more thorough cleansing can be assured by having the carpet beaten first. A surface application of naphtha will drive the impurities through the article, to be absorbed by that which is under it.

LATE CABLE NEWS.

Another Royal Betrothal—Germany's Jealousy of France—The Slave Trade in Zanzibar etc, etc.

It is semi-officially announced that Princess Margaret of Prussia is soon to be betrothed to Prince Christian of Denmark. Both have been staying during the week at Fredensborg Castle, where the royal family of Denmark is being visited by the families of the Czar of Russia, Empress Frederick, the King of Greece, and a host of minor royalties—in all one Emperor, one Empress, one Empress Dowager, three Kings, one Queen, four heirs apparent, and thirty-five imperial and royal princes and princesses. At the state dinner on Thursday evening the Empress Frederick sat between the King of Denmark and the Czar, and the King proposed the health of the Empress and her daughters, which was considered significant. It is said the Czar is bitterly opposed to this marriage, and the Emperor of Germany desires a higher alliance for his sister.

The increase in the French army under the last army act has naturally aroused the interest of the military authorities in Berlin, who consider that Germany must take corresponding steps. The chief obstacle is financial, as men are so plentiful in Germany that many thousands in every way fit for service have to be rejected every year. The example of France will probably be followed and these men called out in future. For this purpose, the Reichstag, it is expected, will be asked to vote means.

With the object of assisting Great Britain and Germany in suppressing the slave trade the Sultan has issued an edict empowering the commanders of English and German war ships to search all Zanzibarese dhows and other boats. The decree also provides that every person who enters the Sultan's dominions after November shall be free.

That Abominable Apparatus Called a Stomach.

A man's heart, it has often been said, has to be reached through his stomach, and a man's intellectual power, as well as his physical well-being, if not also, to a great extent, his moral and spiritual prosperity and progress, are to be determined very largely in the same way. The healthy mind and the happy heart are twin dependents upon the healthy body and the vigorous digestive apparatus; and these again take their character and condition very noticeably from the food used and from the way in which it is cooked and served.

It is quite true that a great many have originally what Carlyle used to speak of as "that abominable apparatus called a stomach." But large numbers have to blame themselves or their cooks for their chronic dyspepsia and consequent misery and bad temper. They have persistently and for years sinned against their stomachs, loading them with any quantity of indigestible stuff simply because they liked it, and their stomachs have by-and-bye, like "horses overdriven," rebelled and kicked out. In short, one of the great curses of our race is bad cookery, combined with injudicious selections of food material. Dr. Andrew Combe simply because they liked it, and their stomachs have by-and-bye, like "horses overdriven," rebelled and kicked out. In short, one of the great curses of our race is bad cookery, combined with injudicious selections of food material. Dr. Andrew Combe used to say that if men paid as little attention to the skins of their horses as they pay to their own they would soon have a poor account of the occupants of their stables. The same thing may be said of their stomachs. The farmer cannot afford to deal as hardly with the stomachs of his horses and cows as he too often does with his own and with those of his household. Think of the awful bread which is made to do duty on many a table, the miserably boiled potatoes, and the burnt or leathery or sodden pieces of tough, ill fed beef, to say nothing of the pies which naturally lead to nightmare and more or less pronounced profaneness. Many a husband would have been saved from the tavern and many a household broil would never have been known had mother or maid been fairly imitiated into the mysteries of cookery. Visitors to France, and especially to Paris, are specially struck with the general cheerfulness, light-heartedness and good humor among the French. It is merely because they are naturally thoughtless and inclined to frivolity? Not exclusively or even chiefly. It is because almost universally a very fair knowledge of cookery is possessed, which rises with many to the dignity of a fine art. Indigestion, with all its horrors, it is said, is scarcely known, and that because toothsome, thoroughly-cooked dishes are produced from less than half what English housewives and kitchen maids worse than throw away in the concoction of that by which, if the palate is not systematically outraged, the digestive organs are too frequently oppressed and in many instances ultimately ruined. In these days of intellectual pretence and polymathic smattering it may appear mean and behind the age to hint at the necessity of our girls being trained to all the mysteries of the kitchen; to darning stockings as well as to millinery and dressmaking. It needs to be done, however, and can all be secured without one of the real "accomplishments" being either lost sight of or forgotten. How can anybody be cheerful when dyspeptic, and how can dyspepsia be avoided so long as so many are three times a day forced to consume what no average stomach can meddle with and be safe?

—The Kingston Assizes begin on Monday next.

—The Steamer Varuna will bring an excursion from the head of the bay to Napanee on Wednesday next.

—The coroner's jury has returned a verdict of wilful murder against Peter Davis, who shot William Emery, near Marmora, on September 19.

—The rain yesterday had a dampening effect on the Camden and Amherst Island Fairs, and they were but slimly attended. Better luck next time.

—A. N. Diamond is in town with sample bags of barley in his hand. He looks quite natural and no doubt will make some stir in the barley market.

—When you are in town next week, call at THE EXPRESS office and pay your subscription. If you are not a subscriber drop in and pay $1 and have THE EXPRESS sent to you the balance of this year and all of next year.

—A. W. Grange & Bro. are agents for the celebrated National Oil, manufactured by the Standard Oil Co'y. This oil is guaranteed equal to the very best American oil, and will not smoke the chimneys nor crust the wick. Give it a trial. adv.

—The late Chief Allen will long be remembered and will be missed by the poor of this town, to whom they have been indebted for many acts of kindness in relieving their wants. Who will take his place in this respect?

—Mr. K. J. Strong has purchased the stock in trade and good-will of the business recently carried on by Mr. John Coates in the Saddlery and Harness line. Mr. Coates can be found at Mr. K. J. Strong's shop next to Messrs. Perry & Madole's hardware store.

—Rev. J. B. Clarkson and family leave next week for their new home in Montreal. We trust that Mr. Clarkson's enforced rest will be of short duration, and that he will be speedily restored to health so that he may continue in the work he so dearly loves.

—Rev. C. O. Johnstone will arrive tonight and will occupy the pulpit of the Western Methodist church, on Sabbath, both morning and evening. Mr. Johnstone is a young man and is said to possess marked ability. The Western will doubtless be crowded on Sunday.

—Hunting parties are now being organized. Game is said to be quite plentiful in the back townships and our local nimrods are determined to have some of it. As silver bullets are absolutely ruled out this year, some of the sports might as well stay at home.

—Mr. John Coates has decided to retire from business and has leased his shop to Mr. Taylor, of the Royal Hotel. Mr. Taylor will utilize the front shop as a tobacco store and through it an entrance can be gained to the billiard room situated immediately in the rear.

—Tuesday last was the day on which the regular sittings of the County Court should have been held, but as there was nothing to come before His Honor, there was no court. This speaks well for the people of Lennox and Addington but is rather hard on the lawyers.

—The Rev. John Gallagher, B.A., of St. John's Church, Pittsburgh, Ont., will deliver a lecture in the town hall on the evening of Monday next, the 7th inst., at 8 o'clock, on the following subject, namely: "Roman Catholocism: Its Origin and Development." A collection will be taken up at the close of the lecture.

New Fall Goods.

Parties wanting anything in fine clothing, gents' furnishings, hats or caps, should not place their orders until they have seen McAlister's new fall stock. They are showing a full range of the new patterns for fall and winter suitings. A special line of early fall overcoatings in handsome colorings, and a very fine assortment of elegant patterns in trouserings. Their new cutter, Mr. E. Young, will guarantee every satisfaction on all orders entrusted to him.

Selby Bridge Contract.

It is reported that a nice little job has perpetrated in connection with the rebuilding of Selby bridge. It is said that one of the faithful had the contract awarded to him at $500, whlle there were tenders in by responsible parties who offered to do the work for $300, and yet another party says it can be done for $250. Besides the extravagant price, it is alleged that the width is only thirteen feet, not sufficiently wide for teams to pass on it; but then who cares so long as a favorite is satisfied? Anyone anxious to know full particulars had better enquire of Mr. Nat Kimmet, of Richmond.

A Sad Case.

On Wednesday Capt. C. H. Nicholson, who has commanded the Hero for the past five seasons, left the boat and on Thursday started for Colorado with his young wife, who is a victim to that fell disease, consumption. Her medical advisers have recommended the trip as the last hope. Should the trip have beneficial results, it is probable that the captain will make his home in the west. The case is particulary sad as the couple were married less than two years ago, at which time the bride was the very picture of robust health. The captain's popularity on the bay route will —The Western church was appropriately draped in black on Tuesday last, in honor of Chief Allen, who for upwards of twenty years was a faithful worker in connection with that church. The gallery was hung with black cloth, and the altar and pulpit were draped with the same somber hued material, festooned with sprays of climbing fern. The effect was very pretty.

—On Saturday of next week a hunting party composed of T. D. Pruyn, S. C. Warner, S. H. Roblin and William Miller, leave for a two weeks trip into the rear of this county. They ought to have a jolly good time and we hope that they will get a full share of game. William Miller says that they are going to steer clear of the Judge and John Soby, and if he takes our advice he will do so. If the Judge should happen to tell John to take William prisoner we imagine that there would be lively times in the rear of Addington.

—Mr. Hawley, of Belleville, and formerly of Switzerville, has leased the Western shop in the new Rennie block, and next week will open out with a complete stock of boots and shoes. Mr. Hawley is too well known in this section to need an introduction to our readers. We welcome him back to his native county and trust that he will find business both pleasant and profitable. Look out for his announcement in next week's EXPRESS.

—A lunatic by the name of Christopher Harris, escaped from his friends on Monday evening and procuring an iron bar about four feet long, went to Baptist cemetery at Seeley's Bay and demolished a large number of tombstones and monuments. The damages amount to thousands of dollars. Harris' home is in the township of Storrington. At one time he was an inmate of Rockwood asylum and was only released from that institution in June last.

—The boy nuisance on Centre street, north of Denison's corner, is the subject of loud complaint by people living in that locality. What is the reason the matter is not brought before the council? Councillor Madole lives in that neighborhood; is he too modest to speak out? Some of the young hopefuls have been identified and if their rowdy pranks are repeated they will find themselves before the Cadi. An occasional visit from the police or night-watch might cool their ardor.

—On Tuesday the annual cattle fair was held at Tamworth, and it was surprising to see the falling off in the attendance of the previous years. Not forty head were offered for sale. One old time drover who has travelled that section for years, stated that the cattle are not in the country. The prices asked were exorbitant. The fair was not nearly the success expected, but outside of the scarcity of cattle, probably the inclement weather tended towards making it a failure, as the rain poured down in torrents the whole day.

—On the 15th of the present month the G.T.R. will begin extensive improvements in the vicinity of Napanee. The heavy grade just east of the town will be lowered twelve feet, and the big cutting will be widened for the purpose of laying a double track. As soon as these improvements are made the big bridge will be widened and other work done between it and the station. These changes will involve the expenditure of a good many thousand dollars in this vicinity within the next few months.

—At the regular meeting of the Young Peoples' Association of the Western Methodist church, held on Tuesday evening of this week, the following officers were elected for the ensuing half year:—President, Miss Lucy Edwards; Vice-President, F. Casper Bell; Secretary, J. Fred Tilley; Assistant-Secretary, Miss Emily Harmer; Treasurer, Miss Lucy Anderson. The Y. P. A. is in a prosperous condition, and during the winter months they intend pushing their work more determinedly than ever before. They now have a snug sum to their credit in the bank, but have a payment of $250 to meet on the first of December, that being one half of the amount subscribed by them towards the new parsonage.

home in the west. The case is particularly sad as the couple were married less than two years ago, at which time the bride was the very picture of robust health. The captain's popularity on the bay route will cause a feeling of sadness in every community, and a wish that the results of the trip may be most beneficial.

The London And Lancashire.

An addition has been recently made to the Canadian Board of Directors of the London and Lancashire Life Assurance Company. The Board as at present constituted consists of Sir Donald A. Smith, K. C. M. G., chairman; Messrs. Robert Benny, merchant; R. B. Augus, Montreal; and Sanford Fleming, C. M. G., of Ottawa. This prominent and progressive old company which has over a million of dollars invested in Canadian securities, has its offices in the New York Life building, and is, we understand, in vigorous progress, and securing its full share of public business in Canada.—Montreal Gazette.

Represented by G. A. Caton Gen. Agent, Newburgh, and N. A. Caton Local Agent, Napanee. adv.

PERSONAL.

—Mr. James Youmans, of Petworth, favored us with a call on Friday last.

—Mrs. McCaul, West Napanee is very ill, and is attended by Dr. Leonard.

—Messrs. Alex. Henry and W. F. Hall leave next Monday for a three weeks trip to Manitoba.

—Rev. Dr. Bredin, of Colborne, preached two very able sermons in the Western Methodist Church last Sabbath.

—Rev. Dr. Gardner, of Belleville, came down on Tuesday to attend the funeral of Chief Allen. He is the guest of Dr. Edwards.

—Rev. F. B. Stratton was in town on Tuesday. He says that the ladies of his congregation scored a big success with their pumpkin pie social last Friday evening.

—Mr. Frank Price, late of Dr. Ashley's office, is now seriously ill at his home in Camden. He is suffering from a combined attack of congestion of the lungs and typhoid fever.

—Rev. Mr. Craig and Geo. A. Brown came down from Deseronto, on Tuesday, as a deputation from the Masonic lodge of that town, to attend the funeral of the late James Allen.

—Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Gibbard are in Toronto. Mr. G. is attending the convention of the Ontario Undertaker's Association of which he was President last year and at this meeting vacates the chair to Mr. N. L. Bradshaw, of Stratford.

—Judge Wilkison and John Soby leave on Monday morning for a two weeks trip through the rear of Addington. The Judge will hold Courts of Revision and John will hunt up game. We have been promised an account of their trip from the pen of a well known resident of Napanee, who knows the route, and who will of cours be in a position to write it up in a racy style.

—Willie Lane left for Toronto on Monday morning and on Tuesday entered Toronto University where he will take a full course. His career will be watched with much interest for thus far he has displayed, remarkable aptness in acquiring knowledge. At the age of sixteen he headed the list in the Province in the examinations for first-class certificates. We wish him continued success and shall be pleased to chronicle many honors won and scholarships secured.

—Rev. Bidwell Lane, of New York, was in town on Wednesday the guest of his cousin Mrs. John R. Scott. Mr. Lane has recovered his health so as to be able to resume his pastoral work. He attended the prayer meeting in the Western Methodist Church, on Wednesday evening, and paid a glowing but well deserved tribute to the memory of his uncle, the late Charles Lane. We are rejoiced to see Mr. Lane once more in his accustomed health, and trust that he may long be spared to push the work for which he is fitted in such an eminent degree. Mr. Lane went to New York on Thursday.

—The Rev. John B. Clarkson offers by private sale at the parsonage of the Western Methodist church, a lot of household furniture, viz:—Fancy Chairs, China Dinner set, etc., etc.; also a very fine Upright Piano, (Mason & Risch) nearly new. Goods can be seen on Saturday, the 5th October and the following Monday and Tuesday. All prices under half cost. All goods remaining unsold will be offered by auction at the room of E. K. Bowen on Thursday, the 10th inst., at 11 o'clock.

RIDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1889. VOL. XXVIII, No. 45.

THE LENNOX FAIR.

GOOD SPORT AND A GOOD SHOW.

Lots of People but Rain Spoils Their Enjoyment.

Last week's bad weather gave anything but encouragement to the directors of the Lennox Agricultural Society, while Monday's gloomy weather sent their hopes down to zero. On Tuesday, however, although the wind was raw and cold, no rain fell, and a goodly number of people visited the society's grounds and witnessed the horse races. A number of exhibits were also present, the agricultural exhibitors being specially prominent.

SPEEDING IN THE RING

began about half past two o'clock. Messrs. John Prinyer, J. Johnson and Robert Davison, acting as judges. The first race called was the trotting teams. For this there were three entries made by Messrs. Frink, Sagar and Johnson respectively. In the first heat Mr. Frink's team took the lead and easily held it, the Johnson pair acting very badly. The second and third heats were captured by Mr. Johnson, with Frink's span second each time. None of the animals were beauties to look at, but they could all make the wheels go around quite lively.

THE STALLION RACE

was next called, the heats being sandwiched with those of the former race. The entries were as follows: W. D. Mace, (Tamworth,) Mambrino Mitchell; W. Hatch, (Picton), Staunton Jr.; General Middleton. The race was keenly contested, five heats having to be trotted before victory fell to the Picton representative. Mambrino won the first and third heats, the other three being won by Staunton Jr. It was a nip and tuck struggle throughout and neither party had much to boast of. Mr. Mace's horse was not in condition and under the circumstances trotted a mighty plucky race.

THE PACING RACE

was a hollow victory for Lester Boyes' "Billy," the only other entry being R. H. Potter's "Fred." Lester literally played with Fred allowing to come up and even pass him, and then, shaking the little horse up, he would slide bye without any apparent effort.

THE TROTTING RACE

brought out a field of four and it proved to be a double event, Hugh Milling's Little Tommy, and Henry Staffords Prairie Belle, making a race of it far in advance of Billy Clay and Maud S. who also had a lively time with each other. Prairie Belle was evidently held back for the purpose of allowing Tommy to win the race, which he did, taking the second and third heats. The race resulted in Tommy getting first place; Prairie Belle, second; Billy Clay, third; and Maud S. last.

Between the heats of this race there was a lively foot race between Zina Ham and Walter S. Herrington. "Dod" Boyes acted as starter and the lawyer easily downed the bailiff, much to the amusement of the over again and have better Judges appointed? Please put this in THE EXPRESS and see if something can't be done. I don't want my baby to have the name of being beaten out of the first prize, when it is the darlingest baby in this whole County. Yours truly, place ; Prairie Belle, second ; Billy Clay, third ; and Maud S. last.

Between the heats of this race there was a lively foot race between Zina Ham and Walter S. Herrington. "Dod" Boyes acted as starter and the lawyer easily downed the bailiff, much to the amusement of the crowd.

IN THE EVENING

the Palace was brilliantly illuminated, and a large crowd enjoyed a look at the exhibits and crushed each other to their hearts content. The chief attraction was

THE BABY SHOW.

Messrs. John Soby, Cyrus Allison and R. G. Wright were chosen Judges, and they performed their work in a manner which gave satisfaction to at least one of the exhibitors. A fine looking boy belonging to Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Gerow, carried off first honors, Miles Plumley's representative second and Mrs. R. Wheeler's baby getting third. Some of the crowd were highly indignant at the decisions, but of course it was impossible to please everybody. The first prize baby is the son of a good Reformer.

SECOND DAY.

Wednesday morning broke clear and cold, but before nine o'clock the cloudy appearance of the sky betokened rain at an early hour. By ten o'clock drops began to fall, and from that time till nearly 4 o'clock it was mussy weather. A large crowd found their way into the grounds in spite of the rain, and they were amply repaid for their venturesomeness.

The exhibit of horses, cattle, sheep, pigs and poultry was never before equalled in this county. We cannot begin to mention all of the good stock in the grounds, but we feel that we ought to make note of the fine horses displayed by Messrs. Potter, Johnson, Hawley and Hutchinson.

Messrs. Hogle and Stover, both of Ernesttown, had the best pair of War Cry colts that we have ever seen. They were simply faultless, and the judges had a hard time of it in deciding which should have the red ticket.

Mr. J. Johnson, of Ernesttown, exhibited a young stallion from the famous Rysdyck's Hambletonian, which is a magnificent animal. Chas. Hawley has a colt from this young stallion, which is a perfect specimen of horseflesh.

The contest between the sheep exhibitors was more than usually keen, and although exception was taken to some of the decisions, yet upon the whole they were about right. R. H. Frink got his deserts by receiving several red tickets. He owns some extra good Durham cattle, and has captured a lot of first prizes with them this fall.

NOTES.

The rain made the track so muddy that it was impossible to drive horses on it at anything faster than a good road gait, and of course a great many missed that feature of the show.

The usual number of side shows were on the grounds, but they did not appear to be very well patronized.

The ladies of the Eastern Methodist Church served a sumptuous dinner in the big tent. The meal was altogether too good for the money charged, and we are afraid that the treasury was not very much helped.

Secretary Hawley and Superintendent Doller had their hands full during the exhibition, but managed to perform their duties in an entirely satisfactory manner.

The following letter regarding the baby show has been handed in for publication:

NAPANEE, Oct. 9th 1889.

Mr. Editor.—I hope you will expose those Judges. They didn't know anymore about babies than I do about the moon. I didn't have a fair show at all, or my baby would have taken first prize. Don't you think the Directors will try it

YOUNG FOLKS.

Little Girl on the Wall.

Now the daylight is done, and the curtains are drawn,
And the katydids sing ll alone on the lawn.
And my little one cries, as she comes at my call,
"Can't I play with the little black girl on the wall?"

Tho' she's dollies that cry and a dog that can bark,
A Manx cat and fully equipped Noah's ark,
What delighted her most, ever since she could crawl,
Has been what she calls the black girl on the wall,

'Tis bedtime, and Bessie, our one little lamb,
Comes bleating, "O, mamma, I'm lonely, I am!
I've no brothers nor sisters—I've no one at all
But that dear little darling black girl on the wall.

"I don't see her by daytime—O, where does she go?
But at twilight she follows me—now to and fro—
Wherever I turn, and if I get a fall,
Why, then, down goes the little black on the wall!

Mamma, what does she eat, and, O, what does she drink,
And what does she do all day long, do you think?
Now she's little like me and next minute she's tall,
But I never can catch that black girl on the wall?

So our pet prattles on, when she's in for a race
With her shadow. (O, isn't life just such a chase?)
And she dances like mad down the fire-lighted hall
As she hunts for the little black girl on the wall.

SAVED BY THE TOWN CLOCK.

A Fairy Tale of Love and Law in Queer Old China.

A way off on the other side of the Pacific Ocean, in China, the country of oriental splendor, there was a town called Cington In this town dwelt a little girl named Loo-La, only fifteen years old. Thick brown hair curled on the top of her head, just like grown people's, and was held in place by a big butterfly pin. She wore the prettiest silk gown that was all pink and blue and embroidered with lovely flowers, and which covered even the toes of her tiny feet.

Loo-La was sweet-looking enough to eat—with rosy face just like a piece of velvet or a peach, and such brown eyes you could almost read by them every thought in her brain.

Loo-La's grandfather, a venerable old gentleman, was a Mandarin, still holding a very responsible position, although already eighty years old. For forty years of that time he had discharged his duties faithfully, gaining the love and esteem of all his neighbors.

Alas! one day he neglected his duty, a fault unpardonable in the eyes of the law. He forget to wind the town clock. For this he was sentenced to have his head cut off the next day at 3 o'clock.

All loved Loo-La, and tried to comfort her, but they could not, for he was her only living relative. The people went around with very long faces in Cington over his trouble. Chon-Tim's head. Being rich it was a big inducement for the young men to strive for.

Now it so happened that a nobleman's son named Fun-Nee, while fishing in the lake the day before, had caught the fish with the ring in it. He had given the fish (not knowing the contents) to a poor family who had a very ragged son named Sing Lung who had found the ring while cleaning the fish. Sing Lung not having nice clothes to wear to claim the Mandarin's daughter, went to Fun-Nee and told him his trouble.

Strange as it may seem, he was glad to hear of Sing Lung's good fortune. To help the suit along he loaned him his clothing and wore Sing Lung's rags instead. Not proud of his uniform Fun-Nee ran off to the lake. There he saw Loo-La asleep on the bank. He thought her the loveliest little creature he had ever seen. He gazed with rapture on the pretty picture and was turning away when Loo-La rolled in her sleep off into the water. Being brave as well as handsome, Fun-Nee sprang in and rescued her. She was not hurt, only frightened, and Fun-Nee soon allayed her fears and led her to the town. Unfortunately the customs of China did not allow him to make love personally. If it had, the chances are he would have told her the old, old story straight on the spot.

At the town they saw Sing Lung leading the fat Mandarin's daughter before the envious people. The ring was found, but the Emperor lived ninety miles away, and it was 2 30. Furthermore, news had been brought of the arrival of the executioner. The lean Mandarin took a duty upon himself and climbed to the clock and turned it back an hour. Sing Lung, dressed as a noble, was called on for advice. He, bright soul, took the ring and started to go ninety miles and back in thirty minutes. The executioner came, was much surprised to find he was too early, and was just turning away when the clock struck 3.

Every one groaned; the lean Mandarin had forgotten that the clock would strike. The executioner looked solemn, drew his sword, wiped it on his sleeve and called for the prisoner. The lean Mandarin asked if he couldn't postpone it six weeks.

"No", replied he, "but I will take a substitute."

"Who shall it be?" demanded the lean Mandarin.

The executioner looked interested. "Suppose you try it, sir. You are tall and wouldn't miss your head, I'm sure.' But he refused the honor.

Fun-Nee was told who Loo-La was and all the details. On hearing the sad story he stepped up and offered to be the victim. He was poor and ragged and the mob cheered him for his devotion, for his noble birth was not known. It was not of so much consequence after all. Already he had fallen on his knees for the beheading, when Loo-La ran up and cried: "He must not die. I will die first."

Then they all cried: "Foolish child! He will save Chon-Tim See! he is ragged and poor!"

She answered, "He must not! He saved my life to-day."

Then it was noticed for the first time that both were wet.

The executioner locked away to hide the tears, but soon saw a man coming that caused his heart to harden for the loss of his fee.

The messenger had a reprieve and further news that the Emperor was only a mile away! The potentate came, and all his people fell down on their knees, rubbing their faces in the earth. Sing Lung was near him, very proud.

The Emperor was glad to see Ring Tail, his old hunter, and from him he learned all the facts. No one noticed how pale Fun-Nee turned as the nobleman in the robe came

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.

A Man's Breath Takes Fire and He Burned to a Crisp.

Twelve years ago last month, in August, 1877, a man met death in a peculiar and horrible manner in San Francisco, says a Californian correspondent. Believing that the full facts have never been known the writer sends the following account: James Harley, the victim, had just recovered from an attack of delirium tremens. He had been a regular sot and was thoroughly soaked with alcohol. His last attack of the "jim jams" was the third he had undergone within a few months. On the morning in question he had started on another spree. At about 11 o'clock in the day he had about all the liquor on board he was able to carry. Stepping into a saloon on one of the principle streets he called for a swig of "bug juice," which was promptly refused, the bartender noting the condition of the man and remembering his late battle with the snakes. Harley scowled and turned to a gas jet to light his pipe. A second later there was a drunken moan, a flash of alcoholic flame, and Harley fell heavily to the floor, his head and neck veiled in smoke, while blue jets of flame were issuing from his ears, mouth and nostrils. As soon as water could be procured (water was a commodity rather scarce around such places) it was dashed into the sufferer's face, not in time, however to save his life. The face was as black is that of a negro. The ears were charred, the inside of the mouth black, and the tongue burned to a crisp.

Polly and the Hen.

Our next neighbor—writes a correspondent—owned an amusing parrot which was always getting into mischief, but usually got out again without much trouble to herself. When she had done anything for which she knew she ought to be punished, she would hold her head to one side, and eying her mistress, protest in a sing-song tone, "Polly is a good girl," until she saw her mistress smile; then she would flap her wings and cry out in exultation. "Hurrah! Polly is a good girl!

She was allowed to go free, and usually took her exercise in the garden, where she promenaded back and forth on the walks, sunning herself, and warning off all intruders.

One morning a hen strayed out of the chicken-yard, and was quietly picking up its breakfast, when Poll marched up to her, and called out "Shoe!" in her shrill voice, emphasizing the command with a smart pick of her sharp beak on the chicken's head. The poor hen retreated to her own quarters, running as fast as she could, followed by Poll, who screamed "Shoe!" at every step.

The hen had her revenge a few days later, when Poll extended her morning walk to the chicken-yard. Here, with her usual curiosity, she went peering into every corner, till she came to the old hen upon her nest. The hen made a dive for Poll's yellow head, but missed it. Poll, thinking discretion the better part of valor, turned to run, the hen, with her wings wide-spread, following close after.

As she ran, Poll screamed in her shrillest notes, "O Lord! O Lord!"

A member of the family, who had witnessed the whole performance, thought it time to interfere in Poll's behalf, as the angry hen was gaining on her. He ran out and stooping down held out his hand. Poll lost no time in travelling up to his shoulder. Then, from her high vantage ground, she turned her head to one side, and looking down on her foe, screamed, "Hello there! shoo!"

The frightened hen acknowledged defeat by returning to her nest as rapidly as she was sentenced to have his head cut off the next day at 3 o'clock.

All loved Loo-La, and tried to comfort her, but they could not, for he was her only living relative. The people went around with very long faces in Cington over his trouble. Some went about wailing, some fell down on their knees to rub a sorry nose in the grass, and others held indignation meeting to discuss the cruel wrong—all because they all loved Loo-La and Chon-Tim, her grandfather.

But the law must be enforced. How to do it and save him was the conundrum. The big clock waiting to be wound looked as puzzled as the rest.

The other Mandarins, very dear friends of Chon-Tim, were greatly puzzled. They looked wise, scratched their chins, rubbed their noses and studied the law books so hard they wore the backs off.

The Fat Mandarin with the little nose suggested taking Chon-Tim from prison to his own clock to wind and set it.

The Lean Mandarin with the big nose advised turning the clock back. They frowned at him. They had to have time, and Chon Tim was the only one able to produce it. So they took him from prison to the clock, which he wound for perhaps the last time. All the people felt that it was his last opportunity: but the minute it ticked again they felt so joyous and hope was also revived that they promised him as he was led to prison he should be saved. He shook his gray head solemnly and answered: No, no! my friends. I shall die. Only be kind to Loo La"

The Fat Mandarin did not mind a little water even taken like that, and he went inside and kept Ring-Tail from coming out. The Lean Mandarin took a ladder and kept him from going in; then they all cried: "How save Chon-Tim's head?"

Ring-Tail made a violent struggle, pushing the Big Nose down the ladder and pulled the Little-Nosed Fat Mandarin half out the window so that he could neither get in or out. This was owing to the fact that he had a big heart; which often fell to his shoes and shrunk his body to the size of a small man's frame.

The people gave no heed to him. Ring-tail was the hero of the hour. He knew just what they wanted. After much deliberation he spoke as follows:

"Kind friends, when I was Chief Hunter to His Majesty the Court went hunting in the Forest of Bang-Tan. He was attacked by a tiger. The nobles fled from him and I pierced the tiger with my spear just as he would have crushed the Emporor. For that he gave me a red pearl ring, saying: 'Whoever presents that to me shall have any favor granted.'"

Then the mob shouted: "Where is the ring?"

"My friends, I lost it in the lake and a fish swallowed it."

All ran on hearing this and brought fishing tackle, and the road leading to the lake was black with people. Some had poles some only lines and some bent pins and, spools of thread. They fished all day and all night and they fished it dry, but they found no ring. So each one took some fish, and left the lake deserted.

Loo-La, who had been up all night, cried when she saw the solemn fishers. She would try herself to catch the fish, she said. Having borrowed a pole, she went to the mossy bank, and there, instead of fishing for her grandfather's life, fell asleep to dream beautifully.

The fat Mandarin caught in the window also "stayed put" until morning. To get out he had to kick the frame loose. He fell down, but from a distance he too had caught the fishing fever, and he got quickly up and flew to the lake. He met the unsuccessful ones returning without the ring, which so disappointed him he immediately offered his daughter as a prize to the one who would save people fell down on their faces, rubbing their faces in the earth. Sing Lung was near him, very proud.

The Emperor was glad to see Ring Tail, his old hunter, and from him he learned all the facts. No one noticed how pale Fun-Nee turned as the nobleman in the robe came up. His Majesty placed his hand on Chon-Tim's head and spoke: "To save this old gentleman's head I have to break the law. Who will be a substitute?" Sing Lung looked at Fun-Nee's rags and answered: "Your Majesty should take the most ragged man to be found. The tramps are a disgrace to this town."

Some one asked: "Where is Sing Lung?" The owner of the name turned pale, but said nothing. Then Fun-Nee was pointed out and asked: "Why not this one? He looks like Sing Lung's twin brother."

The Mandarin spoke and bowed.

"Your Majesty," he said, "I fear you will have to cut my head off and cut me in halves to get this wooden collar off."

The Emperor smiled and answered: "No, my friend, we cannot spare you! Fat Chinamen are scarce. But who are you?"

"I am, Your Majesty, Pluck-Em, a man of law and a Mandarin of Cington."

"How much law do you know?" inquired the Emperor.

The fat Mandarin looked puzzled and then brighter, and replied: "There is a law that says, 'No man shall be killed by the clock.' Now your Majesty, Chon-Tim is to be killed at 3 by the clock? That's against the law, is it not?"

The emperor said it looked that way, and immediately pardoned all offenders. Pluck-Em chuckled saying, "I, Pluck Em will save'm, even if they are boodle Mandarins."

Barnee, the noble in the green robe, had emigrated from Erin to China, but hadn't left his brogue behind. He caught Sing Lung by the hair.

"Ye blackguard, how came ye by the coat? It looks loike me son's; but ye are no son of mine, ye almond-eyed ocolie!"

Chon-Tim Loo-La and Fun-Nee were all hugging at once and they went to the Emperor and told him what Fun-Nee had done.

"You are a brave lad," he said, "to save a girl and offer to die for her grandfather."

"I only did my duty, Your Majesty," answered Fun-Nee.

Just at this affecting point Barnee, the noble in green, rushed forward and howled: "Howly Moses! I hear a voice like music on me ears; show me the speaker." Seeing Fun-Nee he embraced him and continued. "Ah, ye darlin blackguard, wid dem reges on and the long coat; ye mind me of the town of Kilmarah, County Clair, and the day I druv Miokey Finn's pigs to pound, and skipped. Ye are me own son. Where are all yer good clothes?" Then it was speedily all explained and Sing Lung ran to the lake and drowned himself. The red pearl was given to Fun-Nee for bravery, unselfishness and devotion, accompanied by a fine speech on things in general by the fat Mandarin. Fun-Nee, of course, immediately presented it to little Loo-La as a lover's gift, for it was even then settled that he was going to marry her some day.

And so all were happy, none happier than Fun-Nee and Loo-La. And there was a grin on the face of the town clock.

The Whole Truth.

Judge—"Miss, what is your age?"

Witness—"I am past twenty."

Judge—"You must be more explicit."

Witness—"Well, I am between twenty and thirty."

Judge—"No more trifling. State your exact age."

Witness—"I'll be thirty day after to-morrow."

Then, from her high vantage ground, she turned her head to one side, and looking down on her foe, screamed, "Hello there! sheo!"

The frightened hen acknowledged defeat by returning to her nest as rapidly as she had come.

Sensible Advice.

A curiosity of literature was that drawn from the Duke of Wellington by an autograph hunter, who wrote him a pathetic letter purporting to be in behalf of Mrs. Tomkins, washerwoman to the Marquess of Douro, the duke's eldest son, and setting forth a plea that the young man had not paid her bill for at least three years.

After mature consideration, the Duke of Wellington, who was most punctilious in matters of correspondence, sent her the following reply.

"Field-Marshall the Duke of Wellington has received a letter from Mr. Tomkins, stating that the Marquess of Douro is in debt to his mother, Mrs. Tomkins.

"The Duke of Wellington is not the Marquess of Douro.

"The duke regrets to find that his eldest son has not paid his washerwoman's bill.

"Mrs. Tomkins has no claim upon the Duke of Wellington.

"The duke recommends her, failing another application, to place the matter in the hands of a respectable solicitor."

How He Squared Himself.

Mr. Stayathome (handing his wife the paper)—There, my love, read that account of the terrible destruction along the coast and you will understand why I did not take you to the seashore this Summer.

Mrs. Stayathome—And you knew all the time this tidal wave was coming, George?

Mr. S.—Yes, my dear. I had made astronomical calculations to that effect, but for fear I might be mistaken I said nothing about it. Still, so positive was I that I was right that I could not trust my little lovey within reach of the cruel waves.

Mrs. S.—Oh, George, can you ever forgive me for reproaching you?

Mr. S. (with great condescension)—Certainly, dear, certainly. Think no more about it.

And George lit a cigar and walked out on the lawn with the air of a man who had forgotten more than Solomon ever knew, and Mrs. S. believed he actually had.

The Pirates of the Behring Sea have not been able to prevent the British Columbian sealers from reaping some part at least of the seal harvest, for four thousand seven hundred and fifty sealskins, worth thirty-six thousand dollars, have recently been shipped from Victoria to London via Montreal.

The seat of the bitterest hostility to the Jews has been the city of Vienna, but vengeance seems to have come upon it at last. A great event in Vienna every year has been the International Grain Market, the great market for the continent. Last year 6,000 persons attended it. But last spring Hebrew resentment was stirred to such a point that 250 firms of Buda-Pesth signed a declaration that they would not deal in Vienna, and the movement was supported in various towns of Hungary and in Prague. The Vienna Association seeing the dangerous extravagance to which the anti-Semitic agitation had been carried, petitioned the Emperor to allay it, but the result could not be avoided. The efforts of the Jews have made the corn market of this year a comparative failure. Instead of the 6,000 merchants of 1888 there have been but 2,000, and a proposition has arisen also to establish another international corn market in Paris.

In Memoriam.

BY LULU W. MITCHELL.

When the summer fields are faded; when the leaves are russet-red.
When the wind is ever sighing for the grace and beauty fled,
When the katydid at even shrills her lone,
assertive call,
When the grapes in perfect clusters purple
all the garden wall—

When at morning and at evening all the hills are wrapped in mist,
When the blazing sun at noontide lights a dome of amethyst,
When the thrush from dusty thickets,
earlier "Good night" begins,
When the creaking harvest wagons bear new loads to barns and bins—

Farewell, summer! Oh, to say it how the woodland spirit grieves!
Tender requiems are murmured through the gold and crimson leaves Farewell, summer! Oh, to know it, what a chill creeps around the heart,
Leaden skies and winds of winter haste to sunder us apart.

Well may we chant mournful measure for the time of falling leaves,
Now the reaper has bereft us, to make up his harvest sheaves,
He has given rest for suffering, from weary weight of years,
To one serenely ready, troubled not by doubt or fears.

One whose life was full of gracious deeds of charity and love,
What his creed or if he had none, matters not, since God above,
Knew the helpful, kindly spirit, prompting
all he did or said,
From a heavenly Father's judgment, such as he have naught to dread.

Leave him then, his mossy pillow soft to rest on after pain;
We are better for his being. Some day we shall meet again,
But each year, when summer leaves us, and we scan the autumn skies,
Tear-compelling thoughts of sadness in remembering hearts must rise.

Asiatic Cholera.

OTTAWA, OCT 10—The Department of Agriculture has received advices through the usual channels that Asiatic cholera is epidemic and has obtained a footing in south-eastern Europe, Turkey and Greece and some parts of Hungary being affected. The reports state that the disease is following its usual course towards central and western Europe with great rapidity. It was confined to Mesopotamia during the first five days of Aug., and on the 14th made its appearance at Baghlad, but since then has quickly travelled into Europe. Baghdad is in desolation and nearly deserted. Up to the end of August the number of deaths had reached 2,050. The march of this dreaded disease along the old routes from its habitat in the east furnishes a warning note to all sanitary associations to be on the look-out for it, and Canada's increasing traffic between the east and our Pacific ports should induce increased vigilance in that quarter.

takes on a different aspect. Why any looker-on should laugh, is more than we can imagine.

A missionary to Africa one day took some gifts to the tent of a chief, to begin an amicable acquaintance, and he thus tells in "Two Kings of Uganda" the story of a deserved lesson inflicted on himself.

"I took the three little guns, which I had provided as presents to the chief, and was presently invited into the straw-built house, where he received his chiefs and visitors. There I duly presented my offering.

"In showing him how to load one of the carbines, I happened, before inserting the cartridge, to point the gun at my host. He nervously put it aside with his hand, and I could not help smiling at his apprehension. This he evidently noticed, and so he gravely took the carbine from me, deliberately loaded it, and pointed it full at my breast.

"It was my turn now to be dismayed, and I quickly put aside the muzzle, as he had done, saying at the same time, 'Poli, poli! Gently, gently.'

"This was just what he wanted.

"'Poli, poli, is it?' he cried. 'Oh no; so the Muzurqu—white man—does not like a gun pointed at him!'

"The old fellow shook with laughter, and continued to repeat 'poli, poli,' between bursts of merriment."

Changed Appearances.

A droll anecdote is told of the Persian ambassador, in London. At a recent fete, he asked to be introduced to a Parisian premiere danseuse with whose dancing he had been enchanted at the opera house. The lady was presented and the Prince made some remark, which, on being translated, was found to be that "he did not know her with her clothes on!"

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the forumla of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, asthma and all throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. HEALTH.

Home Sanitation.

"No man is entitled to a home unless he can make that home happy and healthful. He has no right to be the means of bringing misery to others or to leave to posterity the legacy of ill-health or constitutional weakness. It is the duty of all to be healthy, and to so observe the laws of hygiene that he may contribute the full measure of his individual well-being to the public good. His indifference or neglect of health laws and the observance of the sanitation of his home is not only a crime against himself, but an infliction of a wrong on the public and a burden on posterity.

"A mistaken idea obtains that an epidemic must prevail before there is need of any sanitary precautions, when the truth is, such epidemics are always evidence that these precautions have been fatally neglected. Moreover, the greatest mortality does not result from epidemics, but from deaths constantly occurring in the course of such diseases as are admitted to be wholly preventable, and result most frequently from the unsanitary conditions of neglected homes and, in the absence of inspection and preventative means, extend throughout communities. Such diseases as diphtheria, scarlet fever, typhoid, and others of this class, are constantly carrying off victims, and, in the aggregate, far surpass the deaths in epidemics. These diseases, if they do not result directly from ill-kept homes, find in such homes a lodgment, and their virulence and extent is increased.

Hygiene for the Young.

Children should be taught to stand straight, to hold up the head, with the chin down, to throw the shoulders back, to keep the stomach in, and to stand on both feet, not bear all the weight of the body on one. It is excellent practice for any one to walk with a good-sized book on the head, and children are benefited by practicing every day, gradually increasing the weight. Show them how to breathe. Tell them that, in order to get their lungs well filled, they must lift the chest, and lower it to send the air out, and that they cannot do so by breathing just below the throat, but must make use of the great muscle, the diaphram, that is just below the lungs. Then show them how important it is that clothing should always be loose, and tell them what the results will be of compressing the organs. A teacher must wear her own clothing properly, however, before she can teach others to do so; and often her example will influence a pupil more than any amount of talking. If all these things are taught them, they will be healthier girls and boys and better women and men than if you allow them to sit and stand in crooked position. Look among the men and women around you, and you will be suprised to find that not more than one out of every hundred will stand or sit as he should.

THE RACES OF MANKIND.

There Are 72 of Them Existing Now—All Came from Asia.

M. de Quatrefages, the feading French ethnologist, in presenting the second part of his "Introduction to the Study of the Human Races" to the Academy of Sciences, has given an interesting summary of his general conclusions with regard to the origin and distribution of mankind.

Neglecting the minor differences, he estimates that there are no fewer than seventy-two distinct races in the human species. All those decend or branch off from three fundamental types—the black, the yellow, and the white, which had their

A WOLF FOSTER MOTHER.

Stories have been told from time immemorial of animals suckling children and endowing them with a beast-like nature through the nutriment thus furnished. These stories have been looked upon more or less as fanciful creations, but a genuine instance of an occurrence has been recently proven in this country.

Some twenty months ago a negro woman living in Texas on the banks of the Brazos, missed her 3 months-old baby from the pallet where she had left it lying during an absence of a few minutes. Search was made for the infant, but no trace of it could be discovered, and the whole affair was wrapped in profound mystery until a few days ago.

A party of gentlemen were riding through a somewhat unfrequented portion of the thick woods that border the river, when they were startled by seeing a strange object run across the road. Thinking at first that it was a wild animal, several of the party were about to fire on it, when the one who had been nearest it called to them not to shoot, but to ride it down instead. This was done with difficulty, for the underbrush was thick, but at last the creature was overtaken in a dense copse. It was half running, half leaping, first on all fours and then nearly upright.

The gentlemen dismounted and attempted to lay hands upon it, but chattering frightfully and savagely biting and scratching, it broke away from them. They could see that it had a human face, though the brown body was covered with long, tangled hair, and the nails of the feet and hands so long and curved as to be claws. It ran with incredible swiftness, getting over fallen trees and dense masses of creepers at a rate that obliged its pursuers to exert themselves to the utmost to keep it in view.

It finally ran into an immense oak tree that lay uprooted in the ground and the hollow trunk of which formed a yawning cavern. By dint of poking in the tree with sticks the party succeeded in driving out an old wolf, which immediately took to its heels. It was not pursued, as it was not the object sought. This, too, was finally dislodged and lassoed with a lariat made of hides. It bit and scratched so fiercely that it was thought advisable not to approach it, so that it was half dragged, half led home with the lariat about its neck, howling and yelping like a wolf.

The fact of the negro woman's child having disappeared was well known to all and it was decided that this must be the child. The old wolf had evidently stolen it and for some reason adopted it as its own. The mother declared that this conjecture was correct, claiming that her child had had a malformation of one ear, which peculiarity was found in the monster. It is kept tied up in her cabin, suffering no one to lay hands upon it, and is fed on raw meat, as it refuses to touch any other food. The woman has hopes that she may yet reawaken the human in it, but in the meantime she is reaping a harvest from the crowds who come daily from all parts of the county to inspect the strange creature.

A Well Deserved Lesson.

There is a druggist in this city who is in danger at the hands of two young ladies upon whom he recently played a most outrageous trick.

Among the other features of this druggist's counter display is an unusually fine and costly line of perfumery. For the past week he noticed that two very vivacious, pretty and well-dressed young ladies who made frequent visits at his store were in the habit of nonchalantly helping themselves to the odorous liquid. They would drop in to make some such purchase as five cents' worth

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

The Make-up of the Famous Force Which Keeps the Peace in Ireland.

The Royal Irish Constabulary is at present composed of the inspector-general, the deputy inspector-general, three assistant inspectors-general, of whom the commandant of the depot is always one; the town inspector of Belfast, thirty-six county inspectors, a doctor and barrack master, both residing at the depot; ninety first-class district inspectors, ninety second-class district inspectors, forty-five third-class district inspectors, 260 head constables, some 2,400 sergeants and acting sergeants, and some 9 600 constables. Of the non-commissioned officers and constables 236 are mounted, some fifty or so being at the depot and the remainder scattered about through the country in the more important headquarter towns.

The inspector-general, deputy inspector-general, and one of the assistant inspecsors-general, besides the commandant, reside in Dublin and have their offices in the Constabulary Department, Dublin Castle.

The recruits are chiefly taken from the farmer class, though, of course, the cities and towns provide their proportion. Very great care is exercised in their selection. The candidate must be over 18 years of age, not less than 5 feet 8 inches in height, and 36 inches round the chest.

The Irishman has a natural instinct for drill, and the recruits at the depot pick it up very rapidly and well. I am sure that if any of my military readers saw a batsalion drill there, they would pronounce it a very creditable performance for recruits of a few months' training. There is always great steadiness, and the manual and firing exercises are performed with much smartness and precision. The men are armed with the Snider carbine and sword-bayonet in addition to the more peaceful baton.

The recruit on joining his country station has, like the young officer, to put into practice all that he has learned in theory at the depot. This is by no means as easy as it might seem, and it is a year or two with him also before he is worth much as a policeman. His average patrolling work is some six hours in the twenty-four. This may seem little in comparison to the eight hours' beat duty usually performed by the metrogolitan policeman, but the Royal Irish constable is never out of uniform when off duty; he is liable to be called on at any moment. He cannot go far or remain long away from his station, and sometimes on detachment duty, in disturbed places, he is working for twelve or fifteen hours daily for weeks together.

A patrol never consists of less than two men. In the daytime the senior of these is armed with a revolver, the junior carrying a baton only. In disturbed districts by day, and everywhere at night, the patrol is fully armed, the senior with a revolver, the others with carbines. The duration of a patrol varies from three to six hours, of which a portion is always spent in ambush. And on a cold, wild winter's night an ambush in a wet ditch is no pleasant task.

A recruit under six month's service is paid £39 per annum. A constable of over six months' and under four years' service £54 12s.; over twenty years, £70 4s. An acting sergeant gets £72 16s yearly; a sergeant of under four years in that rank, £75 8s.; of four years and over, £80 12s. A head constable of under three years' service in that rank is paid £91 per annum; of over three and under six years, £97 10s.; of over six years £104

The allowances, &c., of the non-commissioned officers and constables are as follows: Boot allowance, 2s. 2d. monthly per man; arms and straw allowance, for keeping the arms in repair, and filling the palliasses with straw, 9d. per man monthly; lodging origin and distribution of mankind.

Neglecting the minor differences, he estimates that there are no fewer than seventy-two distinct races in the human species. All those decend or branch off from three fundamental types—the black, the yellow, and the white—which had their origin at the great central mass of northern Asia, which is thus the cradle of mankind. Representat ves of these different types and the races sprung from them are still to be found there.

The whites, according to M. de Quatrefages, appear to have originated on the west of the central mass, the yellows on the north, and the blacks on the south. The whites extended westward and northward, giving birth to three secondary types, the Finnish, the Semitic, and the Aryan, if we except the Allophyles, which form a separate group. Their area of distribution is continuous, as is that of the yellows, because of the extensive land surface of the Eurasian continent. The yellows spread eastward and crossed into America. The whites and yellows are checked or blended with each other, producing many varieties of man. The blacks or negro type, which originated on the south of the centeral mass was forced by the nature of the continent, and probably by the attacks of the whites and yellows, to go south into Africa and east into the Indian Archipelago, or Melanesia. The proto-Semites arrested their distribution in the north of Africa, and the mixture of the two races gave rise to the negroid populations. In the centre and south of Africa the blacks continued in their ethnic purity until the infiltration of other races from Europe and the north of Africa in modern times. Those which remained in their original home became blended with the whites and yellows, giving rise to the dravidian populations which pass by shades into the three fundamental types.

As for the Allophyles, represented by the race of Cro-Magnon, they occupied parts of Europe and North Africa, from which they extended to the Canaries. The three fundamental types also found themselves in Oceania; the Allophylian whites occupying Polynesia, the blacks Malnesia, the yellows Malasia. The latter were, according to M. de Quatrefages, the last to come into the maritime world.

The peopling of America dates from the quaternary period, and is due to migrations of different types—Allophylic white and yellow, blending with the local quaternary races, which also belonged to the yellow type. Europe, since the tertiary ages, has received only Allophylian whites, Finns, and Aryans. The number of races now existing in a pure state is exceedingly restricted, if, indeed, there is a single one which can be accepted as such; perhaps some little groups, protected by their isolation, such as the Mincopies, may show an identity of characters attesting their ethnic homogeneity.

Possibly, but it is Doubtful.

Mrs. Solid, who is stout and not very tall, has a daughter who is tall and rather slender. Now if there is anything about which Mrs. Solid is sensitive it is her avoirdupois, and when the spirit of mischief enters her family it is apt to find this sensitive spot before its work is done. The other day this good lady's tall and fragile daughter took occasion to rail at her proportions.

"I don't care, Julia," exclaimed her mother; "when you're as big as I am you'll be a good deal bigger."

A prominent London correspondent believes there are two murder fiends connected with the Whitechapel crimes, and that the latest victim was not killed and carved up by the scientific "Jack the Ripper.

costly line of perfumery. For the past week he noticed that two very vivacious, pretty and well-dressed young ladies who made frequent visits at his store were in the habit of nonchalantly helping themselves to the odorous liquid. They would drop in to make some such purchase as five cents' worth of chewing gum or ten cents' worth of stamps, and while Mr. druggist was waiting upon them each fair one would seize a Mary Stuart" or "Newmown Hay" bottle and splash the contents upon the dainty handkerchief of the twain.

Of course these trifling thefts are woman's little privileges, but just the same, the druggist wasn't inclined to let them go unchallenged. He determined to head off the vivacious young ladies who were playing havoc with his profits on perfumery. And he did it in the most effectual—if cruel—manner. One morning he removed all the perfumery bottles from the counter. Hethen substituted a large bottle labeled "Breath of the Roses" or something of the sort, and filled it with a most vile decoction. It contained asafetida, did this concoction, and other elements equally sickening. So shrewdly was the mixture compounded, however that it would not develop its nauseating effects except under the influence of slight warmth, such as that afforded by a pocket. That day the young ladies paid their usual call. Flouncing into the store they made a trivial purchase, saturated their handkerchiefs and dashed out to catch a passing street car, stuffing their delicate bits of lace and linen into their pockets.

The young ladies had hardly seated themselves before the asafetida combination began to get in its deadly work. The odor became sickening, but no one knew whence it came. The passengers wondered and suffered. The conductor racked his brain to find a solution of the malodorous mystery. No solution. All at once one of the aforesaid young ladies happened to draw out her handkerchief. She dropped it, and dropped it suddenly, with a shriek and a gasp. The mystery was solved. A moment later the car was stopped and, amid a roar of laughter, blushing, gasping and almost fainting, the two unfortunates got off. The druggist was never again molested.

A Wonderful Jewel in India.

It is doubtful whether Shakerpeare's toad,
Ugly and venomous
Wears yet a precious jewel in its head, but there is a belief current in all parts of India that a certain variety of snake, called Shesh Nag, when it attains the age of 1,000 years has a precious jewel formed in its head. This jewel, it is affirmed, possesses the quality of sucking up the poison of the deadliest snake, if applied to the wounded part. Strangely enough, a Parsee gentleman is reputed to possess this invaluable jewel, according to a correspondent of a Gujarat weekly published at Wadhan, in Gujarat.

The correspondent says that when the present owner, who, by the way, is now 62, was 23 years old he found a snake of the above mentioned variety, which he killed. Then he found the jewel in its head. It already saved several lives Last year when Mr. Vidal, the collector of the district, was there it was shown to him. The jewel is said to contain a thin crescent-like fibre, which unceasingly oscillates in the centre. His Highness the Gaikwar of Baroda, his Highness the Maharajah of Kohapur, and several other native princes are said to have offered more than 100,000 rupees for this unique jewel. The name and address of the owner are Framji Dadabhai Govekar, Tarapur, Bombay Presidency.

The Duke of Sutherland has been visiting his estates in the north, and was warmly received by the fishermen at Helmsdale, having responded to their appeals for assistance in the erection of a harbor.

years £104

The allowances, &c., of the non-commissioned officers and constables are as follows: Boot allowance, 2s. 2d. monthly per man; arms and straw allowance, for keeping the arms in repair, and filling the palliasses with straw, 9d. per man monthly: lodging allowance for married men over ten years' service, 4s. 4d. per month. On the other hand, there is a deduction from the single men of 4s. 4d. per man monthly for barrack accommodation. For every night that a head constable is absent from his station on duty he gets 4s. 6d. extra pay, and a sergeant or constable similarly absent gets 3s. 6d. head constable is allowed 1s. 9d. who absent from his station for ten consecutive hours except on the ordinary duties of his district, and 1s. 3d. for eight hours absence. A sergeant or constable is similarly allowed 1s. 6d. and 1s. respectively. A head constable receives 1s. 3d. marching money for every eight miles marched on the same day when the place marched to is outside his own subdistrict, and a sergeant or constable 1s, under like circumstances. Each man receives an allowance for making up clothing, sufficient to cover the expense of having his uniform made by the tailor. There is also a fuel and light allowance granted to each station which covers the expenses incurred in this respect.

A third-class district inspector receives £125 per annum. His allowances are considerable.

A second-class district inspector receives £165 per annum for the first five years' service in that rank; afterward, £180. A first-class district inspector of less than three years' service in that rank receives £225 per annum; and of from three to six years, £250; of from six to twelve years, £275; of twelve years and over, £300.

A county inspector receives £350 for his first year's service in that rank. His pay is then increased yearly by £20 per annum until he has completed six years' service. The "good service pay" of the rank is £50 per annum, and the lodging allowance the same.

The commandant of the depot and the town inspector of Belfast each receive £600 a year, with various allowances very much similar to those of a county inspector.

The assistant inspectors-general receive £700; the deputy inspector-general, £1,000, and the inspector-general, £1,500 per annum. These officers are allowed £1 for each night's absence on duty, and the usual mileage.

Officers and men in the force become entitled to pensions on a scale laid down by acts of Parliament, after a certain number of years' service. Under the latest acts dealing with this subject the pensions are not so good, proportionately to the pay, as they used to be. Of late years the tendency has been to increase the pay and allowances and lessen the pension of members of the force.

Speaking generally, the uniform of both officers and men resembles that of a rifle regiment, except that the officer's patrol jacket has five tags on it instead of braid.

He was Consoled.

A New Yorker who met a Kansas man at one of the hotels the other day heaved a sigh as he said:—

"I was in your town two years ago, and that piece of property west of the railroad station was offered to me for $30,000."

"Yes."

"I hear that it was sold last year for $75,000."

"It was."

"What short-sighted people some of us are! Had I bought at $30,000 I could now probably sell for $100,000. Think of that."

"My dear friend, let me console you. That piece of property can be bought to-day for $15 000. The boom has passed."—[N. Y. Sun.

ENGLISH TABLE WAYS.

They Are Altogether Too Finicky for Persons of Good Sense.

Theodore Child writes in Harper's Bazar: The Anglo Saxons are afraid to use their fingers to eat with, especially the English. Thanks to this hesitation, I have seen in the course of my travels in the old world many distressing sights. I have seen a lady attempt to eat crawfish with a knife and fork and abandon the attempt in despair. I have also seen men in the same fix. I have seen—oh, barbarous and cruel spectacle!—Anglo Saxons, otherwise apparently civilised, cut off the points of asparagus and eat these points only with a fork, thus leaving the best part of the vegetable on their plates. As for artichokes they generally utterly defeat the attacks of those who trust only to the knife and fork.

Fingers must be used for eating certain things, notably sparagus, artichokes, fruit, olives, radishes, pastry, and even small fried fish; in short, everything which will not dirty or grease the fingers may be eaten with the fingers. For my own part I prefer to eat lettuce salad with my fingers rather than with a fork, and Queen Marie Antoinette and other ladies of the eighteenth century were of my way of thinking. If the ladies could only see how pretty is their gesture when their diaphanous forefinger and thumb grasp a leaf of delicate green lettuce and raise that leaf from the porcelain plate to their rosy lips they would all immediately take to eating salad a la Marie Antoinette. Only bear in mind, good ladies, that if you do wish to eat lettuce salad with your fingers you must mix your salad with oil and vinegar, and not with that abominable ready-made white "salad dressing," to look upon which is nauseating.

May heaven preserve us from excessive Anglomania in matters of table service and eating. The English tend to complicate the eating tools far too much. They have too many forks for comfort, and the forms of them are too quaint for practical utility. Certainly silver dessert knives and forks are very good in their way, because they are not susceptible to the action of fruit acids, but it is vain and clumsy to attempt to make too exclusive use of the knife and fork in eating fruit. Don't imitate, for instance, certain ultra-correct English damsels who eat cherries with a fork and swallow the stones because they are too modest, or rather too asinine, to spit them out on to the plate. Eating is not a thing to be ashamed of. To thoroughly enjoy a peach you must bite it and feel the juicy, perfumed flesh melt in your mouth. But let the Anglomaniacs say what they please, there is no necessity of sticking a fork into the peach, and peeling it while so impaled, as if it were an ill-favored and foul object. A peach is as beautiful to the touch as it is to the eye; a peach held between human fingers has its beauty enhanced by the beauty of the fingers. However dainty and ornate the silver dessert knife and fork may be, it always irritates me to see people cut up their peaches, or pears, or apricots, or what not, into cubes and parallelopipeds, as if dessert were a branch of conic sections. Imitate Marie Antoinette, ladies; use your fingers more freely; eat decently, of course, but do not be the slaves of silly Anglomania or Newport crazes. To eat a pair or an apple conveniently, cut it into quarters, and peel each quarter in turn as you eat it. The peach, too, can be cut into quarters, if the eater is timid. Apricots do not need peeling, nor plums either. Who would be bold enough to peel a fresh fig, or to touch such a delicate fruit even with the purest silver instruments?

Is This What Ails You?

Do you have dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; eyes weak, watery, and inflamed; ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking, or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; voice changed and nasal twang; breath offensive; smell and taste impaired; is there a sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility? If you have all, or any considerable number of these symptoms, you are suffering from Nasal Catarrh. The more complicated your disease has become the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous or less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians. The manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy offer, in good faith, a reward of $500 for a case of this disease which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists, at only 50 cents.

Thief Arrested.

The news was received with the utmost satisfaction by the community that he had terrorized; but the arrest of a disease that is stealing away a loved and valued life, is an achievement that should inspire heartfelt gratitude. Chilliness, cold extremities, depressed spirits, and extremely miserable sensations, with pale, wan features, are the results of disordered kidneys and liver. Arrest the cause at once by taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It is a purely vegetable detective, that will ferret out and capture the most subtle lung or blood disorder. Druggists.

Amherst Island Fair.

The Amherst Island Agricultural Society held their annual show at Stella, on Thursday, October 3rd. The weather was most unfortunately anything but favorable for the occasion. Nevertheless the Islanders made up their minds that they would not be kept away by the rain which fell almost continuously the length of the day, and attended from all parts of the Island. The Str. Hero as usual brought another lot of visitors from up the Bay and Bath, and shortly after her arrival the judging commenced. As at most of the shows spoken of the centre of attraction seemed to be round the horse ring. Three judges were appointed for this department but it was soon manifest that they could never get through the work in time, so the Directors chose three other gentlemen of those who came to view the proceedings and gave them a job for the day. The entries were numerous in every class of horse flesh. The stock from Allen and Filson's sire "Donald Dinnie" both in yearling and suckling colts carried off all the prizes; the same horse's offspring competed at the Storrington and Wolfe Island fairs and also were awarded prizes. He seems to be the favorite horse in this part of the country. Too much can not be said in favor of his stock for symmetry and size.

Mr. McCormick's and Mr. Henry Filson's three year old colts are also worth of special mention, the former is a handsome black colt and weighs about 1500 lbs.

The entries amongst the other animals were small owing partly to the state of the roads caused by the rain and difficult to drive them out. There were some fine specimens of roots and grains exhibited, also fruits and vegetables.

The ladies department was well represented with handsome and useful articles. The proceedings terminated about 2 p.m., when the judges were escorted by the Directors to dinner at the Marksman's hotel, now kept in good style by John Elson and Wm. Beaubieu, who deserve great credit for the very excellent manner in which they carried out their part.

The following is the

We herewith beg to advise the people of this district that we have just added to our already well selected stock of

READY MADE CLOTHING.

$1000.00

Men and Boys Suits.

Remember we manufacture our own Clothing and this $1000.00 worth is only part of our Fall Stock, which we are finishing as fast as we can. Our Clothing can not be equalled in fit and finish. Remember we have always been in the Clothing trade and know how to make

GOOD CLOTHING.

TEA EXTRAORDINARY!

Having recently secured an extraordinary good bargain in tea, we intend to share it with our customers.

Heretofore we have given extra good value in Tea at 25 cents per pound, but the fifty chests just received would be "dirt cheap" at 45 cents, and 25 cents is what we shall sell it at. We venture to say and we have had many years experience in the tea trade, that nothing to compare with it has ever been sold in Napanee at that price.

To those who want to save money and at same time enjoy a choice cup of Tea, we say come and get a pound and we feel certain it will cause you to come for more.

A large number from here attended the

ERNESTTOWN'S EXHIBITION.

She Humps Herself and Gets There Like a Little Man.

(By our own Correspondent.)

Wednesday morning broke between a fog and a sweat, presenting old Sol peered over the horizon blinked once or twice rubbed his "hi" with the departing moon, wonk again and announced his intention of taking in Ernesttown's worldly-af fair. On his arm he brought Miss Goodweather and was welcomed by some 3000 or more jolly people out on the same lark, pretty girls and spruce young men composed a goodly portion of the crowd, whilst handsomer married ladies' and more gallant married gentlemen completed a picture good to behold.

During the morning everything round the palace was hustle bustle, and there were sounds like these : "Ain't that a rattlin' big squash ; see, it takes two men to lift it, and it's not all rind and seeds, either. Hark ! What's that noise ? Oh ! Only a basso singer in the Methodist choir. Not much ; it's a rooster, a whopper, one that Barnum hasn't yet found ! What a voice to borrow for election day ?"

Whilst the judges are at work we'll run round a bit. There's Clum Connolly, from Yarker, with a good exhibit of plows,sulky, spring tooth harrow, etc. Tie you arm down tight whilst we jog past the big tent over there with the fire-eating woman, accrobatist, Irish comedian, and a hurdy-gurdy. Here's a cane man, three rings for five. See the live stock, grand, you bet ! Horses, cattle, sheep and pigs, all Ernesttown's pride, many having cleared the prize list for Kingston, Ottawa, Toronto, and even at Napanee. The folks are crowding in the drill shed to hear the Odessa orchestra. They're a jolly good lot of boys and not a bit stingy with the music. Many a nice tune puts life into old bones and makes our Methodist foot tug hard at its mooring.

Hart & Loyst's exhibit the Karn organs, using one in the band that's a daisy. They also showed the Williams sewing machines. Booth and Co. excel in their woolen goods display. The ladies have a fine collection of fancy articles. M sdames R. W. Aylesworth, L. H. Stover, W. Frink, A. M. Caton, Fred Caton, G. W. Lucas, J. Johnston and C. E. Clark have contributed. W. Calder's collection of house plants are beautiful. Fruit is a great exhibit, and shows well for the township. Nial P. Wood is a genius ; see the complete set of swifts in an eight ounce bottle with a nail driven firmly through the cork on the inside. W. Calder's exhibit of harness is just the thing to draw Watts & Jones' big display of carriages and cutters. The ladies' aid of the Methodist church are making sales of their handiwork, and while we don't like to leave their charming presence, we must see the races. Horse and human outside.

Billy Jones' colt falls and Billy shows up with a big lip. Young Emmons takes a tumble, too, horse and all, hops up and continues the race. Fred Caton wins first, Thomas Milsap second. The trotters do it up nice, too, with Ed. Johnston first, W. Frink second. Billy Amey with very hot company takes first place in the foot race, with H. L. Thompson a good second. The tug-of-war was funny. Harry Hunter, of Kingston, started the fun and put up the dust, and Harry's side won.

The directors and management are to be congratulated on the success of the show. Altogether the show was a "cracker" but with an increased prize list and other things equal the management will put up another first-class exhibit in 1890.

Demorest are arranging for a grand concert to come off on Friday evening, 25th inst. The teachers deserve much credit for the interest taken by them in the school.

A large number from here attended the show at Napanee on Wednesday last.

On account of the low price of barley only one car has been shipped from Moscow this fall.

Mr. Miles Storms has returned from Chicago, where he has been visiting friends.

Master Arthur Baker, son of H. A. Baker Esq., is recovering from a severe attack of malarial fever. Mr. Damon Card is also recovering from an attack of the same disease.

Adolphustown.

Our little burgh, the Adolphustown village, has been booming of late. Mr. Frank Chalmers, our enterprising young merchant has just come into possession of the old Tavern stand, and on the premises has fitted up a fine commodious new store, into which he has just moved.

Mr. J. J. Watson is also fitting up and renovating the old postoffice and store, and in connection with it is building a comfortable house for his daughter, Mrs. Duffet. This will be a great convenience to the public, as the postoffice and the residence will be brought under the one roof, and the calls of the public, sometimes made at very unseasonable hours, can be more conveniently attended to.

The English church is being pushed forward to completion. A posse of men have just arrived from Kingston, and are vigorously at work to complete it.

It will be quite in order now for our city fathers while there are so many improvements going on around, to repair and renovate the shabby old town hall, and make it worthy of the wealthy township of Adolphustown.

Special revival services commence in the Methodist Memorial church on Thursday evening. The Rev. Dr. Griffith, pastor of the first Methodist church, Picton, will preach there on Friday evening, and on Sabbath next Messrs. Farnsworth and Mills two promising young evangelists from Albert College, will hold an all-day service in the church.

Seventy-five thousand dollars worth of silver ore was shipped from the Port Arthur district during September.

Bishop Cleary has given his fifth donation of $1,000 towards the building fund of St. Mary's cathedral at Kingston.

The C. P. R. Company will make big improvements on their line between Port Arthur and Rat Portage this winter.

A Chinese leper, in a terrible physical condition, has arrived at San Francisco from New York, where he had been cooking for the men working on the aqueduct. No precautions had been taken by the authorities to prevent a spread of the contagion.

The old Hatfield-McCoy feud in Pike County, Ky., has broken out again, a bride, bridegroom and minister being shot while the marriage ceremony was being performed.

In Many Forms.

Dyspepsia assumes many phases, all disagreeable to the sufferer, yet it takes no form which from two to four bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters will not cure. B. B. B. cures dyspepsia, tones the weak stomach, aids digestion, sharpens the appetite and renovates the entire system.

Severely Attacked.

I was severely attacked with diarrhœa and vomiting, the pain was intense and I thought I could not live till morning. Six doses of Dr. Fowler's Wild Strawberry cured me and I have not had the least sympton of it since.

A STRANGE LEGACY

CHAPTER V.

The interview which Kate had with her father that evening was not a very long one, nor was it remarkable for any display of feeling on either side. He had, as he said, made up his mind, and nothing Kate could say had the least effect upon him. She did her best; but when he rose from his chair and told her to leave him, she was no nearer gaining her end than when she broached the subject.

"Will you think about it again when he has got a good practice, father?"

"You have had my answer, Kate. It is finally and absolutely No. I will not think about it now or at any other time, and the sooner you forget the man the better."

Clearly, there was no hope of doing things in an orthodox fashion; and before Kate went to sleep that night, she had thought out her project in detail, to lay before Charles Lakeworth next day.

"I sincerely hope I have settled that for good and all," said Mr. Dottleson to the mirror after Kate had gone. "If there's any more bother about it, I'll send her away into the country for a few months, and see what that will do."

He was not destined to hear anything more from Kate; they met at breakfast as usual, and the hated name was not mentioned. His daughter's manner towards him was unchanged, and he told himself that she had accepted the inevitable at last, and would not trouble him again.

Miss Mumbole might have learnt the particulars of Kate's device and told them to us, had she been less interested in a speech which a great politician had delivered at a garden-party the day before; but the lovers conversed in such low tones that only a most attentive listener could have heard what they said. Their last few words were audible, and we are able to place them on record.

"Now just tell me exactly what you want me to do?" said Charles when Kate had unfolded her plan.

"All you have to do is to go to your lodgings and pack up at once; take away everything, and say you are not coming back. Don't forget to drop a hint to your landlady that you are going abroad."

"Where am I to go, and what's to become of my patients?"

"Go anywhere you like, but don't show yourself on any account. You'd better ask some other doctor to look after your patients; it will give color to the idea that you have left England."

"If I took lodgings out at Highgate, it would do?"

"Yes; it would do very well. Send your address to Miss Mumbole, so that I can write to you."

Charles reflected for a few minutes before he spoke again; the plan proposed seemed quite feasible, and promised success. He had everything to win, and little to lose; for if it prospered, Kate would be his with her father's sanction; and if it failed, he would be much where he was before. "All right, Kate, I'll do it. Don't forget to write."

"Very well; it's settled. You'd better go at once, and be sure you don't leave your lodgings later than four this afternoon."

By three o'clock Dr. Lakeworth was driving away from his old quarters with all his baggage, having asked a friend to take his practice for a day or two, paid off his landlady, and carefully imbued that worthy woman with the notion that he was bound for the continent.

When Mr. Dottleson came home that evening, and casually asked for his daughter, he was informed that she had gone away in a cab with a portmanteau, and would not be back that night. He was out of the house and back in his hansom before the landlady could turn round. Kate had eloped with Charles Lakeworth! A thousand pounds sterling per annum was trembling in the balance! O the wickedness, the deceit of the human heart! O the short-sighted, unfathomable folly of old ladies who made wills like that!

"Double fare if I catch the 7 30 from Victoria!"

They must be stopped. He would search every hotel in Dover. He would put on detectives to watch the Calais boat. A thousand pounds a year! Central Asia—— Good heavens! was there ever such a snail in harness before? Were the London streets ever so crowded as they were now? This was all the outcome of that call for Smuggles's partner; the words were ringing in his ears when he got out at the station and paid off his cab. He was in time for the train, and lay back in his seat panting and breathless; he was tired, but as unswerving as ever in his purpose.

Dover at last. He walked out of the station and hailed a cab; he had no dinner, but hunger was forgotten.

"Take me to all the hotels in the town one after the other," he said to the dumfounded jehu.

"It will take the whole night, sir."

"I'll make it worth your while."

Whatever remuneration that cab-driver received he fairly earned it. He took his fare from one hotel to another, until his horse broke down, and he passed Mr Dottleson on to a belated 'growler' who was crawling home. At four o'clock in the morning he drove up to the Station Hotel and dragged himself to bed; he had examined the visitors' book in every hotel in the place, and had questioned the hall porters besides; but not a trace had he found of the fugitives.

He slept until nine o'clock from sheer fatigue; but as soon as he awoke, he rose, swallowed his breakfast, and went to the police office, where he succeeded in obtaining the services of men to watch the boats, who were to telegraph to him if the pair were seen. Then he took the train back to town, and went direct to Starbone and Smuggles's office to see Mr. Slimp, whom he found in his room looking as gaunt and sorrowful as ever.

"You made a most exhaustive search at Dover, Mr. Dottleson?" he said when he had heard the whole story and the manner in which his client had passed the preceding night.

"Most thorough. I cannot think they are there, though they were too late to catch the afternoon boat."

"It may be that taking the tickets was a mere blind. Why should Miss Dottleson not have booked through to Paris or where not if she actually intended going?"

Mr. Dottleson had not thought of that; it was a little strange. Kate had often been across the Channel with him, and knew the the saving of trouble booking "through" implied.

"What course would you suggest, Mr. Slimp? The consequences of such a marriage would be ruinous—simply ruinous."

Mr. Slimp stroked his hair up the wrong way and thought hard. "We must advertise, Mr. Dottleson, and at once."

Blazon the wretched scandal to the world through the Agony Columns of the penny papers! That it should come to this! He laid his head upon his arm and groaned. "Couldn't detectives do it?"

"They're too slow, Mr. Dottleson; and the parties haven't committed any crime."

Hadn't committed any crime! And they were throwing away twenty Thousand Pounds. No crime! How could any reasonhalf expecting to see the outraged parent in pursuit.

Mr. Dottleson, however, was too much occupied with his own side of the affair to move; his anxiety lest the paper he had given Mr. Slimp should prove too late, overcame every other sentiment; he hardly knew that he was consenting to Dr. Lakeworth's union with Kate and endowing the latter with her grandmother's money.

"If they have been married by now," said the solicitor slowly, "no advertisement will induce them to come back; but it's very unlikely that they would be in such a violent hurry; and with your leave, I'll issue a new advertisement which may do more than this one."

"Do what you think best; but for mercy's sake, let me know the very moment you hear whether that permission I gave you is in time."

Mr. Slimp promised compliance, and saw his client to the door; then he went back into his room and set himself to draw up another advertisement, which we may as well show the reader at once:

"If Miss K. D. of No. 21 Blakewood Square, South Kensington, will apply to Messrs Starbone and Smuggles, Lincoln's Inn, she will receive the written permission she requires. She must apply personally."

The London dailies gave due publicity to this announcement the following morning, with singularly prompt results. Mr. Dottleson called at Lincoln's Inn about eleven o'clock to ask for news and was informed that Miss Dottleson had come to the office half an hour previously, and having inspected the document her father had signed, and received assurance that it was legally what it purported to be, had gone away in the direction of the West End—probably to Blakewood Square.

Mr. Dottleson rushed out of the office and called a cab; his excitement was rising again, for in half an hour he was to know where Mrs. Lamshed's money was to go. Kate was standing at the dining-room window when he drove up and came to open the door.

"When were you married?" he demanded excitedly the instant he was inside the house.

"Married?" echoed his daughter. "I'm not married. Who said I was?"

Mr. Dottleson sank limply into a chair, and gaped at her for three minutes before he found speech. Then he pulled himself together to perform his duty.

"Explain where you have been ever since Tuesday. What have you been doing? Where is that scoundrel Lakeworth?"

The extreme simplicity of Miss Dottleson's explanation goaded her father almost to madness. She had been staying with her old governess, Miss Simcox, at Dover, for a day or two. It was very slow indeed down there; she did absolutely nothing. She wasn't quite sure where Dr. Lakeworth was; but he said on Tuesday that he was going to Highgate for a short time; no doubt he would write when he saw the advertisement.

And this was what he had magnified into an elopement! We will not dwell upon Mr. Montague Dottleson's wrath; we will not relate how he tried to get that paper back from Mr. Slimp, and how the melancholy man, as executor, would not give it up. We say that we will not speak of these things; we leave them to the reader's imagination. It was a long time before our friend recognised that he was beaten, and might as well give in gracefully; but he did so at last, and Charles Lakeworth married Kate Dottleson with her father's blessing.

Dr. Lakeworth has now a large practice at the West End, and Kate sometimes complains that he devotes more attention to his work than to her.

practice for a day or two, paid off his landlady, and carefully imbued that worthy woman with the notion that he was bound for the continent.

When Mr. Dottleson came home that evening, and casually asked for his daughter, he was informed that she had gone away in a cab, taking a quantity of luggage with her, about an hour before. She had not told any of the servants where she was going, and the only clue to her destination was the order she had been heard to give the cabman, "To Victoria."

"Did she leave no message for me?" asked the astounded parent.

"No, sir."

"Did she say when she was coming back?"

"No, sir."

Every domestic in the house was examined in turn; but not a scrap of informat;on could be gleaned which would throw a ray of light upon this extraordinary proceeding of Kate's. There was only one thing to be done, and Mr. Dottleson did it. He sent for a hansom, and drove as fast as he could go to Victoria Station. There he made inquiries of the booking-office clerks; and his heart bounded with excitement when one of the men looked round from his desk and said that he recollected serving a young lady answering the description, with tickets for Dover.

"With tickets!" ejaculated Mr. Dottleson. "How many did she take?"

"Two first class singles," replied the man promptly.

That looked ugly; the faint suspicions he had dismissed as ridiculous, returned and took a very definite shape.

"When does the next train leave for Dover?"

"Express at 7.30, sir."

Mr. Dottleson looked at his watch: it was nearly six now, so he had an hour and a half to wait. He would employ the time profitably by going to Dr. Lakeworth's lodgings and making inquiries there.

"Is Dr. Lakeworth in?" he asked the woman who opened the door.

"No, sir; but Dr Lakeworth he sez as Dr. Wilmot"——

"I don't want Dr. Wilmot. When is Dr. Lakeworth expected home?"

"He ain't expected; but Dr. Wilmot"——

Time was too precious to be frittered away like this: he pushed past the woman into the passage and told her to call the landlady. The landlady took some time to answer the summons, and when she did, she proved to be but one degree more intelligent than the servant. Mr. Dottleson speedily discovered this, and took her in hand with a firm patience which would have done credit to a Queen's Counsel.

Was Dr. Lakeworth at home? No, but ——Never mind that. When did he go away? Go away? It might have been three o'clock, or half-past, or even four; the clocks was—— Never mind about the clocks. Was Dr. Lakeworth coming back? He said as how he wasn't; but them medical gentlemen —— Never mind medical gentlemen just now. Did he say where he was going? The landlady's countenance lit up with intelligence, and she fairly beamed with superior knowledge. She knowed exactly where Dr. Lakeworth had gone. Mr. Dottleson almost jumped off the table upon which he was seated, but choked down his eagerness and repeated the question. The doctor was gone to furrin parts; to the Continong, he said. There was a certain amount of latitude in the address, but it was quite enough to harden suspicion into certainty. It was as clear as daylight. The two were off to the Continent via Dover. Kate and her lover had left their respective homes at the same time; the former had taken their tickets, and the latter had disclosed the direction they intended to take.

Mr. Dottleson did not stand on ceremony: laid his head upon his arm and groaned, "Couldn't detectives do it?"

"They're too slow, Mr. Dottleson; and the parties haven't committed any crime."

Hadn't committed any crime! And they were throwing away twenty Thousand Pounds. No crime! How could any reasonable man sit there and talk like that?

"I leave the matter in your hands, Mr Slimp; I feel myself unequal to the task of dealing with it. My daughter must be saved to us. Do whatever you think most advisable.

"I will do my best," said the melancholy man with a sigh, "but it's a difficult case."

Mr Slimp had not a reassuring way with him; but he was an nergetic man enough. He put the business in hand at once, and did what he thought was most efficacious. Mr Dottleson saw the result next morning in the Times; here it is. "Mr M. D. of Blakewood Square, Kensington, earnestly requests his daughter to communicate with him immediately. He hereby undertakes to consider her wish if she at once returns to his care. Mr C. L. is also invited to return."

He had hardly realised the situation until this caught his eye in the paper. He said nothing to any one, but crammed the Times into his pocket and drove to Lincoln's Inn. He could not put the thought which oppressed his brain into words. Mr Slimp was engaged when he reached the office; but on hearing who the visitors was, sent to request him to come in. He went in, and found a middle-aged clergyman in earnest conversation with the solicitor. He bowed slightly to our friend, who returned the salutation with an idle glance. He had no inclination to meet strangers just now, and was a good deal surprised at the lawyer receiving himself when he had another client in his room.

"Sit down, Mr. Dottleson," said the solicitor. "Allow me to introduce the Rev. William Wiskin, Secretary to the Central Asia Missionary Society."

Mr. Dottleson turned pale and trembled; he was face to face with the enemy.

"I had called upon Mr. Slimp in consequence of the advertisement in this morning's paper, Mr. Dottleson," exclaimed the clergyman. "Being of course aware of the Society's reversionary interest in the late Mrs. Lamshed's property, it appeared that inquiries made in its behalf might not be out of place."

"I have advised Mr. Wiskin that he has yet no shadow of a claim on the property," said Mr. Slimp. "We have no proof of Miss Dottleson's marriage to Mr. Lakeworth, or any one else, so far."

"I trust that Mr. Dottleson will not consider my call hasty and precipitate; but, as I have pointed out, the young lady may be already wedded to the gentleman named in the advertisement; in which case, since her father's consent has obviously not"——

His smoothly flowing speech was interrupted by a suppressed scream of rage from Mr. Dottleson, as that gentleman sprang from his chair, grabbed wildly at the stationery case on the table, tore a sheet of paper therefrom and seized a pen. Not another instant should be lost; and without pausing to reseat himself, he dashed off three lines of writing and signed his full name at the bottom; he added the date and, after a look at the clock, the exact time.

"My consent," he gasped, forcing the document into Mr. Slimp's hands. He had fired his last shot, and sank back into his chair, whence he fixed Mr. Wiskin with a stare of impotent ferocity, That gentleman was not slow to understand the footing upon which matters had now been placed, and rose to take his leave, telling the lawyer that he should no doubt hear from him if necessary. He attempted to address a few words of condolence to Mr. Dottleson; but when he looked at him, they died upon his lips, and he fled from the office, looking back more than once.

Charles Lakeworth married Kate Dottleson with her father's blessing.

Dr. Lakeworth has now a large practice at the West End, and Kate sometimes complains that he devotes more attention to his work than to her. Nevertheless, they are a very happy couple; and old Mr Dottleson frankly admits that his daughter's choice was a wise one, though h elooks grave when you ask him about her little visit to Dover.

[THE END.]

The Fishing Industry.

According to the New York Times the fact that the modus vivendi will expire before the beginning of another fishing season is likely to be brought before Congress for consideration next session. Our contemporary says.—"The purpose in granting it was to afford time for the deliberate consideration of the treaty which was rejected last year, and in case of that rejection to provide a peaceable method of carrying on the fishing industry until some other mode of settling the points in controversy should be reached. There is no question that it has accomplished its purpose, so far as furnishing certain accommodations is concerned, and the recent statement that twice as many licenses have been issued this year to American vessels as last shows that it is growing in favour. But meanwhile the interval has not been improved to make any progress toward the final adjustment of the fishery dispute. Presumably, when the two years expire and a new season is to begin, those American fishermen who have availed themselves of the privileges granted under the modus vivendi license of buying bait, ice, and other supplies, transshipping freight, shipping and landing men and so on, will be sorry to lose them, if there is nothing to take their place."

Rhode Island and Massachusetts have a little fisheries dispute in their own right. Massachusetts contends that Buzzards Bay—which we may remark is not a thousand miles broad, like Behring Sea—is a mare clausum (there is no sense in talking Engish when Latin will do just as well), and, therefore, that the Rhodians have no right to catch menhaden therein. The Rhode Island "Porgy Pirates," without bothering themselves with complicated arguments about fishing rights, simply fished. One day the Massachusetts catboat, Dempsey's Dream, bore down upon six of the pirates and boarded one of them, the Joseph Church. The five other pirates came to the rescue, but were frightened away by the guns of the Dempsey's Dream. The captain of the Dream put a prize crew on board the Church—not a crew of one, like the Rush, but a crew big enough to control the boat and to put the Church's captain in irons when he steered the wrong way. This illustrates that control of the shore fisheries rests with the different States, the Federal Government having this power only in the case of Territories. If Alaska were to become a State she would be able to send catboats to protect her fisheries, but she would probably give up the thousand miles claim that the United States is making, and be content with a three-mile limit.

The total cost of supplying the British man-of-war Hero with explosives and projectiles for a commission is estimated by a correspondent of the London Daily News at between £35,000 and £40,000. It costs £8 5s., or about $41, to fire a single shot from one of the two 12-inch, 45-ton, breech-loading guns. The charge weighs 295 pounds and is kept in four silken bags, enclosed in a brass cylindrical case. The ammunition for torpedoes, etc., being all on the same expensive scale, it is not hard to see how the total of $200,000 is reached, and how enormous would be the expense of a great naval war in these days.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Eighty pedigree Clydesdales have been sold out of a stud in Kirkcudbrightshire to a commissioner from Saxony, where these horses are now in great demand, and the trade with Germany appears likely to increase considerably.

A new opthalmic disease which has recently appeared in Vienna, attacks the cornea of the eyeball, upon which appear small white specks, so that the patient is almost unable to see. Professor Stellwag, a renowned occulist, declares that the disease has remained unknown up to the present time, although it is not malignant or difficult to treat

In 1878, thirteen years after the close of the civil war, the United States Government was paying out for pensions $27,000,000. Ten years later the amount had increased to $88,000,000, and this year it is said, it will be not less than $110,000,000. This latter sum is forty per cent. of the country's total expenditure, and more than the cost of the standing armies of German and Great Britain. The whole sec et o th wonderful expansion of the' pension list appears to be that it is used for political purposes.

According to the Eastern papers the Grand Trunk is surveying a line of railway from Edmunston to Moncton. Edmunston is now reached from Quebec by the Intercolonial and the Temiscouata railways. A line from Edmunston, the terminus of the Temiscouata, to Moncton, will supply the missing link in the shortest possible all-Canadian route to Halifax. By the Intercolonial the distance from Montreal to Halifax is 850 miles; by the C. P. R. short line it is 758 miles. By the projected all-Canadian route it will be but 760 miles. The Halifax people have been moving heaven and earth to secure a short route to the West. Now is their chance, not only to get a short route, but a competitive route.

The recent cession by the Sultan of Zanzibar to the Imperial British East Africa Company of the island and port of Lamu is hailed in England as a most important acquisition. It is looked upon as a distinct triumph over German diplomacy, which is aiming at securing the same port. It was felt by some that British interests on the east coast of Africa were somewhat circumscribed, but the latest addition is held to be a highly advantageous addition to British territory. Following quick upon this comes the announcement that the Salisbury Government intends to establish a new line of mail steamers between London and the principal east African ports via Naples.

The rivalry between New York and Chicago for the privilege of holding the world's fair of 1892 becomes keener every day, and is developing frantic and ludicrous proposals. The smokiness of Chicago and the consequent degradation which the cuffs and collars of European visitors must suffer, unless old world prejudices against celluloid are overcome, is being "rubbed in" to Chicagoans, and apparently with effect. The smoke is undeniable and to remove it it is suggested the city council pass a by-law prohibiting warehouses, railways and factories from using soft coal. That the large commercial interest is," said Mrs. Crawford in a whisper. "They have got to the foot of the stair now. They're coming in here.--The Lord preserve us; it's Mr. Menkton himsel'!"

The farmers of Nebraska are in a bad way. In answer to the question, What rates of interest do you pay? two answered 11 per cent.; twenty two, 10 per cent.; twenty nine, 9 per cent.; thirty-three, 8 per cent; thirteen, 7 per cent., and four 6 per cent.

LATEST FROM EUROPE.

The Czarina's Health—Specks of War Clouds—Boulanger and His Friends.

The Czar has sent an autograph letter to Emperor William stating that the Czarina has caught cold, and that her physicians have advised her to delay her departure for several days. The Czar asks that the final directions for his reception at Potsdam be delayed.

Prince Bismarck has since communicated with Count Schouvaloff, the Russian Minister, in regard to the arrangements of the Czar in the event of his coming to Berlin. Count Schouvaloff replied that he had orders to prepare to receive the Czar and his suite at the Embassy. The Czar himself has not intimated his intentions beyond his visit to Potsdam.

The week has been signalized by an outbreak of war clamors by the semi-official press. The Cologne "Gazette" publishes an alarmist article on the extension of the Russian stategic railways on the frontier, which the "North German Gazette" prominently quotes. There is a simultaneous reappearance of war notes in the Chancellor's organs.

The Vienna papers foment the scare by statements that the Russians along the frontiers of Galicia and Bukovina are in actual motion. Six regiments of cavalry and four of infantry have, they say, arrived from the interior. Observation towers are being erected close to the Galician frontier, the whole aspect of the country giving the impression that the army is making a strategic march. These reports have been directly suppressed by the Vienna and Berlin ministers.

BISMARCK'S MOTIVES.

Bismarck's motives in recreating agitation over the Russian armaments is variously interpreted. Recalling the incidents prior to the last interview the Czar accorded him, it is obvious that the Chancellor aims to place the Czar again under the necessity of granting a political conference. The reports also serve other purposes, as they tend to balk Russia's efforts to negotiate a loan for the payment of the cost of the repeating rifles ordered in France, and prepare the Reichstag to accept the new military bill, which is now known to involve an extra credit of 240,000,000 marks. But if the indifference shown by the Boerse over the attempted scare forecasts the feeling of the Reichstag, Prince Bismarck will find the members less susceptible than formerly to the old trick.

But Boulanger's demeanor just now is anything but Olympian, and he is especially worried by the entreaties of some people who pose as his friends to do something noble and striking, in order to prevent defeat becoming rout at the second balloting. Preferably they would like the General to get to Paris in disguise, ride down the Bois de Boulogne at noon on his black charger, and be arrested gloriously in the sight of all Paris. They admit that the consequences would be unpleasant for Boulanger personally, but it would greatly advance the cause. Boulanger thinks otherwise, and for the present such glory must be earned vicariously or not at all.

Limitations of Instinct.

Side by side with the wonderful instances recorded of the intelligence of the lower animals are to be found facts betraying their Simple and Pretty.

Cheap and effective picture-frames are useful things in these days, when almost every one paints; and oil sketches will look well framed in the following manner: Get from a picture-frame maker a wide, flat frame of common deal, and a cheap gold flat to fit inside it; cover the frame lightly and smoothly with coarse dark green serge; lay it face downwards on the table, and with a few nails fix into it the flat and the picture; paste a sheet of brown paper all over the back, and screw in the two rings by which to hang it up.

Take one or two nice full trails of bramble, choosing those with small leaves; iron them and gild them thoroughly, stem and all, using lustre paint the color of the gilt flat, and when thoroughly dry, turn the frame over and fasten on the bramble trails; drive needle points through the stems, and use glue for the leaves: arrange them thickly in one corner, and let them trail off gradually, so that none quite reach the opposite corner, where a flight of small Japanese butterflies, also gilt, can be put with very good effect.

Vases and jars of the rough, common sort of terra cotta, can be converted into decorative ornaments by painting the vase with the darker shades of green lustre paint, beginning darkest at the top, and shading off lighter toward the bottom, then taking some fir cones and twigs painted with the lightest green gold, and sticking them on. The twigs are quite pliable enough to bend round and follow the shape of the vase, and glue holds very firmly on the porous terra-cotta.

Open fir cones, such as children love to pick up and bring home, can be made into quite pretty floral receptacles by being set up in a damp pot, earth sprinkled around and over them, and then bird seed. Keep them moist, and after a time the seed springs into life, and a crop of delicate greenery sprouts from the cone segments.

Old raveled yarn hose will answer for rugs after the Persian style. The yarn is sewed in burlaps, doubled, leaving it in loops, which curl down closely to the background. Another one might be cut closely with sharp scissors until it looks like velvet.

Old fashioned miniatures are effectually displayed by covering an old oval or square picture with a drapery of India silk and filling the aperture with cardboard covered with colored velvet or white brocade.

The pictures are suspended on small fancy hooks affixed to the cardboard. The frame rests upon an easel, and both might be enameled white, and the silk drapery dispensed with. If the miniatures are in brooch form, they should be hung by smalls bows of ribbon.

Novel night-dress cases are in the form of a large open fan. They are of brocade, cretonne, or sateen, and lace, over cardboard, with the opening on one side, and silk cord around the entire edge.

These cases look pretty lying at the foot of a well-made bed; but after a night-dress is aired it is far healthier to hang it up in a closet than to fold it up tightly to put in a case or under the pillows, as our grandmothers did.

Monograms have suddenly assumed gigantic dimensions, and figure on window-blinds, bedspreads, portieres, and carriage-rugs. Those on linen window-blinds are about three-quarters of a yard long, and sometimes fill up nearly the entire centre. They are either traced on the linen, slightly padded with strands of wool, tacked down at distances, and then worked over, and over in colored wool; or they can be cut out in cloth, appliqued on, and finished off at the edges with a strand of filoselle, kept down by stitches at short distances. This gives a raised "beading" look.

On linen the monogram is sometimes of in answer to the question, What rates of interest do you pay? two answered 11 per cent.; twenty two, 10 per cent.; twenty nine, 9 per cent.; thirty-three, 8 per cent; thirteen, 7 per cent., and four 6 per cent. One farmer, referring to the question, said: "In 1883 I needed $100 for six months. I went to a money loaner and he furnished it to me at 10 per cent. When due I returned it. In 1887 I had a son going away; he wanted some money. I went to the same man to get it and he charged me 1 per cent. He wanted 20 per cent., and required the best security. I cannot now borrow from the same man under 3 per cent. a month. He told me a few days ago that he can put out all the money he has at that rate." Out of 200 replies by farmers in Nebraska 88 stated the cause of failure was "too high rates of interest, from 2 to 4 per cent. per month."

That China is at last really awakening to some of the advantages of western civilization is apparent in the decision of the Government to push forward the Hankow railway. The first railway in the Empire, a short one, was torn up by an angry populace, and last year work on the eighty miles of road built had to be abandoned in deference to the prejudices of a portion of the people. The anti-railway party actually circulated with effect the report that Europe regretted she had built railways and was now abandoning them, and was foisting her discarded rails on China. Now, however, a big Chinese railway is likely to become an accomplished fact. Perhaps the extention of the Russian railways through Siberia and Tartary had something to do in inducing a decided policy at Pekin in regard to an improvement of immense political importance to the Celestial Empire.

A paper that deals in facts and abstractions, Science, undertakes to show by a tabular statement that the population of the United States in 1990 will be more than 1,000,000,000. But to get this result the same proportionate increase for the next hundred years is taken as has obtained since 1790. This will not answer, because the percentage of immigration, which has been a material element of our growth, will constantly fall, and the population of a country as it becomes denser, does not, for various causes, multiply so rapidly. But however much short of the French billion the population of the United States will be in 1990 it will be sufficient for the time—large enough to tax the strength of free institutions and keep the lawmakers of that generation busy. It is a theme for fruitful speculation as to what will be the condition of North America and its people a hundred years from now. How will the industries and the arts have progressed, what mechanical revelations will be made, what new trade currents established what new forces come into play? How long, in 1990, will the steam engine and the telegraph have been obsolete? Where will be the new industrial centers, where the mighty cereal lands, what the relation between city and country life, between mechanic, tradesman and farmer? Where will the monarchies and despotisms of the old world have gone and how will their successors be regarded by the great people that cover the North American continent?

Aristocratic but vinegar-faced caller—He's charming little fellow, Mrs. Grindstone. Only five years old, you say. You'll give me a kiss, won't you, Willie? Willie—Yes'm. (Kisses her.) Caller—That's a good boy, Willie. But what are you holding in your hand so tightly? "It's a half dollar mamma gave me. She said she 'spected you'd want to kiss me and I told her I wouldn't do it for less."

Limitations of Instinct.

Side by side with the wonderful instances recorded of the intelligence of the lower animals are to be found facts betraying their apparent stupidity. Instinct is a good servant, acting under the ordinary conditions of life, but when circumstances become unusual, then her weakness is evident. Sir John Lubbock gives numerous instances of the entire lack of the inventive faculty in insects. One species of the sphex, or wasp, preys upon a large grasshopper. Having disabled her victim, she drags it along by one of the antennæ, but if both these be cut off close to the head, it never occurs to her to grasp a leg. She simply leaves her victim in despair.

Again, when this wasp had once provisioned a cell with a grasshopper and laid an egg there, both egg and grasshopper were removed. The sphex was allowed to return, but, though she went into the empty cell and must have known it to be vacant, she calmly proceeded to stop up the opening, as if nothing had happened.

The mason bee constructs an earthen cell, through which, when it has reached maturity, the young insect eats its way. Monsieur Fabre found that if he pasted a piece of paper round the cell the insect had no difficulty in eating through it, but if he also enclosed the cell in a paper case, so that there was an air space between cell and paper, the insect made no attempt to penetrate the outer paper. Instinct taught it to bite through one enclosure, but it had not wit enough to attempt a second.

Bees are supposed to show a high order of intelligence, as compared with other insects, but even they have narrow limitations. There is a species of bee which builds cells of masonry and fills them with honey as she goes, raising the rim a little, then making a few journeys for honey, and, when the cell is full, covering the top with a last load of mortar.

Monsieur Fabre once chose a nearly completed cell, and broke away a portion of the wall. The bee mended the place on her return, the operation coming in the natural order of her work. Then the naturalist pierced a hole in the bottom of the cell, but, through the honey exuded through it, the poor bee continued bringing alternate honey and mortar, as if nothing had happened.

On another occasion he made a still larger hole, but, though the little worker examined it, even pushing her antennæ through it, she had no idea of making repairs, but continued to pour in at the top load after load of honey, which of course, immediately ran out below.

Nor was this all. After hours of fruitless labor, when she had brought the usual amount of honey, she laid her egg and carefully sealed up the empty cell.

Another instance of the resemblance of instinct to mere habit is to be found in the case of a caterpilar which makes a complicated sort of hammock. If a caterpillar were taken from a hammock which it had finished up to the sixth stage of construction, and placed in one which was completed to the third stage, it finished its work without difficulty. On the other hand, if one which had reached the third stage were placed in one which had reached the sixth, instead of feeling the benefit of such progress, it became bewildered and seemed forced to return to the point where it had been interrupted.

A large and very important discovery of uranium is reported in Cornwall. It is a true fissure vein, the ore containing an average of 1 per cent. of the pure metal, going up as high in many places as 30 per cent. The market price of uranium is $12,000 a ton.

in colored wool; or they can be cut out in cloth, appliqued on, and finished off at the edges with a strand of filoselle, kept down by stitches at short distances. This gives a raised "beading" look.

On linen the monogram is sometimes of colored linen worked with filosette. Filosette can be had in all the art shades, and is much used for working on linen. Linen bed-spreads-summer cots, perambulator-covers, large aprons, etc., are entirely worked with it. It resembles colored flourishing thread.

The Angel Invisible.

In sorrow's night, no ray of joy divining,
When darkness reigned, no star of hope outshining,
When not an eye could see the clouds low drifting,
No sun to pierce, no light their darkness lifting,
An angel form, though unseen, hovered near me;
An angel voice spoke softly words to cheer me.

"Be not cast down; dark days bring bright to morrows,
And after woe comes sure surcease of sorrows;
If unto thee the darkness thick descendeth,
There is a Friend beyond who thee befriendeth;
Who will not let the burdens bear thee downward,
But will uplift and ever bear thee onward.
Therefore, take heart; he bids me not to leave thee;
When I am near no sadness long can grieve thee."

Oh, angel fair! sweet faith, bright heavenly spirit!
May I thy constant friendship daily merit;
Remain with me, though unseen, still attending,
In dubious ill against despair defending;
Thy gentle voice my spirit still inspiring
With courage now and strength of will untiring:
In sorrow's night, when clouds are dark above me,
Whisper of him who will protect and love me.

Getting the Old Man's Daughter.

Toiling a short time since on the edge of the lime-stone or blue-grass region the writer overheard the following conversation at a cabin near Hells Half Acre in Robertson county, Ky. The girl was probably sixteen and the young man she was leading into the cabin on the soft side of twenty. The girl's father was seated on the cabin door-step whittling a piece of cedar.

"Pap, giv' he un yer paw."

"Why, Mandy?"

"We's gaged. He 'n' I."

"Ar'?"

"Yep. Sho'! This is Ephraim Maybriar's boy."

"Yep? What's yer fust name, Maybriar?"

"Zonk—Zonk Maybriar's my name."

"N'yer want ter git marrid ter' my Mandy, eh?"

"Yas, sorter."

"Reckon yer can keep her wa'll?"

"Yep."

"Fit 'n' die fur hern if need be?"

"Ef it's part of the cantract."

"'N' wollop shoel outen everybody that lies agin her."

"Yep."

"Put it thar', Zonk Maybriar. Yer jus' th' feller we've been wantin for years. I've got plenty of work fer yer in my family, Zonk."

HOUSEHOLD.

Autograph Quilts.

This is a day of autograph hunters. The epidemic assumes various forms. Some have the craze for postal albums. One lady of my acquaintance has an album of several hundred postals from people whom she admits she never saw, and never expects to see. Another rage is the quilt autograph, but few people at present aspire to the crazy quilt. For my part I have not yet been able to decide whether I like them or not. I have seen so many witched and bewitched into what was originally intended to be a thing of beauty, but what appeared really more the production of the weakened brain of some poor aesthetic lunatic. In fact I never see a crazy quilt without a vivid childhood remembrance of a kaleidoscopic view I had after falling from a high swing.

Autograph quilts containing a block from each state in the union are also much in vogue. My idea of an autograph quilt is something entirely different, and as it is original with myself I will give it, as it will probably be new to others. I am saving a piece of each dress and apron of my children's clothes, from their babyhood up. Upon each piece I fasten a bit of paper with the name and age of the child at the time it had the garments, and after I am done collecting I shall make each a quilt of his and her own pieces, and with indelible ink mark on each block the date the garment was bought and what it was. What think you of my idea? Try it, mothers, it will be something the children can always keep, and that they will prize above gold long after the dear mother has crossed the mystic river to her long home beyond. I love to piece quilts and expect to be just that old fashioned all my life.

During the warm weather it is well to have sewing classes in which to teach our young girls how to sew, and piece quilts. I find it one of the best ways to teach our girls how to use a needle, and really an economical way, for every household has more or less pieces, and the quilts are always saleable. Plain square is best for new beginners. The next early pattern is the road to California and back or castle stairs. I think every community should have a sewing society. It pays in two ways—as a matter of economy and as a means to have the girls learn to sew. If you have no pretty patterns to commence with, send me a stamp for postage and I will send you one, and I will also make and send a paper block with it, so you can see how it looks before going to work.

I have a lot of quilt patterns and will give you all you want, if you send stamps for postage. I will name some of them: Moon and Stars; Sunflower; Wheel of Fortune; Hit and Miss; Pincushion and Cucumbers; Robbing Peter to pay Paul; Hearts and Gizzards; Castle Stairs; Centennial; Button String; Old Maid's Puzzle; Haystack; Toad in a Puddle; Texas Tears; Texas Star; Blind Man's Fancy. Here is a good variety. With each pattern I will make and send a paper block, name and directions for making. For any one pattern send a 2 cent stamp, as they will have to be sent as first class matter, the same as letters. If 6 or 8 patterns are wanted send 15 cents, or if you want all I have mentioned send about 35 cents. They will be quite bulky, and send American stamps, as I could not use Canada stamps to pay postage.

This is done while the shirt is passing beneath the roller. Four times through and the bosom is done. The garment is next handed to another girl, who operates an ingenious but indescribable contrivance for ironing the collarband. Finally, the shirt goes to a woman who irons the wristbands and bodies by hand, and folds it into shape for delivery. It is now done, and being placed with others on a tray beneath the woman's table, is carried off in a basket to the delivery department.

The collars and cuffs, after being dampened, are run through a sublimated sort of mangle, which is equipped with a gas heated roller to do the ironing. The things are fed in from one side and come out the other almost ready to wear. One or two things must he done, however, before they are altogether finished. The turn-down collars must have a little wheel that carries water run along the line at which they are to be turned so that they may not break. Then they must be turned over, ready for wear, as must be the points of many stand-up collars, and finally they must be put through other rollers to give them the curve of the neck. The cuffs have likewise to be curved as they always come home from the laundry. Then they are also ready for the delivery department.

Sweet Pickles.

Citron Melon Pickle.—Take ripe citron melons, cut in slices and remove the seeds. To five pounds of melon allow two and one-half pounds of sugar and one quart of vinegar. Heat the vinegar and sugar to the boiling point and pour over the citron; let it stand twenty-four hours, then repeat scalding the syrup five successive days. In the last boiling of the syrup, add half an ounce of stick cinnamon, half an ounce of white ginger root, and a few cloves. When the syrup boils, put in the melon and boil ten minutes; then put in jars. Skim the syrup clear and pour it over the melon.

Sweet Tomato Pickle.—Four quarts of green tomatoes and three large onions. Slice them and sprinkle with one cup of salt; let them stand over night. In the morning drain and add to them one quart of water and one pint of vinegar. Boil fifteen minutes, then drain again and throw this vinegar and water away. Add to the pickle one pound of sugar, one quart of vinegar, one tablespoonful each of clove, allspice, ginger, mustard, cinnamon and one-half teaspoonful of cayenne, then boil fifteen minutes. This pickle keeps well, but for some reason is never better relished than in fall and early winter. The sharper acid pickles taste better in the spring months.

Pickled Pears.—Make a spiced syrup by using one pint of vinegar, one and one-half pounds of granulated sugar, one tablespoonful of coarsely ground cinnamon and one teaspoonful of cloves. Put the spices in a small muslin bag and simmer it in a small quantity of vinegar to extract the strength; then add this to the sugar and vinegar which should be put into an agate preserving kettle. Drop as many pears in the kettle as can be cooked conveniently in this amount of syrup and boil steadily for fifteen minutes. Shake the kettle occasionally to keep the fruit from cooking fast to the bottom of the kettle, but do not stir it with a spoon, as it will break the pears. Lift the fruit from the syrup and put in glass jars; pour over enough of the syrup to cover it and seal while hot. As some pears are quite juicy and others quite dry, no rule can be given as to the quantity of syrup needed for each pound of fruit to be pickled; some varieties absorb much and others add to the syrup. It is well to prepare enough so that a small

HOW TO INDUCE SLEEP.

Many Methods by Which the Drowsy God May Be Wooed.

One of the most effective inducers to sleep is a warm salt-water bath taken before retiring. This will almost always put a restless child to slumber if it is well, and if it is well fed after its bath. Sleeplessness in an adult is more difficult to contend with. A warm salt bath may not always act as quickly, but it is worth trying. If there is any tendency to cold feet put a warm bottle to the feet after bathing, and in many cases a restful sleep will follow. It is far better to resort to every subterfuge to induce sleep before resorting to any sleeping draught. Sometimes a few crackers or something else eaten just before retiring will induce sleep when nothing else will. For this purpose many people keep a cracker jar in their rooms. The thin wafer crackers are excellent for this purpose.

For the dry, burning sensation in the palms of the hands and soles of the feet which induces sleeplessness, sponge them in ammonia and water or vinegar and water. The continued dwelling on a certain thought may be of value. A frequent remedy of this kind is to imagine an endless flock of sheep stepping one by one over a stile. The continual monotony of the imaginary movement will soon put a wide-awake person asleep. A famous physician put his patients to drowsy slumber by an arrangement by which they listened to the constant dropping of water, drop by drop, on metal. If a person is habitually wakeful at night it is wise to give up tea and coffee at night, and drink in their place a bowl of fresh milk heated quite hot.

Sevres Porcelain.

Among the interesting exhibits by French manufacturers, at the Paris Exhibition this summer is a very beautiful one from the famous Sevres porcelain factory. The display includes four hundred and forty separate pieces, varying from dainty cups, saucers and plates, to vases and urns of enormous size, statuettes, portraits and even the most delicate bouquets of flowers. Many of the pieces at once impress the observer as beautiful, while others seem a little "pronounced" in their vived blues and greens.

Almost every tint which can be imparted to porcelain is here; white, turquoise blue, all the greens, the delicate rose-pink which has received the name of "Dubarry," and scarlet, which has hitherto proved one of the most difficult of colors to retain under the fierce heat of the baking furnaces.

The manufacture of Sevres ware is one of the best, oldest and most characteristic arts of the French. The Sevres potteries have long been under the direct control and patronage of the government, and are in receipt of an annual thousand francs. The proceeds from sales go to the State treasury. Many fine pieces are sent as gifts to foreign countries.

It may be interesting to note the origin of an art which has attained such a world-wide celebrity.

A royal porcelain factory was first established at Vincennes in 1745, under Louis XV, and produced many notable pieces of ware, particularly bouquets. On one occasion, it is related, His Majesty was the victim of a practical joke. One of the exceedingly life-like bouquets having been placed in his green-house by the royal favorite, Madame de Pompadour, the king, on his next visit to the place, stooped and, in all good faith, attempted to smell the rare exotic.

The factory was transferred from Vincennes to Sevres in 1756, since which date

Marriage is a Failure.

When there is too much latchkey.

When dinner is not ready at dinner time.

When either of the parties marries for money.

When the watchword is, "Each for himself."

When neither husband nor wife takes a vacation.

When children are obliged to clamor for their rights.

When the vacations are taken by one side of the house only.

When "he" snores the loudest while "she" kindles the fire.

When the children are given the neck and the back of the chicken.

When a man attempts to tell his wife what style of bonnet she must wear.

When one of the parties engages in a business that is not approved by the other.

When a man's Christmas presents to his wife consist of bootjacks, shirts, and gloves for himself.

When politeness, fine manners and kindly attentions are reserved for company or visits abroad.

When the lord of creation pays more for his cigars than his better half does for hosiery, bro s and bonnets.

When the money that should go for a book goes for what only one side of the house knows anything about.

When both parties persist in arguing over a subject upon which they never have thought, and never can think alike.

When "father" takes half the pie and leaves the other half for the one that made it and her eight children.

Lace and Muslin Curtains.

Lace curtains should be soaked over night in a tub of lukewarm water with two tablespoonfuls of ammonia and a little soap. In the morning drain off the water and pour over them fresh water slightly warm; move the lace about carefully, squeeze out gently and put in a third suds. At the last rinse blue in thin starch water, pass lightly through a wringer, hang them up, and when nearly dry pin over a sheet stretched on a carpet, or secure in a frame, with a strip of cotton tacked up on the edges to which the curtain is smoothly fastened, then left to dry.

Another way is fasten them to the line by one edge with clothes pins only a few inches apart; then gently pull and stretch them until dry enough to iron.

A good authority gives this way of doing up muslin curtains. Wash them carefully, starch and iron while damp, on the wrong side. This restores the appearance of new cloth. When you iron them have the table perfectly flat, cover it with a good, thick blanket, and then with a good thick ironing sheet. Lay the curtain on the table straight, and always move the flatiron in the same direction, up and down or back and forward across the curtain. Do not put your hand under the edge while ironing as it will give the curtain a ruffled edge which will greatly mar the appearance when hung at the window.

A Laundry Finish.

This is how a shirt is ironed at a big laundry after it is ready for the iron which is not a flat-iron at all but a roller eight inches long and six inches in diameter, and heated by gas, operated by a machine with a girl to run it. The young woman controls the affair with a treadle, and passes the bosom of the shirt under the roller, which produces a most beautiful polish. In her left hand she holds a moistened sponge, in her right a little ivory paper cutter. With the sponge she wets spots that seem to need dampening, while with the paper-while not. As some pears are quite juicy and others quite dry, no rule can be given as to the quantity of syrup needed for each pound of fruit to be pickled; some varieties absorb much and others add to the syrup. It is well to prepare enough so that a small quantity of fresh syrup may be added to that which is in the kettle from time to time as the fruit absorbs it, and as it is used to fill up the cans.

SWEET SPICED PEACHES.—Drop the peaches into boiling water, then the skins will slip off easily. Weigh them and allow half their weight in sugar, and to each pound of sugar used allow one quart of vinegar, one heaping tablespoonful of whole mixed spices. Boil the sugar and vinegar, removing the scum as it rises. When the syrup is clear put in as many peaches as will float and boil them until they begin to grow soft, then skim them out. When all the peaches are boiled put in the spice and boil the syrup until it thickens. Put the peaches in jars, pour the syrup over them and seal.

SWEET APPLE PICKLE.—Use sweet apples not over-ripe. Pare and quarter them, then boil them in clean water until they can be pierced with a fork, but be careful that they do not break. Take out of the water, and into each quarter stick a whole clove. Make a syrup of one quart of vinegar, one pound of sugar; boil and skim, then put in the apples, let them heat through, then put in jars and seal. The syrup may be spiced with ground cinnamon, allspice and clover if liked.

For those who have not convenient little household scales it is well to remember that one pint of granulated sugar will weigh a pound.

Ancient Letters.

Mr. Petrie's excavations have brought other long-buried wonders to light. Half a mile from the pyramid of Illahun he came upon a Christian cemetery of the fifth and sixth centuries. The rich garments of the pious Copts buried there are described as being, from the extreme dryness of the spot, "still quite sound and even wearable." Below the cemetery were found the foundation deposits of Usertesen II., about B. C., 2960. Close to the temple are the remains of a town of the same period, evidently built at one time, and originally, it is supposed, intended for the architects and workmen employed upon the pyramid. It was here that the pottery with the alphabetic signs was found. Here also dozens of invaluable papyri were revealed. Of some of these Mr. Petrie writes: "They are apparently accounts, all in ruled columns and lines, exquisitely neat and in a beautifully clear hand, many of the entries being in red. I have flatted and laid under press seven square feet of sheets and fragments, all of the Twelfth Dynasty." But the most remarkable of the relics of the ancient civilization, or at least those which come home to us with most of the freshness and pathos of a living and personal interest, were those turned up at Tell Gurob, five or six miles from Illahun. Here the head cases of mummies were found to be made of many layers of papyri plastered together. Separated by soaking," says the account before us, "these papyri have been made to tell their story, sometimes trivial, sometimes pathetic, after the lapse of countless ages. One is a letter from a youth at college, telling his father of his progress, and saying that he now understands mensuration and can draw a plan of a house; another from a royal goose herd, who states that he cannot supply twelve geese for King Ptolemy's festival." How these revelations of common feelings and wants of humanity bridge the chasms of scores of centuries and bring back to us the real life of those actors on the stage of a world so long past that it is hard without such assistance, to conceive of it as peopled with beings of like wants and feelings with ourselves.

next visit to the place, stooped and, in all good faith, attempted to smell the rare exotic.

The factory was transferred from Vincennes to Sevres in 1756, since which date it has sent forth works of almost inestimable value. Porcelain pastes, colored by metallic oxides, are now compounded there which resist the action of the most fiery furnace; and the enamels and glazes have a marvellous transparency and lustre.

Sevres porcelain has always been an expensive production, for the most skilled artists have been employed in its manufacture. Formerly the finest pieces were made solely for royalty, and were sold only by royal permission. The prices paid, in modern times, for some of these specimens, have steadily increased till they have become enormous.

Cups, saucers and bowls go off readily at five hundred dollars, or more. At a recent sale, a pair of rose Daberry vases were purchased for the sum of eightsen hundred and fifty guineas, almost ten thousand dollars; while cups and saucers went off at one hundred and fifty guineas. During the present year, single plates have sold for one thousand dollars each, and vases from twenty-five hundred dollars upward.

A few years ago the enormous sum of fifty thousand dollars was paid for a single set of three jardinieres.

What She Ought to See.

"James, you have been fighting. I can tell it by the look in your eye."

"Yes, but, Mother, you should see the look in the other boy's eye."

Had Him There.

The novelist, Count Leo Tolstoi, as is well known, gave up literary work to a great extent and busied himself chiefly with manual labor and the spreadof the "gospel of brotherly love." A short time ago, when driving in the streets of Moscow, he saw a policeman arrest a peasant because of some slight offence against the police regulations, and lead him along the street. Ordering his coachman so halt, the count rushed up to the policeman and asked him if he could read.

"Certainly."

"Have you read the Bible?"

"Then," continued the Count to the surprised officer, "do not forget that we are commanded to love our neighbors as ourselves."

They policeman looked at him in astonishment for a moment, then began an inquisition of his own.

"Can you read?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Have you read the police regulations?"

The Count was obliged to reply in the negative.

"Then," answered the officer, as he proceeded on his way with the prisoner, "read them then before you come here and preach."

An eminent statistician has estimated that in the wars of the last thirty-four years the loss of human life has been 2,253,000. The greatest loss was in the American civil war—900,000 men—and the next in the Crimean war, 750,000. In the Turco-Russian war 250,000 lives were lost; in the Franco Prussian war 215,000, in the Austro-Prussian war 45,000, and in the Italian war of 1859 45,000. The very large loss sustained in the wars in which Russia and Turkey were opposed, and the comparatively small loss in the two Prussian wars, are worthy of note. In the two cases where the losses on both sides are given—the American war and the Franco-Prussian war—the loss of the vanquished was far greater than the loss of the victors.

Dr. Brown-Sequard's Elixir.

Dr. William A. Hammond says in the "North American Review:"—The first information received in this country of Dr. Brown-Sequard's researches was through a telegram to a New York newspaper, conveying such imperfect details, however, that the writer was disposed to question either the authenticity of the report or Dr. Brown-Sequard's mental equilibrium. It was apparently stated that various glands of the body were used in his experiments, and that Dr. Brown-Sequard had suddenly become a very much younger man than he had been. Further information, however, showed the exact nature of his experiments and of the claims which he had set up in their behalf. The writer, therefore, determined to examine into the matter for himself, and as the result of his investigation he is enabled to give, in such general terms as are suitable for a secular journal like the "North American Review," a confirmation of Dr. Brown-Sequard's statements, so far as his researches have extended. And not only this, but he has apparently shown that muscular rheumatism of long standing has been entirely relieved after a single injection of the juice in question. He has been careful to state, and he still so declares, that all the experiments performed up to this time are not sufficient to establish the claims of this glandular juice as an alleviator of old age or a curer of any disease whatever. The whole matter is yet in its experimental stage, and it will there remain until the subject has been examined into by many physicians under different circumstances, and a general coincidence of opinion obtained. . . . . Now, Dr. Brown-Sequard did not go blindly to work with his experiments, for every intelligent physician knows the relation which exists between the glands in question and the mental and physical condition of the animal to which they belong. There is much a priori reasoning to support the conclusions at which he has arrived. They are not based upon empiricism, but are rational investigations carried out with intelligence. Whether or not he has made any apparent addition to our means of assuaging the infirmities of old age or of curing disease, time alone can show. But those physicians who denounce honest investigation in this or any other direction are unworthy of the profession to which they belong, and should be relegated to some limbo where they can enjoy their self satisfaction without coming in contact with their more energetic brethren.

Britain's Future Fuel.

The British Association is meeting this year at Newcastle-on-Tyne for the third time in a quarter of a century. The new president is Professor W. H. Flower, of the British Museum, and the head of the geographical section is a man well known in Canada, Sir Francis de Winton. It is suggested that the scientists, meeting in the place they do, shall apply themselves to the tough old problem of when the British coal beds are likely to run out. The possibility of liquid fuel being adapted for replacing coal is already being discussed, and the Liverpool Mercury says on this point: "The English consul at St. Petersburg, in his last report, says that the residuum of naphtha is being used in Russia as fuel to a constantly increasing extent. Taking the city of Moscow as an example, it is found that, although that city is 1,500 miles from Baku, the source of supply, yet the dregs of naphtha prove 35 per cent. cheaper for fuel than either wood or coal. The manufacturers and the railway companies are using liquid fuel, as well as the steamers on the Caspian sea, and a stove is now being introduced which will utilize liquid fuel for domestic purposes. cheaper for fuel than either wood or coal. The manufacturers and the railway companies are using liquid fuel, as well as the steamers on the Caspian sea, and a stove is now being introduced which will utilize liquid fuel for domestic purposes. Efforts are also being made to introduce different kinds of petroleum into England as fuel, and it may come to pass that the apparently boundless stores of petroleum in Canada and other places will enter into competition with our own coal seams." The eye of the outsider appears to be turned in the direction of our limitless supply of petroleum.

Farmers, Beware !

A new scheme to defraud the confiding farmer has recently been put in practice. It was worked on a Lyon County farmer and is described as follows: An agent called on the farmer to sell him apple trees. He did not ask any pay for them, but simply asked the farmer to plant them on shares. The agent of the company furnished the trees, the farmer planted them, and the company got half the fruit for twelve years from the time of planting. The farmer bound himself to keep the trees pruned, etc.; also, if he sold his farm any time before the 12 years expired, he must pay for the trees at the rate of $1.50 each. For this he gave a bond of agreement as security to the agent for $500, and this bond was registered against the land without the farmer's knowledge. In the course of two or three months another gentleman came along looking for a farm. He called at the house and told the farmer that his farm was just what he wanted. He had the cash to pay down and offered him all or more than it was worth. They made a deal, but of course before the purchaser paid any money down he wanted to go and examine the registry office, to which he and the farmer proceeded. They found the bond registered against the place for $500, and the farmer rather than miss so good a sale, paid the $500 in order to get a clear title. He then looked for his friend who had purchased his farm, but he was nowhere to be found. He only then learned that he had been swindled out of his money. The swindler has not been heard from.—[Farm, Field & Stockman.

Johnsing—"Does you t'ink dat de young lady rekiprosates youah affection, Julius?"

Julis—"I don't got myself up to much of a jedge of sech mattahs, Mistah Johnsing, but it do look w'en a lady squeeze a gemman so hahd dat she breaks de razzer in his west pocket dat she am leanin' his way a little, eh?"

During the flood at Rockford, W. Va., a young lady who lost her voice last autumn stumbled and fell, while escaping from the water, and tried to scream for help. She immediately recovered her voice and can speak as well as ever.

A Canadian Parliamentary Committee last session pretty well established that tuberculosis or consumption in cattle is transferable in milk to human beings. The subject has since been discussed by the Academy of Medicine in Paris. There Dr. Lancereaux took the ground that the disease is not transmitted unless the subject is predisposed to it through bad hygienic conditions, bad ventilation, sedentary habits, or temperature. The French theory is somewhat reassuring, though even thus limited the danger is bad enough. Prehaps a more alarming statement than that for which our Parliamentary Committee is responsible comes from the French scientists. It is to the effect that the saliva of a consumptive actually infects the atmosphere with the bacilli of consumption.

—Just arrived a fine lot of assorted crockery to be sold cheap. Also tinware, base balls, rubber balls, looking glasses, toilet soaps, handkerchiefs, note paper, clothes pins, chromos, oil paintings, pictures frames, jack knives, combs, clothes brushes, and tops of every discription at the 7c. store west of the Campbell house.

—Madame Fry
—In Town Hall,
—Saturday, 12th October.
—Plan at J. J. Perry's drug store.
—The richest musical treat of the season.

—On Tuesday the Board of Audit met at the Court House and passed a large number of accounts.

—Judge Wilkison held a court of revision at Tamworth on Monday, and got through a lot of work in a very short space of time.

—Last Saturday Robt. Grange was arrested and fined $1 and cost, $5.20 paid the bill. It costs money to get drunk and disorderly in Napanee.

—On Saturday last we had a genuine hail storm in Napanee, the first of the season. It only lasted a few minutes, but was quite long enough for October.

—Next week a party of hunters consisting of J. C. Huffman, Uriah Sills and some others leave for a two weeks trip into the rear of Addington. We wish them luck.

—The Deseronto Driving Park Association announce that they will have one day's racing on Friday, October 18th. We have not learned particulars, but presume that the events will be interesting and draw a crowd.

—See Baker's bedroom sets, diningroom and parlor furniture before purchasing elsewhere. Prices are away below any other house in the county, and every article guaranteed to be as represented. Give him a call. Warerooms north side of the market square.

—"Madame Fry and her daughers have unusual musical talent, and I cheerfully commend them to the public." From Dr. Eben Tourgee, director of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston. Madame Fry and her daughters will be at the Town Hall, Napanee, to-morrow (Saturday) night.

—Billy Bradley hails from Camden. He was so much overcome by the damp weather of Wednesday that he thought it best to take something, and not being posted as to the strength of Napanee tangle-leg got boisterous and was run in. He contributed $5.20 to the town treasury.

—The Messrs. Stevenson are arranging to further test the question whether or not there is oil in paying quantities on the old mill site. Sir Richard Cartwright and the Rathbun Company are taking a hand in. There is certainly oil on the premises, and if it proves to be there in large quantities Napanee will get a decided boom.

—We extend congratulations to A. B. Aylsworth, of Toronto, on being elected to the Senate of Toronto University. This is a much coveted honor, and we are glad to see a representative from this county chosen to fill a position which we know he will grace. Mr. Aylsworth is the son of J. B. Aylsworth, Esq., of Newburgh.

—An organ recital will be given in the Eastern Methodist church on Tuesday evening, November 12th, by Prof. W. H. Donley, of Bridge st. church, Belleville. The programme will be interspersed with vocal selections by distinguished local talent and a most enjoyable entertainment may be looked forward to by the music-loving people of our town. adv.

—A party of ten went to Belleville on Monday evening to listen to the eloquent speech delivered by Hon. Wilfrid Laurier. The large Opera House was crowded to the doors and the whole audience evidently enjoyed listening to the eloquent Reform leader. Mr. Laurier said that the platform of the Reform party was Unrestricted Reciprocity with the United States, and that they would not rest untill their object was —The gate receipts on Tuesday and Wednesday amounted to about $600, a little better than last year.

—The "Relief Circle" of Kings Daughters intend holding a social at an early date for the benefit of the poor of the town. Full particulars will be given next week.

—Dr. May, Inspector of Mechanics' Institutes, paid the Napanee Institute an official visit on Wednesday of this week. In the evening a Directors meeting was held and was addressed by the Inspector.

—We surrender most of our space this week to reports of the different fairs. In consequence considerable local news, correspondence and other interesting matter is crowded out, all of which will appear next week.

—Applications were received from the following persons for the appointment of Chief of Police at the town council meeting on Monday evening last: Wm. Hooper, Jeremiah Storms, W. W. Bell, Wm. Kimmett, Jas. McKim, Ed. Gonyou and Geo. Lloyd.

—Just as we go to press we learn that a very sad calamity befell Charles Fraser, the twenty year-old son of Isaac Fraser, of Ernesttown, in Manitoba. He was working about a steam thresher when the boiler exploded killing him almost instantly. The body will be brought to his father's for burial. Much sympathy is extended to his relatives in their bereavement.

—The following resolution was passed at a meeting of the town council on Monday evening last:

Moved by Mr. Lapum, seconded by Mr. Gibbard, that this council desire to place upon record its sense of the loss the corporation of Napanee has sustained in the death of our late Chief of Police, James Allen. During the term of twenty-two years in the service of the corporation, he was always zealous, upright and painstaking in the discharge of his duties, and in his official capacity earned the respect and gratitude of the whole community. His natural charitable disposition and sympathy with the poor was recognised by all; his christian virtues gained the esteem of his fellow citizens and there is general regret over his decease. We would extend to the widow and family of the deceased our sincere sympathy in their bereavement. Carried unanimously.

Evening Classes.

The Board of the Mechanics' Institute, have decided to hold evening classes during the winter months, taking a complete commercial course and perhaps an English course. Those desiring to attend will kindly leave their names with A. E. Paul or W. C. Scott during next week. Tuition free.

R. you will find a great advantage if you purchase tickets from the authorized agent. Call or write to W. D. Madden for maps, folders and all reliable information. adv.

—The improved Pease Furnace has a larger heating capacity than any other warm air furnace invented. The fire pots are heavier than those of any other. All parts above the cast iron fire pot are made of heavy wrought Scotch plate steel. Nine tenths of the furnaces put up in Toronto where they are made, and three-fourths in Napanee are the Pease furnaces. Proof positive they are the best. BOYLE & SON, Sole Agents.

—On Saturday last the executors of the late Amos H. Allison offered for sale a quantity of chattel property and also two lots of real estate. The chattels were all disposed of at low prices, but the real estate, consisting of the properties just east and in the rear of the Western Methodist Church, were withdrawn from sale, the reserve bid not being reached in either case. The reserve bid for the Bridge street property was $1000, while the white house on Robert street was held at $900.

—Madame Fry's Concert.—A rich treat is in store for the music loving people of this vicinity, on Saturday, (to-morrow) night. Madame Fry's Concert Company of Boston, is acknowledged to be one of the finest organizations on the continent to-day. The programme to be given will be varied, consisting of vocal as well as instrumental solos, duetts,, trios, and quartettes. Besides these Mr. Wentworth will give a number of humorous readings and impersonations. Mr. Wentworth, as an elocutionist has no superior and but few equals.

doors and the whole audience evidently enjoyed listening to the eloquent Reform leader. Mr. Laurier said that the platform of the Reform party was Unrestricted Reciprocity with the United States, and that they would not rest untill their object was attained.

—A well known resident has passed away in the person of Edmund Hooper. He at one time was quite wealthy; was Treasurer of Lennox and Addington; member of Parliament for this county; went to Manitoba a little over nine years ago; returned about two years ago, broken in health, and died on Saturday last. The funeral on Monday was largely attended.

—A century—McAlister & Co. have secured a plum for their customers in the overcoat way. They have bought 100 boys, youths' and mens' winter overcoats, the balance of a manufacturers stock at a discount of twenty-five per cent. off regular prices. This will enable them to offer the goods to their customers at exactly wholesale figures. Don't buy an overcoat until you see this line.

—Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Gibbard have thrown their house open for this evening, and will give a farewell social in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Clarkson. Rev. C. O. Johnson will also be present, and an opportunity will thus be given for not only saying good bye to Mr. Clarkson and his estimable wife, but also of welcoming the new pastor of the Western church. Mr. and Mrs. Gibbard cordially invite all of the citizens of Napanee to be present during the evening. The social begins at half past seven.

—We clip the following fron the Globe of Friday last: —Whittington v. Gleeson. —Judgment in action tried at Napanee before a jury. Upon the answers of the jury judgment to be entered for the plaintiff $3 damages and restraining the defendant from cutting timber on the land in question other than that contained between two certain fences, and known as the south field of the west half of lot 13, in the 6th concession of the Township of Fredericksburgh. The defendant to pay costs. Proceedings stayed till the fourth day of next sittings of the Divisional Court. J. English (Napanee) for plaintiff. Deroche (Napanee) for defendant.

—Yesterday morning Mrs. Dr. Cook was taken seriously ill at the dental rooms of Dr. Wray. Mrs. Cook was having some teeth extracted, and had cocoaine injected for the purpose of lessening the pain. The powerful drug had a very depressing effect on her heart, and it was feared that death would follow before the family could be summoned. She rallied sufficiently to be conveyed to her home on Bridge street, and to-day is much better, although suffering considerable pain, and being in great danger all day yesterday. Drs. Warner and Leonard are attending Mrs. Cook. Dr. Cook left for Halifax this week.

—The Western Meth. Church has been extremely fortunate in having remarkably able and popular men as pastors, but it is generally admitted that Rev. C. O. Johnston, who filled the pulpit for the first time on Sabbath last, is one of the most eloquent divines who ever preached in Napanee. His sermon in the morning on "The Love of Christ" was touching in its simplicity, beautiful in thought and word and magnificent in its strength. That of the evening even excelled the morning's powerful effort. His theme was "David's contest with Goliath" and the many beautiful lessons which he drew from that narrative held the large audience with closest attention. Mr. Johnston has already established himself as an earnest preacher of the word, and we look forward to large results from his labors in Napanee. He will occupy his pulpit on Sabbath next, both morning and evening.

author. Dr. Poole is well known in this vicinity, having preached many times in Napanee. The object of the work is to prove that the Saxon race are the decendants of the lost ten tribes of Israel. The book is published in Toronto at the Methodist book room. Rev. Dr. Burns president of Hamilton College says of it: This is a remarkable book, on a subject very little studied or understood. The theory advanced seems so contrary to the received opinion of the Anglo-Saxon family that the very mention of it provokes something bordering on ridicule. I must confess that I took up this work with strong prejudices against it. But having begun to read, the difficulty was to stop. The book fairly bristles with points and surprises that will carry the student eagerly to the last page. It is an eminently suggestive work, it will make the reader think. There is hardly a dry page in the book; its material is far from being commonplace or trite."

The Brantford Binder.

Conspicuous among the agricultural implements, exhibited at our fair this year, we observe the popular and well known Brantford Binder, driven by a vigorous and spiteful little coal oil engine, the whole outfit forming one of the most novel and interesting exhibits on the ground, besides illustrating in a striking degree the thorough and perfect equipment of the Harris Co.

Without drawing comparisons it may be admitted and is, we believe, very generally conceded by farmers and machine men everywhere, that the Brantford Binder incorporates the newest and most advanced principles of modern mechanical harvesting; that it is a machine of to-day and bears the impress of the thorough mechanic in every part; that it has an identity peculiar to itself; that it tops the pile in point of sales, and fixes the pattern as well as the pace for all competitors.

Amply able and always ready to give full value for every dollar received, Harris Son & Co., of Brantford, have achieved success by deserving it, and as a natural consequence of square legitimate trading their goods are to be found on almost every concession and in every township in Canada.

52,000 Brantford Binders were made and sold during the season now drawing to a close, and not one has failed to fill its warrantee and do its work in a perfectly satisfactory manner, and in almost every grain growing country on the face of the earth the "Brantford" pushes its aggressive nose and can be found quietly performing its work and paying tribute to the genius of its makers.

—Mr. W. E. Baker has been extending his premises on the north side of the market square, in order to accommodate his rapidly increasing trade in all kinds of furniture. He has now on hand the largest and best stock ever shown by him, and at prices lower, as usual, than any other house.

DIED.

HOOPER.—At Napanee, on Saturday, 5th October, 1889, Edmund John Glynn Hooper, aged 71 years, 3 months.

THE CHAMPION FISH.

Hay Bay Breaks the Record.

Mr. Fraser, of Clayton, N. Y., has been spending his vacation in the neighborhood of Hay Bay. On Tuesday, 10th of October, he was just about the tallest man for his inches that could be found around the Bay of Quinte. The cause of his longitude ended was the catching of an enormous masko opposite Mr. Spencer's house on Hay Bay, the beauty measuring four feet seven inches long, and weighing forty seven pounds, thus breaking the record. Mr. Spencer, who weighed the fish, says it is one of the most beautfully formed fish he ever saw. Parties who want some exciting sport should try the masko trolling on Hay Bay. Morrison Sentenced.

Morrison the Megantic outlaw, who was recently tried on a charge of manslaughter in the killing of constable Warren, some months ago has been sentenced to eighteen years imprisonment. Warren was shot down while attempting to arrest Morrison. Warren started out with the avowed intention of taking Morrison, dead or alive. Morrison knew this to be the case, and being determined to retain his liberty, as soon as he got sight of the constable, deliberately fired at Warren, with fatal results. No doubt there were extenuating circumstances; the unjust treatment Morrison is said to have received resulting in the loss of the farm and subsequent ejectment no doubt carried him beyond self control, and then his fiery Hyland nature was let loose. No doubt his early education or

DOMINION VOTERS' LISTS.

GREAT REFORM GAINS IN LENNOX.

A Synopsis of the Work Done.

Judge Price has been holding Courts of Revision under the Dominion Franchise Act during the past two weeks, and, thus far, the Reformers have been making great gains. The Conservatives have evidently been caught napping as, in the majority of cases, the time for filing appeals had elapsed before theirs were prepared. At Napanee, on Tuesday of last week, the Reformers struck off forty-five Tories and added thirty-five Grits, or a change of eighty. The Tories did not make a single change. At Richmond on the following day, thirty-five Tories were struck off and eight Grits added, making a change of forty-three. The Tories added one man but did not strike off any Reformers. This makes a net gain of forty-two in the township of Richmond. Thursday Judge Price spent part of the day at North Fredericksburgh Town Hall, when the Reformers succeeded in making still further gains. In that township forty-seven Tories were struck from the list and thirteen Reformers added thereto, or a change of sixty. On Friday court was held in South Fredericksburgh, the Reformers adding five to the list and striking off forty-seven Tories. At Amherst Island eleven Reformers were added and ten Tories struck off. At Bath twenty-five Tories went into oblivion and one Grit was placed on the list. At this place the Tories added two. At Odessa on Wednesday no less than 107 Tories were struck from the list and eighteen Grits placed thereon, or a change of 125 for the township of Ernesttown. The Tories had a long list of appeals ready but they were thrown out by the Judge as they were not filed in the regular way. To-day court is held in Adolphustown and the list will then be completed. Messrs. Herrington & Warner have charge of the appeals in the Reform interest and Mr. Fred Ruttan is managing matters for the Conservative party. Thus far the account stands thus:

Reformers added	91
Tories added	3
Reform gain	88
Tories struck off	296
Reformers struck off	0
Reform gain	296
Reform gain by additions	88
Total Reform gain	384

The Reformers have every reason to feel satisfied with the above result, while the Tory party feel correspondingly blue.

erately fired at Warren, with fatal results. No doubt there were extenuating circumstances; the unjust treatment Morrison is said to have received resulting in the loss of the farm and subsequent ejectment no doubt carried him beyond self control, and then his fiery Hyland nature was let loose. No doubt his early education, or rather want of education, had much to do with the uncontrollable spirit he manifested. Unfortunately there seems to be a growing disposition to use the revolver on very slight pretexts, such for instance as the shooting of an innocent man in Hamilton by a policeman who was attempting to break into a private room without warrant or even a charge against the unfortunate victim, and another recent case of a policeman shooting a man at Keewatin who was said to be breaking into the gaol by throwing stones. Instead of arresting the man, this protector of the people threatened, and then shot the offender. It is about time an example was made of these sharp shooters. There is no legitimate excuse for policemen or other officers of the law using firearms except in defence of their lives; much less are private citizens justified in carrying or using firearms. People must understand that wrongs must be righted without resorting to the taking of life. No matter how much we may sympathise with Morrison on account of his misfortune, we think he may well congratulate himself on having escaped the greater penalty of having his neck stretched.

To Locate in New York.

The following extracts from the Albany papers will be read with interest:

"We are sorry to learn of the contemplated removal of the Cleveland baking powder business from this city. We understand that its rapidly increasing business will shortly render enlarged facilities desirable, so that the proprietors have determined to remove to New York, where their export trade can be more conveniently handled.

"Albanians, who have watched the growth of this business from small beginnings to its present mammoth proportions, will regret to see it go, but will rejoice with its owners in its new prosperity. It is but just to say that Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder as a food product has the enviable reputation of being a thoroughly wholesome, effective, and honestly made article. The people of Albany and vicinity have known this fact for about a score of years and have shown their appreciation by their steadily increasing consumption of this excellent baking powder. This, and the fact that all recent investigations, including those made by the Food Commissioners of the States of Ohio and New Jersey and of the Canadian Government, show that Cleveland's is superior to any baking powder on the market, have so increased the business that more extensive accomodations are necessary.

"A new label is being prepared, but the old name "Cleveland's Superior Baking Power" and the heretofore high quality of goods will be maintained.

"Dr. Hoagland, the first, and for many years, President, and Wm. Zeigler, former Treasurer, of the Royal Company, two of its main props, have now left it. The former will be President of the new Company, and his known integrity, liberality, and experience promise great success for the new organization, and lively times for all competitors."

Attacked Three Times.

"Having been attacked for the third time with Inflamatory Rheumatism, which kept me in bed six weeks under medical care, without relief, I resolved to try Burdock Blood Bitters, and before I had finished the third bottle I was able to work again." GEORGE ROBB, Garden Hill, Ont.

HOUSEHOLD.

A Working Dress for Women.

An exchange says:—"The need of a convenient dress for work is strongly felt by business women. One of the largest working girl's societies in New York has adopted the blouse waist and straight-gathered skirt as a club dress for the members. The dress of young American women would be improved by simplicity and cheapness. They dress too expensively and too much, as a rule." Interviews with some twenty or more women engaged in making their own living resulted in the discovery that eighteen of them believed there was a crying need of some dress designed distinctively for business women, in which they might have more comfort and convenience than in the garments they now wear. Said one of them: "A friend of mine, just home from the Paris Exposition, is very much interested in something she saw there in the way of a reformed dress for business women. There is no doubt that some reform in that direction must and will come, though it is slow, because women are not only very conservative, but very much afraid of wearing anything that makes them conspicous or ridiculous. It is not women they are afraid of so much as the men, who, ever since the days of Jeremiah the Prophet, have been inveighing against the follies of women's dress, but who are the first to jeer at and persecute her if she dare attempt to emancipate herself from those follies in any way. Now, in my own case, for example, my work requires that I should be out of doors a great deal, no matter what the state of the weather may be. My condition when it storms is positively pitiable. I must hold up my umbrella, grasp my skirts with one hand to try to keep them out of the wet—which, by the way, never does succeed in keeping them out of it entirely—and whatever books, and papers or parcels I may have to carry must be tucked insecurely under one arm. I have passed men plodding about in the rain and almost wept from envy. Their trousers are turned up quite out of the danger of wet, their long mackintoshes have deep pockets that will hold all their parcels and papers, and they have both hands free for their umbrellas, and they can step into their office, lay aside their outside wraps, and be as neat and dry as when they left home. Let any woman walk through a windy rain and see if she can say the same thing when she arrives at her destination. The new French dress which my friend saw at the Paris Exposition seems to me the best suggestion I have heard yet. The trouble has been to find something that would, while being convenient, be also graceful and modest, and this seems to come near it. It is modelled on the uniform of the Zouave regiments and consists of trousers and gaiters—the neatest thing, by the way, for walking that has ever been invented. This makes no exposure of the person at all while leaving the limbs perfectly free. Over it is a skirt that comes almost to the ankle, but it is only slightly gathered and is slit up on each side to the hip, so that while it answers all purposes of modesty it does not interfere in the least with locomotion. The waist can be either a blouse with a sash, or a waistcoat and coat with plenty of pockets. I hear that a number of French women who manage their own farms or have work to do out of doors have adopted it and find it both comfortable and becoming. Mme. Dieulafoy, the great explorer, who wears an entire male costume on her travels, is a great admirer of the new dress and says it is, she thinks, the solution of the problem of a working dress for working women.

First and foremost there is the basket, an elaborate affair of gilded wicker-work upon a stand just conveniently high for daily use. This is lined with silk or satin, pure white or palest pink or blue—pink for boys and blue for girls, the gossips says; but that's a matter of taste. The edge is trimmed with lace, and bows of ribbon are tied wherever there is space, and the whole scented with daintiest sachets. This basket can be stocked, if you wish to be munificent, with silver powder-box and tiny silver-backed brush and velvety sponges, and finest soaps and gold safety pins. But everybody cannot give baskets since one is an abundance, so for the aunt who knits there are tiny silk shirts and socks not too dainty for anything when done in palest tints or cream or pearl white. Then here are sacques crocheted in silk or made of finest cashmere and sprigged with silk embroidery. And the matinees—for baby has his matinees as well as mamma—dainty, long, loose robes, to be thrown on in the morning, made of India silk or fine cashmere or flannel, and all herring-boned with silk floss and tied with narrow ribbons. A pretty gift is a swansdown pillow, just big enough for baby's head, made of white silk and hand-painted with some delicate flower in one corner and a suitable inscription, such as "Angels Guard His Slumber."

This pillow must, of course, be edged with lace. Then there is the carriage robe, in numberless designs, but the simplest is apt to be the prettiest. A square of white flannel, edged with lace, a handsome bow of ribbon in one corner a spray of embroidered or painted flowers is as pretty as anything. Baby's jewelry is limited, but there are always the traditional drinking mug of silver, a ring or two for the finger, gold studs linked by tiny chains, a necklace of amber beads to ward off disease and evil influences. There are boxes of finest powders, most delicately scented, imported especially for Baby, and perfumed sprays with which to give the last touch to the infant toilet and make him, if possible, sweeter than his own sweet self. These are only a few of the dainty and expensive things which every properly appreciated baby gathers unto itself ere it has seen its first moon upon earth, for it has grown to be an understood thing that no one shall come empty-handed to pay his respects to the "royal guest" of a happy family circle.

Choice Recipes.

POTATO-EGG DISH.—The eggs, beaten with a light, swift hand, have added to them a pinch of salt, pepper and a bit of chopped parsley and trifle of onion. The cold potatoes are then lightly whipped up with two or three tablespoonfuls of milk; the whole mixed together and fried in lard or butter a nice brown.

COLD BACON.—It is first soaked for a couple of hours in warm water, then all rusty parts and rind scraped clean. Then let come gradually to a boil in cold water skimmed all the time and simmered until done. It is next skinned; then bread crumbs sifted over it and pu after which it goes to the larder to get cold for supper or the next day's breakfast.

DISH OF STEWED BEEF.—The bone is cut out of a steak or a round and the meat sprinkled with red pepper. Then it is rolled and tied up and put into a stewing pan, well covered with stock, vegetables, a touch of herbs—vinegar and some sauce added—the whole simmering four to five hours. Then it is untied and laid in a deep dish, the gravy strained, thickened with butter and flour, boiled up (it may be flavored with wine to advantage) and poured over the meat, slices of buttered toast covering it when served.

PASSING NOTES.

Ornamental Shrubs—In soil where water does not stand in winter, this month is an excellent season for planting ornamental shrubs. For a small collection the following kinds are among the very best: Weigela rosea, Viburnum, plicatum, Japan Quince, Golden Bell, Hydrangea paniculata, various Spireas, Deutzia crenata and gracilis, Flowering Currant, Calycanthus, Forsythia or Golden Bell, Rose of Sharon, single and double, Japan Judas tree, Purple Barberry and White Fringe tree.

At the recent elections in France there were 1,800 candidates for 560 arrondissements. The correspondent of The London Times takes the view that the general desire to be a Deputy arises not so much from patriotism as from the solid advantages connected with the position. The Deputy has £365 a year, a free ticket over all French railways, free board during the session, free access to comfortable saloons and libraries, free stationery, excellent cigars at a low price, invitations to banquets, and the right of admission to theatres subsidised by the Government.

On the back of the great Frith of Forth bridge, the greatest wonder of the world, comes the proposal to connect the Friths of Forth and Clyde by a lockless ship canal. It is calculated that this could be accomplished for eight or ten millions of pounds, and that it would when completed be of priceless importance both for commerce and for war. It has so much to recommend it that it is generally thought that it will be set about almost immediately. The Manchester ship canal will cost about as much, though it is merely a local work, while this new project will be a national one.

The Spanish Government is alarmed at the rapid depopulation of Spain by immigration, and may take measures to check it. The emigrants go chiefly to South America; in five months of the present year Uruguay and the Argentine Republic received 20,000 Spaniards; and 1,500 natives of Rioja, Aragon and Catalonia embarked in one day from Barcelona embarked in one day from Barcelona for Buenos Ayres. The rapid growth of the South American countries gives great importance to the Pan-American Conference which will be held shortly in the United States.

According to a long article in the Fortnightly, from 60 to 86 per cent. of all the books given out of lending libraries in twenty-two of the principal towns of England were prose fiction, while from 1 to 2 per cent. were books on theology and philosophy, and about the like proportion of books of poetry and the drama. In Scotland the tone of public taste is a little higher, but only a little. The general conclusion reached is that there is an enormous demand for works of fiction, and that the preference is for books of a highly sensational character, and these often of an immoral character, and totally destitute of literary merit. It is to be feared that it is still worse on this side the Atlantic.

The latest difficulty that has presented itself to the promoters of the World's Fair of 1892 is connected with the operation of the contract labour law, which, as it stands, will prevent the importation of the numerous labourers and artisans who will be employed by the foreign exhibitors, and even of foreign salesmen, clerks, cashiers, etc. It has been suggested that the law should be amended to cover the case, but it is feared that such a step would arouse the indignation of the home labour element. In the meantime New York and Chicago continue to press their respective claims to the honour of the new dress and says it is, she thinks, the solution of the problem of a working dress for wor king women.

Woollen Underwe ar

Seniable people are beginning to agree that woollen underwear is a necessity to health, and some extreme theorists go so far as to insist that wool is the only proper material for the under and outer clothing of man. While few people are ready to accept woollen pocket handke chiefs and stiff collars and neckties of wool and many other incongruous sundries that extremists insist on, there has been a notable increase in the last few years of the garments made of wool for summer as well as winter use. The gentleman who should insist upon substituting a striped flannel for a white linen shirt would but a few years ago have been regarded as more than half mad. Various are the companies organized to meet the public demand for fine wool fabrics. Various methods to prevent wool from shrinking have been introduced, and there is more than one process patented to restore woollen goods which have been shrunken. When it is remembered that the alternate fibres of the wool are spirals, and that shrinking is the drawing up or catching together of these alternate fibres, these attempts do not appear so chimerical as might be supposed. All that stands in the way of the permanent adoption of undergarments of pure wool is this fact, that they are liable to shrink even with the perspiration of the skin. Any inventor that will restore such flannel to its orginal state would indeed be a benefactor to humanity. The beautiful ribbed underwear knit by hand or machine will ultimately shrink, do what you may.

A Word About Babies.

When the wise man wrote that there was nothing new under the sun he forgot about babies. Babies are always new. True, they have been in stock more or less for the last thousand years, but that does not prevent each individual baby that comes into the world in this year of our Lord from being just as new to the admiring parents and relatives as was the little Cain to Mother Eve and her consort Adam. Indeed, when one considers the uncommonly common nature of this phenomenon it is hard to account for the joyful and almost awesome surprise with which each little wrinkled mite of humanity is greeted, not only by its progenitors but by a whole retinue of worshipping neighbors and friends as well.

Only a few days ago a newly made father, who had probably never given the subject of babies five minutes' consideration in his life, informed in all seriousness a group of fellow-brokers on 'Change that his "baby was born with every nail on its ten tiny fingers and toes as perfect as yours or mine, sirs, at this moment"—this triumphantly and almost defiantly, as though challenging any one of them to dispute this wonderful statement—and every man of them looked as much surprised as though he had told them the child had been born with two heads. This is simply to illustrate how utterly new "Baby" is, and being new and altogether precious and undoubtedly superior to anything of the kind ever produced before, it is only meet, right and our bounden duty to welcome him—or her—in a manner becoming to such preciousness and uniqueness of creation. Hence has arisen the custom of bringing gifts to the altar—gifts of gold and frankincense and myrrh—of purple and fine linen. True, the frankincense and fine linen take on a somewhat modern form but just what form they should take is what puzzles many an unsophisticated worshipper who would no doubt be truly grateful for a timely hint as to just what is most suitable to select as a love offering to the latest arrival cut from paradise.

strained, thickened with butter and flour, boiled up (it may be flavored with wine to advantage) and poured over the meat, slices of buttered toast covering it when served.

PEACH JELLY.—Rub the down from the peaches, cut them in quarters and save the pits. Crack one-third of the pits, and add them to the fruit to be boiled with it. Boil as for quince jelly. After the straining allow the juice of one lemon to every pint of juice, and after measuring again to allow for the increase of the lemon juice, weigh out one pound of sugar to each pint of liquid and proceed as for quince. This will not make a jelly firm enough to stand in shape after being turned from the glass, but it wil be found just right for putting between the layers in jelly-cake.

hat the Cities all Need.

The man who will invent a noiseless rubber tire for the milk waggon will deserve to rank with Bell and Edison. He will deserve the votes of every honest man who lives on a paved street. It is a well-known fact that the milk waggon is beyond any doubt, the noisiest vehicle extant. To the city resident the darkest hour of the morning is not the one before the dawning—it is the hour just after the dawning. That is the hour when he and Morpheus are clinched, and the milk waggon rolls along and bids them break away. Everyone realizes the sweetness of that dozing slumber which accompanies the sun's first rays, and the hoarse, rumbling, metallic interruption of the morning milk waggon is the immediate cause of a great deal of sleepy, pianissimo profanity.—[Chicago interior.

Hadn't Read Juliet, but Thought Romeo Glorious.

Would-be Poet—"And, my dear doctor, I have taken such delight in all the great poems that I am sure that poetry is my vocation."

Eminent Litterateur—"And—ah—my dear young lady—you—ah—have read Romeo—ah—and Juliet?"

Would-be Poet—"Well, I haven't read Juliet, but I think Romeo is glorious." (Fact).

A Reason For Not Calling.

Mrs A.: "What a pleasant person Mrs. Greene is to visit? She always receives one so courteously, you know?" Mrs. B.: "Why, that's the only reason that I do not call upon her. It is a sign of vulgarity, don't you know, to appear so pleased to see visitors. It looks as though you were not in the habit of receiving company."

The Philadelphia "Ledger" says:—Col. John I. Rogrs, while in charge of the Bureau of Information at Johnstown, prepared a report about June 16th, which was published in the "Ledger" a few days afterward. In it he stated that 1,440 bodies had been recovered from the flood, and said:—"I am of the opinion, after much consideration of the entire field of inquiry, and remembering the proneness of almost every one to exaggeration in estimating populations and crowds of any kind, that three thousand is a fair estimate of the number lost—certainly four thousand will, in my opinion, cover it." At that time the current estimates of loss of life ranged as high as twelve and even fifteen thousand. For his conservative estimate Mr. Rogers was pronounced "a fool" in at least one paper, but time has vindicated his judgement. As stated yesterday, the new directory, compared with one collated in April last, indicates a losso 3,500 lives.

home labour element. In the meantime New York and Chicago continue to press their respective claims to the honour of holding the exhibition, while in New York there is a pretty quarrel over the proposed site in that city.

A Boston writer dubs the Maritime Provinces the New England annex because they supply the Eastern States with so large an immigration. It is estimated that seven teen thousand "provincialists" went to the United States by water last year, and that the average of the exodus has been from ten to twelve thousand annually during the past fifteen years. Many Maritime Province people cross the line on speculation; others secure situations in advance through employment offices devoted entirely to the finding of work for "provincialists." Eastern Canadians are much in demand because they are so sober and industrious. The circumstance speaks well for Canada; but it is not pleasant to reflect that so many people expatriate themselves to get a living.

Things Worth Knowing.

It was the privilege of the editor of this paper to recently meet at the White Mountains a gentleman now nearly eight five years old, who graduated at Columbia College, New York City, in 1824, sixty-five years ago—has been distinguished as a civil engineer, and now in full possession of all his mental faculties, is from the experiences of his long life a most interesting and valuable companion.

The other day he was telling us how even a small compass, attached to a watch chain, often magnetized and affected a watch, and the danger of carrying the two near each other; also, how much better it is to use no soap in shaving—simply thoroughly wetting the beard with cold water, and keeping it wet while shaving—how it saves time—is much better for the skin, etc, etc, especially in winter. Acting upon his advice we tried the experiment with complete success, and hereafter shall need in shaving only a razor and cold water. These things are worth knowing.

An Unfortuna'e Dog.

"I am worried about that dog," remarked Mr. Oltime, as the canine uttered a doleful wail.

"So is George," remarked his daughter.

"Humph, George hasn't any cause for troubles, if it were not for George my mind would be at peace now."

"How is that, papa?"

"Why, the other evening George was coming through the gate,"

"Yes, papa?"

"The dog sprang at him, caught him in the cheek"—

"Oh, papa!"

"And lost two front teeth."

How to Arrange a Raid.

Municipal dignitary (to police officials)—"Order the force to have everything in readiness for a descent on the gambling houses to-night."

Police Official (to subordinate officer)—"Tell the men to get ready for a raid on the gambling places to-night."

Subordinate Officer (to squad of police)—"Boys, be around here about eleven o'clock. We are ordered to make a haul of the gambling houses."

Policeman (to gambler)—"Jerry, we're goin' to raid ye about midnight. Tell the byes."

Bessie—"How was it you refused Charlie when you love him so?" Jemmie—"Because after proposing once he changed the subject and never referred to it again. I intended to accept him the third time he asked me."

FOREIGN NOTES.

The famous German regiment known as the Black Brunswickers are about to exchange their time-honoured uniforms for the Prussian pattern.

The range of the Mannlicher rifle was proved again in a startling manner the other day when an Austrian soldier was killed by one at target practice at a reputed range of over two miles and a-half.

There were assembled at the Royal Palace in Copenhagen the other day one Emperor, one Empress, one Empress Dowager, three Kings, one Queen, four heirs apparent, and thirty-five imperial and royal Princes and Princesses.

A movement is on foot in St. Petersburg for observing Sunday as it is understood in Canada and Great Britain. It is said that twelve hundred St. Petersburg merchants have already declared themselves willing to keep their places of business closed on the first day of the week.

Pita, the new remedy for hydrophobia recently discovered in Spain, seems to be a name given to the flower stalk of the aloe, a plant common in some parts of Spain. The story goes that its virtues were discovered accidentally by a man in a fit of hydrophobia falling upon an aloe plant and unconsciously biting the stem.

A hint for briefless barristers in other countries may be gained from their learned brothers in France. Some of the junior members of the legal profession in Paris have placed their services at the disposition of the manager of the Ambigu for the trial scene in "Roger de Honte," and their offer has been gratefully accepted.

A future is thought to lie before Alexander of Battenberg, retired to an estate in Styria since his marriage with his danseuse. In a few months he will receive a high command in the Austrian army, as Count Moltke entertains the very highest opinion of his strategic talents, and the Austrian army is in great need of a capable General.

Brigandage is now rife is Macedonia, and no fewer than 200 persons have been murdered and robbed within the last two months. Two brigands named Shakir and Osman, each of whom has committed more than twenty murders, are terrorizing the country. The Turkish authorities are described as showing a most suspicious supineness in the repression of brigandage.

"Daughter," wrote Madame de Sevigne in a famous phrase, "go and tell your daughter that her daughter's little girl is crying." There is a family at Roscoff, in France, in which such a remark would be appropriate, since there are five genarations of it alive at this mome t. The oldest member of the family is a great-great-grandmother of ninety three, and the youngest a small descendant aged one month. They all went to church together the other day when the newest generation was christened.

Alexandre Gustave Eiffil, who has leaped into fame on the strength of nine hundred and seventy-five feet of masonry and iron, is a muscular built man of commanding presence, with sandy-gray hair and closely-cropped beard. He is also seven and fifty, and has not escaped decoration, being a chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and commander of divers other orders, yet he commences his work daily at six o'clock in the morning, and he wears the worst fitting trousers in Europe.

M. Paul Du Chaillu had an interesting time of it when addressing the British Association on the subject of his forthcoming book, "The Vikings, the Direct Ancestors of the English-speaking People." The discussion that ensued produced considerable critical disagreement with Du Chaillu's theory, and on the subject of his forthcoming book, "The Vikings, the Direct Ancestors of the English-speaking People." The discussion that ensued produced considerable critical disagreement with Du Chaillu's theory, and finally, after some earnest arguments, he concluded his remarks excitedly with: "Patriotism is a splendid thing, but let us have the truth. I belong to the other side of the water—America—and they would not accuse me of being one-sided there."

LATE CABLE NEWS.

Rochefort and Boulanger—Belgrade Attracting Attention—The Czar and Prince Bismarck.

It is asserted in London that Rochefort and Boulanger have become reconciled. The only ground for the statement is that Rochefort is reported to have asserted that he would reject with scorn any Government offer of pardon, and that if Minister Constans should insult him by such a proposal he would drag the man Constans through the mud. But it is practically certain that Rochefort would gladly avail himself of amnesty and it is beyond doubt that he will soon part company with Boulanger. The latter has sent an agent to Jersey to secure, if possible, a cheap and secluded house for his chief. Boulanger wants to get away from London. It is too expensive for his straitened means, and he rightly dreads the effect of his reverses upon his social position when society returns to the metropolis.

Belgrade is again attracting the eyes of the political world. Queen Natalie is determined to have what she considers her rights, while the Regents, backed up by the ex-King, are as resolute in refusing them. The young King is kept away from his mother, and his affections appear to have been estranged, if any reliance may be placed upon official telegrams. Russia and Austria are watching events closely, but at present there is no sign of their proceeding beyond that stage. In the mean time, judging from one special correspondent's message, misfortune does not seem wholly to disagree with Queen Natalie. He says the Queen wore a tight-fitting dress of shepherd's plaid, with a narrow dark ribbon tied on one side round her neck, and her only jewels were diamond bangles on her wrists. Her splendid black hair fell unrestrained over her neck and shoulders, making a most effective frame for the handsome face. Her year of trials has added softness to her beauty and her dark eyes shine with a veiled lustre.

The anti-Semitic forces on the Continent have never been specially admired for intelligence, but the latest development of the Judenhetze in Leipsic transcends the ordinary in sheer stupidity. If Leipsic has one memory to be cherished above others, it is that of Mendelssohn, and the relics of him and of his family are sought out annually by thousands of reverential tourists from all parts of the world. A little while ago the guardians of the famous church of St. Thomas resolved to erect a window to the memory of the composer of "Elijah," and public spirited citizens were all delighted with the idea. Money was raised, and a design was accepted, when suddenly somebody started an outcry that the Mendelssohns were Jews, and thereupon the agitation grew so fierce that it is said the project of a window has been abandoned.

A very old lady has just died in the person of the Dowager Duchess of Beaufort, who years ago was the unwitting cause of a piece of far-reaching legislation. She was the second wife of the old Duke, whose childless first wife had been her sister. When her husband died, the question was raised whether her son could succeed to the title, inasmuch as the ancient ecclesiastical law then prevailing, while not making such marriages void, provided for their being set aside by spiritual courts upon appeal. After some trouble, the other heirs

THE LIME-KILN CLUB.

As soon as the meeting had opened in due and ancient form Brother Gardner called for the report of the committee appointed to test the Brown Sequard elixir, and the same was promptly made. The report showed the following tests and results:

First—The first trial was made on Elder Toots, he being a man 67 years of age, stiff in the knees and humped-backed. An injection of four ounces of the fluid was made in his right arm. In ten minutes he began to sing; in fifteen he began to break-down and at the end of twenty he turned to and licked Shindig Watkins out of his boots on account of a grudge eleven years old. He looked and acted like a man of 35, and a second injection made him so frisky that an extra patrolman had to be put on his beat. It is four weeks since the last dose, but he shows no signs of retrograding. He has an enormous appetite, sleeps like a log, and has licked every man who ever gave him any sass.

2. Sir Isaac Walpole was next experimented on. He is 70 years old, stiff in the left leg, lop shouldered, and has had a liver trouble for twenty-five years. Only two ounces were given him as a test, but at the end of twenty minutes his stiff leg limbered up, his liver got down to routine business, and he said he felt hungry for raw turnips. At the end of two hours he received another dose. He was acting very coltish then, but at the end of a quarter of an hour he offered to fight the committee singlehanded for a cent, threw Giveadam Jones three times in seven mintes, and went off singing "Old Black Joe" at the top of his voice. His condition is still the same, after five weeks, and from a humble, peace-loving old man, ready for the grave and eternity, he has been transformed into a robust chap apparently about 40 years of age, who goes about asking for some one to knock a chip off his shoulder.

3. The third test was made on Samuel Shin. Samuel is a sawed-off, weak kneed, stiff-necked single man of 28, and for some years he has been coughing up peach stones, water melon seeds and other foreign substances which he ate to hold him down level in his youth. He declared that he had no faith whatever in the elixir, but how little a man knows of the good things fortune may have in store for him! As the committee had about a quart of the elixir on hand and didn't want to waste any they gave Samuel the whole business at a dose. It was at first thought he had been killed. His eyes rolled, his limbs shook and he called for his mother. This state of affairs soon passed away, however, and with a sudden whoop Brother Shin sprang to his feet. The change was so great that one could hardly recognize him. His knees braced up, his legs increased one foot in length, and his neck limbered up until he could turn his head like a parrot. Samuel has also been easily identified by a cataract in his left eye. In fifteen minutes this disappeared with his other ailments, and he jumped over chairs and benches, turned handsprings and declared that he was a new man. He has been so changed that he was stopped at the outer door by the guard and had to call out some of the officers to identify him. He only got one dose, and that was four weeks ago, yet he seems to hold his own right along.

4. The member selected for the fourth test was Col. Kyann Johnson. The colonel is 54 years old, tall and slim, for the last year has been troubled with catarrh, consumption, torpid liver, gout, rheumatism and various other unpleasant things. Six months ago he bought a coffin on the instalment plan, and six or seven weeks since his wife called in the neighbors at midnight to see him die. The colonel was given his first dose twenty-three days ago. It had no visible effect except to make him weep. He sat down on reply that close track be kept of the proceedings of the parent club in investigating the elixir theory, and the meeting then adjourned.

Experiments With Eggs.

Some of the phenomena of fluid friction may be beautifully shown by very simple experiments devised by Sir William Thomson. The materials necessary are two eggs—one raw, the other hard boiled; two rubber bands of such a size as to clasp an egg firmly when slipped on length-wise: two thin steel wires, about the size of those sometimes used as E strings on guitars; and a mirror or large plate, or other smooth surface, with a ledge around it to prevent the eggs rolling off.

From a gas fixture, or other convenient support, the two wires are hung, and to the lower end of each one is fastened one of the rubber loops. Into these loops the eggs are slipped, with their long axes vertical. Grasping one egg in the fingers of each hand they are gently turned once or twice round and then let go. The eggs show a surprising difference in behavior. The boiled egg keeps twisting to and fro, after the manner of a torsion pendulum, while the raw one comes almost immediately to rest. The explanation is easy. The hard boiled egg, being rigid throughout, turns as a whole, while the raw egg, being soft inside, has only its shell moved by the torsion of the wire, the contents remaining stationary, because of their greater inertia. The shell is thus made to rub to and fro on its contents, and being very light, is soon brought to rest.

Sir William Thomson has used this experiment to illustrate one of the proofs that the interior of the earth is solid. If the earth consisted of a thin shell or crust of hard rocks surrounding a fluid or pasty nucleus, as has been until recently generally taught, he says that the observed swinging and swaying motions of the earth's axis in precession and nutation would be impossible. Any such motion would soon be stopped by interior friction.

Place the eggs on the mirror or plate and try by a sudden twist with the fingers to spin them on end like tops. With the boiled egg one readily succeeds, but the raw egg will hardly make a single rotation before it falls on its side. The finger twist has merely moved the shell, the inside remaining at rest. Professor Mendenhall has remarked that this experiment furnishes a solution to Columbus' problem—how to make an egg stand on end: first boil the egg hard, and then spin it.

The third experiment is the one that occasions greatest surprise. The boiled egg is spun on its side on the glass, and the palm of the hand is then gently brought down upon it for an instant. The rotation, of course, stops at once. But when the same thing is tried with the raw egg, as soon as the hand that stops it is removed, its rotation begins again. In this case, when the shell is stopped its fluid contents remain in motion, and, rubbing against it, sets it in motion when the hand is taken away. It astonishes one to find how long the egg may be held still before this effect stops!—[Scientific American.

A Forced Tax.

The Chinamen in California, although aliens, are obliged to pay a poll-tax of three dollars, if under sixty years of age. As they are a thrifty people, inclined to save, and not at all in sympathy with American institutions, they do all they can to avoid this tax. Mr. Frank, an assessor in one of the mountain districts, had a good deal of trouble one spring in finding a certain Chinaman, "Sam Lee," who was on his list.

raised whether her son could succeed to the title, inasmuch as the ancient ecclesiastical law then prevailing, while not making such marriages void, provided for their being set aside by spiritual courts upon appeal. After some trouble, the other heirs acceded to the succession of the present Duke, but in order that such a dispute should not arise again, an act was immediately passed making marriage with a deceased wife's sister illegal.

Accident to a Lion Tamer.

M. Edmond Pezon, son of the well-known lion tamer has just met with another accident. Some time ago, while he was putting the lion "Brutus" through his paces at a fair on the Boulevard Richard-Lenoir, Paris, he had his left arm badly lacerated. The other evening he was performing with the same animal at Versailles. "Brutus," who had already been excited by a series of entertainments, was in a bad humour, and as M. Pezon was making him open his mouth he seized the tamer's hand and bit it right through. A doctor who was present at the performance at once took the unfortunate young man in charge. His previous wound was so far from healed that he still had his left arm in a sling Got His Apology.

Gazley (presenting his card): I represent my friend, Mr. Dooley.

You grossly insulted him last night, and he demands an apology or satisfaction, sir.

Tangle: I don't remember insulting anybody.

Gazley: You told him to go to Jericho, sir.

Tangle: Oh, yes, I believe I did. So Dooley feels bad about it, does he?

Gazley: Yes, sir. He demands an apology.

Tangle: Well, I don't want any ill feeling between us. You may tell him he needn't go.

What He Could Use.

Visitor: "My name is Scribbler. I sent you several contributions. Is there anything among them you can use?" Editor: "Yes, the postage stamps."

Proofs of Her Skill.

Omaha Papa: So you are going to marry, are you, my son? I presume the young lady you are to wed knows all about housework and looking after the wants of a family?

Omaha Youth: Well, you just bet she does. I wish you could see a cotton bat ing dog she made last week, and some butterflies she painted on velvet.

In consequence of the smokeless powder, the Italian Government has suspended the manufacture of all other kinds of gunpowder.

The Russian nobles are rushing to bankruptcy in great numbers. The credit bank for lending money to them on mortgage of their land, established by the Government two or three years ago, has now no less than 2,000 estates which will have to be sold by public auction at the end of this year for non-payment of interest on loans. The question is, Who will buy this enormous amount of property? If neither the bank nor the Government buy it, there will be 2,000 noble landowners ruined by an institution which was established by the Government for their special help.

bought a coffin on the instalment plan, and six or seven weeks since his wife called in the neighbors at midnight to see him die. The colonel was given his first dose twenty-three days ago. It had no visible effect except to make him weep. He sat down on a bench and declared himself an abused man and sobbed like a child. The next day he was given another dose, and the effect was magical. His tears were dried at once, a bright and happy smile played over his face, and his gaunt and cadaverous appearance fled away, to be replaced by a portly, well-round figure which was solid on its pins. As he was putting on his coat after the operation he uttered several blood curdling whoops, declared himself to be the colored John L Sullivan of the world, and intimated that he would make Rome howl before he was many hours older. No further test has been made on the colonel, and the effects of the last appear to hang right by him.

5. The fifth and last was made on Gig back Smith. Brother Smith is 40 years old, has a voice like pounded glass, and is cross, eyed. He has been a humble member for the past two years, never advancing an idea, and always submitting to be bossed around by Judge Cadaver. He didn't want to be experimented on, having been run over by a butcher cart once upon a time after being vaccinated, but he was seized and flung down and held fast while six ounces of the elixir from an old sheep were injected into his arm. He at first straightened out as if dying, but after a few minutes came to with a wild yell. The first change was noticed in his voice. From a thin, quavering, complaining high G, it at once changed to a roar in a barrel. His eyes straightened themselves, the end of his nose turned up, and he became aggressive. The very first words were a threat to go out and hunt up Judge Cadaver and pound him to squash.

Only the five tests had been made, and it was for the club to decide whether they had been successful, and if further ones should be entered into.

IT IS A BIG THING.

"It pears to me, said Brother Gardner, as the chairman finished his report, "dat de long-felt want has at last bin filled. De effect has bin mo' dan wonderful, as I hev myself personally observed. I go in fur furder tests. Let us investigate de theory to de fullest extent."

On motion of Waydown Beebe it was resolved that the tests be continued and reports made as results were obtained.

A PERTINENT INQUIRY.

The secretary then read the following, dated at Toronto, Ont.

Brother Gardner:

RESPECTED SIR—There are many members of this order (103) of the "Lime Kiln Club" ishat are anxious to know whether it is safe to spend $11 apiece in the use of the "Bromn-Sequard Elixir of Life.' It being so important and serious a question, we have referred it to you for an answer. Will it restore lost children? Remove spots from coach dogs? Fasten new rubber on clothes wringers? Keep watermelons till Christmas time? Keep off rheumatism? Take the place of whisky? The persons loudest in their demands for this "new life" are the most useless, shiftless and wickedest of our city. How do you account for that? The men the community are patiently waiting to shake off the coil are the very ones who are hunting for the "elixir." We have failed to find a single honest man that has lost a day's work of whitewashing or fence post-hole digging in the examination of this new discovery. Please advise us.

Respectfully submitted,
MISERY WAKEUP,
President.

HARDLY HOLDFAST,
Secretary.

The secretary was instructed not at all in sympathy with American institutions, they do all they can to avoid this tax. Mr. Frank, an assessor in one of the mountain districts, had a good deal of trouble one spring in finding a certain Chinaman, "Sam Lee," who was on his list.

He went to Sam's shanty twice; he looked for him at the placer mine where he "panned out" his daily wages, but all in vain, Sam managed to avoid the assessor. One morning however, Mr. Frank happened to meet him on the mountain road.

"Hello, Sam Lee!" said he, stopping his horse, "I've been looking for you. You must pay your poll-tax—three dollars."

"Me no payee; me klixty-nine old," said Sam.

"Nonsense, you're not forty, and you know it. Come. You must pay that tax. Out with it."

"Me klixty-eight," urged Sam.

"Nonsense, I tell you. I know better."

"Me klixty-seven," pleaded the Chinaman; and as the assessor still shook his head and looked commanding, he ran beseechingly down the years from "klixty-klix" to "klixty." But the majesty of the law, as personified by Mr. Frank's unbending decision, at last awed him. Reluctantly he drew from his blouse a leather bag, took out of it three silver dollars, and handed them to the assessor with this parting shot:

"Melican man beap stealee. What for you no catch-um pistol-gun?"

Mr. Frank says that he has never since approached a Chinaman for his poll tax without remembering the time he was made to feel like a highway robber by Sam Lee's demand, "What for you no catch-um pistol-gun?"

A Hay Palace.

There have been palaces of grass and of ice for some years. Then a corn palace was added to the wonders of the world. This year sees another material used in the construction of a palace for exhibition purposes. Creston, Iowa, has built a palace of hay and named it the Blue Grass. The following description taken from the Farmer and Breeder will be of interest to those who have been unable to visit it.

As one approaches the structure and the eye takes in the massive outer walls, which the baled hay gives the appearance of solid masonry with outings of a lighter shade; represented by baled straw, with dadoes and panels of thatch work in all the varied grasses and grains of the region, the wonder grows; and as the eye mounts to the turreted round tower rising above the horse-shoe-arched entrance to the top of the battlement walls, with their flags and streamers, their sentinel towers, and thence still higher to the grand central dome surmounted by the central tower whose highest outlook is ninety feet, and above which the stars and stripes proudly float, the observer is lost in amazement at the magnitude of the undertaking, the beauty of the conception, and the faithfulness of its execution. Nowhere is anything visible except the hay, straw and grasses, except at the windows, many of which are fancifully trimmed with corn in the ear. The first thing to strike the eye as one enters through the central arch is the round tower rising from the centre of the inner court and supporting the central dome. This is beautifully decked in fantastic designs, and its beauty of decoration defies descriptive power. For fifty or sixty feet this artistic work extends upward to where the graceful arch of the vaulted roof springs away from the central column or tower. Here nature ends in art, blending so perfectly that the point of juncture is almost indistinguishable. Radiating in all directions from this common centre on the tightly spread convas of the ceiling are delineated exquisite farm scenes.

The French Elections.

The results of the first ballot in the French elections have insured the present stability of the Republic and settled the fate of Boulangism. There is no room for doubt that the re-balloting will largely increase the majority of between sixty and seventy already secured for the Government. The prestige of victory will be on the side of the Republic in the second contest, and as large numbers of those who abstained from voting in the first instance are pretty sure to come out in support of the winning party, this prestige will largely affect the issue, which on other grounds is not doubtful. All true friends of France, and all who desire the prolongation of peace in Europe will rejoice that the strange coalition between militaryism has failed to disturb the existing order and subject the country once more to personal rule. The triumph of the Opposition would have been a terrible calamity, not only to France itself, but to all Europe. Considering the incongruous materials of which the Boulangist party was composed its success at the polls would in all probability have been but the commencement of another struggle between the irreconcileable factions of the victorious party, a struggle which would have been not unlikely to culminate in civil war. This particular danger, not at any time very great since the ignominious flight of the doughty General, and the exhibition of his character and record before the Senatorial Court may now be considered past. Of course it is a natural consequence of the instability of the French character that one can never know what may happen next. But as the tree which has withstood a rough blast strikes deeper root, so it may be hoped that with each commotion the Republic is being settled more firmly on its foundations. During the past ten years, as Mr. Gladstone recently reminded the French themselves, many thorny obstacles have stood in the way of French Republicanism, but the government has at the last met every call made upon it. As it has been in the past, so, it may be hoped, it will be in the future.

"What is Home Without a Housekeeper," is the degraded view taken by a gruff old bachelor, of the holy office of wife and mother. And yet how many mothers and wives there are who are simply "housekeepers," household drudges, whose life is worked out while disease is let in, during the ceaseless round of washing and scrubbing and dusting and baking and cooking. The same clothes and floors and furniture and dishes are gone over and over until the heart is sick and the body is broken with worry and disease. Amid this toil nervousness begins, bad digestion, irregularities of the reproductive organs, prolapsus or other displacements, popularly known as "female weakness," sick headache and a host of female complaints follow on. For all such take Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, the only remedy sold by druggists, UNDER A POSITIVE GUARANTEE, from the manufacturers, that it will give satisfaction or money will be refunded.

The Vanderbilt System of Railways.

Few persons have any conception of the magnitude of the interests covered by the above title, and very few even among the railway fraternity are aware of how fully this vast system occupies the field in which it is located; but if you will take a map and trace out, first, the New York Central & Hudson River; second, the Boston & Albany; third, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern; fourth, the Michigan Central; fifth, the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis (formerly the "Bee Line" and "Big Four") Railroads, you will be impressed with the wonderful foresight of the men who designed and executed the plan to operate under a uniform policy, and practically a common control, a system of railways that should furnish unsurpassed transportation facilities to the great commercial empire outlined above, and a trip over this grand aggregation will convince the most skeptical that the Vanderbilt System of Railways, of which the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad is the main stem, traverses the very heart of the business portion of this continent, touching, either directly or through its immediate connections, all the important commercial centers of the country, and offering to health, pleasure and business travel facilities that are not equalled by any similar institution in the world.

An edition of one hundred thousand copies of a very neat little pamphlet bearing the title at the head of this article has just been issued by the American Bank Note Company of New York, which contains much interesting information concerning this great system.

Joy Indescribable.

Day and night irritation, pain, burning kidney trouble, etc., made life to me miserable. For the past four months have used ST. LEON Mineral Water. It cured me quickly. Have travelled much and have tried many things, but have found nothing in the world to equal St. Leon. The flow of high spirits and joy it brings is indescribable.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, OCT. 18, 1889.

The North-West Settler.

No one has done more for Manitoba or is better acquainted with the circumstances and wants of the settler than Mr. James Taylor, the United States consul at Winnipeg. Mr. Taylor has lived there many years, and is known far and wide as one of the best friends of the North-West. The opinion of such a man regarding the causes of the slow progress that is being made, is therefore, of some value. The best the Government can do, when asked to account for the failure of all their magnificent predictions, is to falsely accuse the Liberal party of having decried the country. In a recent report to the Washington Government, Mr. Taylor describes the old tariff and the new tariff of Manitoba. In former days when it was under the jurisdiction of the Hudson Bay Co., the region had a local tariff of four per cent. ad valorem, with a specific duty of a shilling sterling a gallon on liquors and wines. There was a large free list, which included agricultural implements. To-day the duty on implements is 35 per cent., with mixed specific and ad valorem duties on certain kinds; and these taxes, says Mr. Taylor, coupled with the duties on canned meats and fruits, "have had a very depressing effect upon the settlement of the country." This stands to reason. The Government must have known that for a long time the price of wheat and other products would, as a rule, average higher in Dakota and Minnesota than in Manitoba, because of the greater railroad development of those States and the special demand for their hard wheat in the neighboring markets of Minneapolis and Chicago. Hence a wise Government would have gone as far as it could go in the direction of minimising the cost of farming in Manitoba. But the Conservatives have pursued the very opposite course. The Canadian settler not only gets less for his crop than the settler just south of the line, but is subject to a heavier outlay in producing it. Mr. Taylor gives the following list of American implements imported into Manitoba during the year ending June 30th, 1888, attaching the Canadian duties in each case:

Articles.	Value.	Rate of duty.
Drills, grain seed	$495	35 per cent.
Fanning-mills	35	Do.
Harrows	171	Do.
Harvesters	1,150	Do.
Hoes	3	5 cents each and 25 per cent.
Mowing-machines	855	35 per cent.
Plows, sulky and walking	25,430	Do.
Spades and Shovels	79	$2 per dozen.
Unenumerated	8,749	35 per cent.
Total	$36,967.

There are no trustworthy returns of the imports into Manitoba from the older provinces, but Mr. Taylor estimates that the older provinces sent implements of the value of $184,000, so that the American implements constituted nearly 20 per cent.

POLITICAL AND GENERAL.

John G. Lloyd, residing near Gananoque, is dead, aged 106 years.

Owing to the prevalence of measles the Port Arthur public schools have been closed.

The loss occasioned by the recent cyclone on Carmen Island, Mexico, is estimated at $1,000,000.

The legal costs on the Irish side of the Parnell Commission are covered by the indemnity fund.

Twenty-five men in Hamilton have been fined in the aggregate $1,030 for infraction of the liquor law.

The wife of James Wallace, who died recently in Tilbury East, has been arrested on the charge of poisoning her husband.

The Secretary of the Whitechapel Vigilance Committee has received a note purporting to be written by Jack the Ripper.

A special Grand Jury at Chicago on Monday returned a true bill against four men accused of trying to bride the Cronin jury.

Mr. Edwards Merrill, barrister, of Picton, has been appointed revising officer for Prince Edward county, vice Judge Jellett.

A terrible runaway accident occurred east of the Don last evening, the lives of two men hanging in the balance in consequence.

The New Brunswick Government offers $1,000 reward for the discovery of the fiend who sent the candies loaded with strychnine to Mrs. McRae.

The Hon. Edward Blake celebrated the anniversary of his 56th birthday last Monday. He was born in the township of Adelaide, Ont, on the 13th Oct., 1833.

Hubert Leisch, of Morriston, near Guelph, has been found guilty by the Coroner's jury of killing his daughter's child, of which he is also accused of being the father.

A young man named William McDonald, said to be insane, has been arrested at St. John, charged with sending the poisoned candies to Rev. Dr. McRae, and causing the death of Mrs. McRae.

Lennox farmers who voted for the repeal of the Scott Act because they believed it had the effect of lowering the price of barley, are now at a loss to understand how it is that the price has fallen since the repeal of the Act. Farmers of course, are not expected to be political economists, but they ought to know that local laws do not regulate the price of an article of universal consumption.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Oct. 13.—The famous Brooklyn Tabernacle, of which Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D. D., is pastor, was burned early this morning, for the second time in its history. The loss on the church building, including the organ, which was one of the finest in the country, is $250,000. It is said to be covered by insurance. The losses on adjoining property, also supposed to be covered by insurance, amounts to about $10,000. The damage to the block opposite the church is about $5,000. The Tabernacle trustees were in session at Mr. Talmage's house this evening. They state that the insurance on the church amounted to $229,450. The building and furniture cost about $236,000 and the organ $20.000 more.

The Empire these days is full of contradictions. It could not be expected to say anything cordial or pleasing about the leader of the opposition, but it could make its attacks with a greater regard for the eternal fitness of things. It certainly does challenge remark when it represents that Mr. Laurier cannot say anything in de-

GOOD CLOTHING.

There are no trustworthy returns of the imports into Manitoba from the older provinces, but Mr. Taylor estimates that the older provinces sent implements of the value of $184,000, so that the American implements constituted nearly 20 per cent. in value of the whole quantity purchased during the year. If Canadian implements are as cheap and as serviceable, why does the settler prefer to buy American ones in the face of this high tariff?

The Cost of Production.

When a Liberal in or out of Parliament asserts what is notoriously true, that American manufactures in certain lines are cheaper than Canadian manufactures, he is usually denounced as a traitor and a liar. All he has to do, however, in order to silent his assailants is to ask, first, why the Canadian manufacturers want protection against American goods; secondly, what they mean by saying that unrestricted trade would ruin them; and, thirdly, what Mr. Bowell means by keeping a host of Customs detectives operating on the frontier. Now and then a government paper is willing to argue the question, but as a rule its argument is an ad captandum one. It ignores the three points just stated, and ask with a flourish, "How can American goods be cheaper than Canadian goods, seeing that the United States tariff is higher than the Dominion tariff? On the free trade theory this cannot be."

The free trade theory is that, no matter how high or how low a tariff may be, the cost of production is reduced by the specialisation or subdivision of labor and machinery, and that such subdivision is from the nature of things more easily accomplished in a large market than in a small one. Some years ago Mr. Robert Hay, of the old furniture firm of Jacques & Hay, Toronto, was astonished to find that a furniture-maker at South Bend, Ind., could purchase bird's eye maple from Mr. Hay's estate up the Northern railway, pay the American duty, convey the wood to Indiana, and send it back to Toronto made up into a certain kind of furniture and undersell Mr. Hay's own products in that particular line. The secret was that whereas Mr. Hay manufacturnd all sorts of furniture, the Indiana man manufactured one particular article of furniture, and had adapted his mechanics and his machinery to its production. In our limited market, it would not pay a manufacturer to make nothing but bureaus, or bedsteads, or chairs. The demand is not sufficiently large to support a factory devoted to the production of a specialty. Few persons engaged in manufacturing have an idea of the "pull" the speciality system gives to a producer as regards cost of production. If a blacksmith had to make pins and needles as well as horse-shoes, all three articles would cost a great deal more than if one man devoted himself to making each; but a still larger saving is affected when a dozen or more men with adequate machinery are engaged in the manufacture of each. Every intelligent Canadian manufacturer knows that he could manufarcture cheaper goods if he had a larger market to supply, simply because he could resort to some special line of work instead of jobbing at half a dozen lines. And, as in the States, the home consumer would get the benefit of the reduced cost of production.

anything cordial or pleasing about the leader of the opposition, but it could make its attacks with a greater regard for the eternal fitness of things. It certainly does challenge remark when it represents that Mr. Laurier cannot say anything in defence ol himself or of those who voted with him on the Jesuit Bill, and declares the honorable gentleman went home leaving a great many dissatisfied and disgusted Reformers. And in the same edition in which the statement appears is another, in the leading editorial of the day, in which Sir John is lauded for doing just what Mr. Laurier did, less his clear and comprehensive view of the subject. Hear it, referring to Sir John's guff at the Westport Methodist church meeting: The premier emphasized the uncharitibleness and absurdity of attributing, not only to the government leaders and party, but to the chiefs of the opposition as well, base and unworthy motives in connection with the vote in parliament declining to interfere with the Jesuits' Estates Act. * * * The attempts to show that the act was unconstitutional have completely broken down, and the only other basis for demanding disallowance was that the interests of the whole Dominion were prejudically affected. Sir John Macdonald dealt very trenchently with that plea, and pointed out that Quebec having granted out of its own money $150,000 to the Jesuits cannot be shown to have any injurious effect, much less such, an effect as would have justified the Dominion government in stepping in and interfering with the fundamental right of a province to vote its own money as it pleased." Mr. Laurier eloquently championed provincial rights and failed (in the opinion of the Empire); Sir John tried it, did not do the work as well, and succeeded, in the opinion of the same authority. Such philosophy is enough to make a horse sick. British Whig.

TEA EXTRAORDINARY!

Having recently secured an extraordinary good bargain in tea, we intend to share it with our customers.

Heretofore we have given extra good value in Tea at 25 cents per pound, but the fifty chests just received would be "dirt cheap" at 45 cents, and 25 cents is what we shall sell it at. We venture to say and we have had many years experience in the tea trade, that nothing to compare with it has ever been sold in Napanee at that price.

To those who want to save money and at same time enjoy a choice cup of Tea, we say come and get a pound and we feel certain it will cause you to come for more.

Mr. George Babcock, of this place has recovered from the injuries received in his encounter with a bear last spring and is now enjoying the sweets of connubial felicity.

Kington.

Mrs. Rose, wife of R. M. Rose, registrar of the county of Frontenac, died on Saturday evening aged 72 years. She had been a sufferer for eleven weeks from escema. Four of her surviving children were at her bedside at the time of her death. She was married in Kingston, on Dec, 19th, 1836, to her now bereaved husband. Her maiden name was Amy Ann Smith. She was the daughter of Capt. George Smith, a lieutenant in the royal navy, and who acted as such at the taking of Oswego in 1821. Her birth place was Kingston, on March 30th, 1817. Mrs. Rose was an estimable lady, kind, faithful and indulgent to her children. She was a member of Chalmers' church, having been one of those who instituted it. Much sympathy will be expressed for the family in their affliction.

Stella.

The Missionary meeting in St. Paul's church was well attended. The night was fine and numerous speakers were present to entertain the large audience.

Mrs. Henderson has sold off her stock and farming implements and will in future reside with her daughter, Mrs. Robert Fleming.

(Crowded out of last issue.)

Rev. J. Cumberland has returned home.

Mrs. McWaters, of Sunbury, is visiting friends at Stella.

The fair was a big success although the rain kept some of the people at home. The dance in the evening was a failure as the rain kept the girls away.

There is a new police station in Stella. A number of the Island girls were locked up on fair day. They were soon liberated.

James McMath and family move to Chatham this week, where they will reside in future.

A number of parties are having bodies of friends taken up from the old burying ground and placed in the new one.

There came nearly being a great fire here on Tuesday. Mr. H. Armstrong & Son's carriage factory caught fire in the roof, but the way our bucket fire brigade hustled it was a caution. The way the water and shingles flew they completely stripped one roof, making work for mechanics in placing a new one.

The grain buyers are standing on the corners waiting for the farmers to come in with their barley, etc. Plenty of cash here and the highest prices will be paid.

The Methodist church was packed last Sunday evening to hear the pastor, Rev. H. I. Allen preach a sermon on the crime of not assuring, the Rev. gentleman taking for his text, Joshua, 2nd Chapter and 21st. And she bound the scarlet line in the window. The A. O. U. W. were out in a body clothed in regalia. Every person seemed pleased and well satisfied that assurance was right, but in the application the pastor enjoined very forcibly not to neglect their souls' salvation remarking that procrastination is the thief of time. A four days' meeting will be held in the Methodist church next month. Many distinguished speakers and singers are expected to be present on that occasion.

Belleville.

Rev. J. W. Burke, Belleville, has been elevated to the position of canon of St. George's cathedral by the bishop of Ontario in the vacancy caused by the death of Canon Bleasdell, of Trenton. Mr. Burke was born in Dublin in 1825 where he subsequently graduated with honors at Trinity college. He came to Canada in 1852 and was ordained into the ministry by the bishop of Ontario in 1865. He has held the incumbencies of Lanark, Almonte and Prescott, and was appointed rector of St. Thomas' church, Belleville, in 1871. He is an indefatigable christian worker.

The industrial committee are in receipt of a letter from John Harte, dated Buffalo, N. Y., asking if some arrangement could not be affected whereby he could return to Belleville, and if possible get the old stove foundry again in operation. It will be remembered he left town

Tamworth.

Picton

Ice to the thickness of half an inch was formed here on Saturday night.

The apple crop which is now being gathered, is far below the average.

Mr. J. Lightburne, D. D. G. M., is visiting the Masonic Lodges of Prince Edward district.

Mr. W. Loucks has left for Toronto to resume his work at Trinity University.

The canning factories are about through putting up pumpkins. About 10,000 cans has been the daily average for over two weeks.

A number of farmers in this vicinity have disposed of their barley at 42 cents per bushel; others are storing and waiting for higher prices. About 30,000 bushels are now stored here.

Mr. W. B Simonds, of Scobarie, had pears in town on Saturday of the Nelles winter variety that turned the scales at 20 ounces each.

The Misses Mary S. and Fanny M. Shaw returned from Napanee on Monday where they have been visiting relatives as well as the Lennox Agricultural show. They report a better show than the one held at Picton.

Quite a number of persons from town and vicinity attended the Ameliasburg fair and report a good display although the weather was pretty cool. Mr. H. M. Williams was one of the judges of cattle.

Mr. Hial Jackson, formerly of this place, has left the Pullman Car Company to take a situation in the auditing department of the Union Pacific R.R. at Omaha, Nebraska.

While the men engaged at the waterworks were at work on insley's corner they unearthed a layer of tanbark three feet in thickness. The bark was the refuse from the Miller tannery and has been buried for over 60 years.

Mr. Robert Cunningham has lost a horse and two colts. They were last seen on his premises on Tuesday, whether they were stolen or wandered off we have yet to be informed.

A plan to rob a number of merchants' safes here on Saturday night was averted by the third party disclosing the plans to Chief Babbit. The suspicious parties have since disappeared.

Miss Lacinda Burlingham, of Bloomfield, quietly passed away on Monday last. About six weeks ago she had a severe attack of bleeding at the nose and has been declining ever since. She leaves many friends as she was respected by all who knew her.

The Hon. Laurier and other prominent men who spoke here on the 8th inst., on the future of Canada and Reciprocity, left an impression upon the masses of people who gathered to hear them that will be felt at the polls in the coming elections.

On Saturday Mr. Anson McDonald lost his two year old child from the effects of drinking from a bottle containing carbolic acid and creasote. The child died in great agony in about an hour after taking the mixture.

Unrestricted Reciprocity

may be of inestimable advantage to Canada or it may be a mere "fad" as its opponents call it, but no one can deny that Nasal Balm has done more for sufferers from catarrh than any other remedy known. Mr. Thomas Roche, Rochefort, Ont., says:—I have suffered severely from catarrh, and never got any relief until I used Nasal Balm. I never thought I could find so sure a cure. It is a pity all afflicted with catarrh do not know of and use this wonderful medicine.

The industrial committee are in receipt of a letter from John Harte, dated Buffalo, N Y., asking if some arrangement could not be affected whereby he could return to Belleville, and if possible get the old stove foundry again in operation. It will be remembered he left town leaving over $30,000 liabilities.

The society of Busy Bees of the Holloway street church have issued cards to prominent Methodists of the district, asking for donations for the bazaar soon to be held. In response to one of these Mrs. Vandervoort, president of the society, to-day received a communication from E. G. Sills, ex-M.P., Frankford, stating that he would donate ten bags of flour.

The by-law granting aid to the Belleville Rolling Mills Company, will be voted on by the people on Nov 8th.

The names of the capitalists interested in the Rolling Mills Company are John Milne, J. Anderson, Jas. Ferris and J. Munroe.

The Belleville races will be held on the 30th and 31st.

Odessa.

At the regular meeting of the A.U.C.W. the following condolence was moved by Bro. John Denyes and seconded by Bro. A. E. Timmerman, that we the members of Odessa Lodge, No. 287, desire and do hereby express to Bro. Isaac Fraser and family our deepest sympathy in their very sad bereavement occasioned by the sudden death of his eldest son Charles, a young man of brightest promise, and trust that the supporting arm of the Supreme Being will sustain and comfort them through this sad experience. Signed on behalf of the order; W. J. Armstrong, Master Workman; Harvey Denyes, Recorder.

A gentleman of pleasant address is here trying to organise a circulating library. That's right. We already have circulating libraries, (what village hasn't) but they circulate on two legs and sometimes circulate more in ten minutes than can be "hole'd" in ten years.

Two large pipes from the furnace to the chimney in the Methodist church are necessary and have been put in. Whoever lined the second pipe holes in the second vestibule must have been for the time being club footed in both eyes. The pipe don't stand plumb, not by a long shot.

Considerable interest centered this week in the liquor case. Some thirteen witnesses were put on the stand mostly the flower of Ernestown youth. We are pleased to note a keener sense of the nature of an oath prevailing and the day of drink 'er down, and (hic) don't know whatcher are drawing towards twilight. The Crown secured a conviction.

AT

CHEAPSIDE

Every Friday From Now Till the 1st of February, 1890.

We give special bargains and discounts on everything in the house for that day, and that day only. Our goods are the best value you can find for the money on any other day of the week, but we are determine to make Friday a popular day to trade on. We started this in the spring and found it a success termine to make Friday a popular day to trade on. We started this in the spring and found it a success attracted a lot of people, who used to come on Saturday, and a better division was made of Friday and Saturday's trade and everybody better satisfied than if they had come in the crowd on Saturday. We will reduce our prices on everything one tenth for that day, and many lines of goods will be sold at cost price, ends and remnants of every kind of goods will be cleared out regardless of cost, and job lots bought specially for this days trade will be placed at such prices as must attract a lot of buyers.

For instance we bought a lot of Silk Handkerchiefs, Cashmere Gloves, white and fancy bordered Hankerchiefs.

A portion of the White & Co., bankrupt stock which will be cleared as follows :

FINE CASHMERE GLOVES worth 40 cents for 20 cents.

LADIES' ASTRACAN GLOVES Kid faced worth 90 cents for 50 cents.

A LOT OF SILK HANDKERCHIEFS for 20 cents worth 30 cents.

A better lot for 25 cents worth 35 cents.

A still better lot for 50 cents worth 75 cents.

A lot of fancy Handkerchiefs for 2 cents each.

A better lot two for 5 cents. A still better one 3 cents each.

A lot of Merino Hose for 18 cents a pair.

A lot of Cashmere Hose for Ladies at 22 cents a pair.

A lot dark color Seersuckers for 7 cents a yard.

Bargains in Grey Flannels. Bargains in Dress Goods and Mantle Cloths. Bargains in Blankets. Grand, royal bargains all over the house.

On Saturday, Saturday night, and Monday we make a special exhibit of Furs made up and in the Skin. Everybody invited. It will be an interesting sight for all.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCES JUDITH.

People used to say it was almost a duty for Colonel Henry Merriweather Page to marry a second time. A motherless boy might do well enough, but when it came to a girl growing up altogether among darkeys and men, it was absolutely blood-curdling. The poor child was really dressed in a manner that was almost indecent, and it had even been said (here the informant generally put an impressive hand in a one-buttoned lisle-thread glove upon the arm of the person to be enlightened) that she actually used bad language—in fact, swore, as she heard her father do.

It was perfectly true that she rarely put in an appearance at church, and when she did participate in the hebdominal devotions of Brownsville parish, she was wont to clatter up the central aisle in a short and gatherless habit, which was extremely shocking to the taste of the congregation. She wore boots, moreover, and, it was rumored, a spur on occasions. Her greatest offense, probably, was her mode of dressing her hair, or rather of leaving it to dress itself. She had a small, shapely head clasped closely from brow to throat by heavy red-brown curls.

Colonel Page's pew was the most conspicuous in the pretty sandstone church; and the nape of his daughter's handsome neck, exposed in all its chignonless effrontery of a Sabbath, was a never-ending source of displeasure to the outraged Brownsvillians.

Had not St. Paul expressed himself clearly, not to say strongly, on this very subject? Was not a woman's piety almost as surely to be measured by the length of her hair as the age of a horse told by the length of his nippers? Could a young lady fly in the face not only of tradition, but of the Scripture, in this fashion, and yet be all that is required of young ladies by a country parish? Not so. The rector's wife went alone in her state carry-all to remonstrate with Miss Page upon this very subject.

She waited for some forty minutes, and when at last her hostess entered, it was not in a neat magenta-colored paduasoy, neither a black or salt and pepper barege, trimmed with braid and pearl buttons, as was then deemed the thing, but—shade of that godly woman, "Mrs. Colonel" Henry Merriweather Page—in a blue flannel waist, an old homespun skirt pinned up about her boyishly straight hips, and muddy boots that left apparent impressions on the red velvet carpet of the drawing-room.

When Mrs. Nelson, after much dextrous manœuvreing, had finally led the conversation, by what she considered a master stroke, up to the moot question, Miss Page had replied merely by running a slight brown hand through the offensive locks and saying:

"Why do I wear it this way? Oh? I like it, and dad likes it, and Dick," then, with a sudden oblique glance of her bright red-brown eyes: "I shall always wear it so, even when I am married."

"You seem to have no doubt on that score," the rector's wife had replied, in a voice which was dryer than the smile that accompanied it. Mrs. Nelson had what might be termed a well-irrigated mouth "Pray, is it to be soon?"

Miss Page had laughed at this, flinging one blue-flanneled arm over the chair in which she sat sideways, and Mrs. Nelson had shuddered both at the laugh and gesture, which she found unpleasantly in keeping with the attitude—to one of the inclinations, said suddenly:

"Are you really going to Carylon! What is your name?"

"Boughton," he had answered, gravely. "Philip Boughton."

Then it was that this culpably unconventional young woman made use of an expression which amused Boughton beyond bounds, until he found out who she was.

"Gad!" cried she, "not my cousin Phil?"

He replied, with a bow, that if her cousin Phil also rejoiced in the surname of Boughton, their identity must be established, at the same time inquiring her own name.

"Why, I'm Judith!" she announced, reaching out both hands to him with Hautboy's bridle-rein yet over her arm. "I'm Judith Page, Cousin Phil. You don't look a bit as you used to."

"No?" said Cousin Phil, smiling a good deal, perhaps not unconscious of a handsome mustache clipped close, soldier-fashion, across his fine upper lip, and of a general impressiveness of appearance which he had lacked when they last parted.

"No, no—not a bit," said Judith, bending a little away from him, while still keeping a friendly grasp on his hands, and eyeing him from the crown of his smart Parisian hat (there were Anglo-maniacs in those days, but they were the exception and not the rule) to the toes of his patent-leather boots

"Not a bit," she repeated, earnestly.

"Why, in what way?" said Boughton.

"You're—you're—well, you're such a dandy," replied candid Judith. "However can you wiggle your toes in such boots? Gad! it makes mine ache to look at 'em."

This made twice that she had used that somewhat extraordinary form of expression. Besides, Philip did not exactly enjoy being called a dandy.

"You have changed, too," he remarked.

"Me?" said Judith. "Oh! do tell me! How?"

"Well, for one thing," said Boughton, slowly, "you—er—didn't swear when I last saw you."

It is impossible to imagine the effect that her placid reception of this scathing remark had upon him.

"Didn't I?" she said serenely, still holding his hands. "I must have been very young. Yes, I was—I remember all about it now. You used to make me dolls out of radishes, and cut turnips into flowers for me. Oh, yes, and you taught me to fish with a crooked pin."

"You have become a fisher of men by now, I suppose," said Boughton, with an attempt at wit, which, however, left his cousin as unruffled as ever.

"Oh, dear, no," she assured him. "They fish for me! And mostly with crooked pins. I must admit!" she added, with a laugh. "How tall and straight you are, cousin. I do believe I could walk under your arm. Let's try."

Philip held out his arm obediently, and she made the attempt, but her eyes were blinded against his coat sleeve.

I know ever so much a better way to use my arm than that," said Boughton, suddenly possessed of a devil, and he let his arm drop at her shoulders, held her so, and kissed her.

She did not burst into tears, and raise her riding whip, and give him a smart blow across the lips, or rail at him like the little shrew he believed her to be. When she

SEEING BY TELEPHONE.

One of the Improvements to be Made by Edison.

The reporter asked Mr. Edison if it was true that he had invented a machine by the aid of which a man in New York would be able to see everything that his wife was doing in Paris.

"I don't know," said Mr. Edison, laughing, "that that would be a real benefit to humanity. The women certainly would protest. But, speaking seriously, I am at work on an invention which will allow a man in Wall street not only to telephone to a friend in the Central Park, but to see that friend while he is chatting telephonically with him. This invention would be useful and practical, and I see no reason why it should not soon become a reality; and one of the first things that I shall do when I go back to America will be to set up this contrivance between my laboratory and my telephone workshops. Moreover, I have already obtained satisfactory results in reproducing images at that distance, which is only about 1,000 feet. It would be ridiculous to dream of seeing anyone between New York and Paris. The round form of the earth, if there were no other difficulty in the way, would make the thing impossible."

Speaking of the phonograph, the reporter asked if it had reached its highest degree of perfection.

"Almost, I think," said Mr. Edison, "in the last instruments turned out of my workshops. You must know that the ordinary phonograph employed in commerce does not begin to compare with the latest machines that I use in my private experiments. With the latter I can obtain a sound powerful enough to reproduce phrases of speech that can be heard perfectly by a large audience. My last ameliorations were with the aspirate sounds, which are the weak point of the graphophone. For seven months I worked from eighteen to twenty hours a day upon the single sound 'specia.' I would say to the instrument, 'specia,' and it would always say 'pecia,' and I couldn't make it say anything else. It was enough to make me crazy. But I stuck to it until I succeeded, and now you can read 1,000 words of a newspaper at the rate of 150 words a minute, and the instrument will repeat them to you without an omission. You can imagine the difficulty of the task I accomplished when I tell you that the impressions made upon the cylinder are not more than one-millionth part of an inch in depth, and are completely invisible even with the aid of a microscope."

Reporter—And what new discoveries will be made in electricity?

Mr. Edison—Ah, that would be difficult to say. We may some day come upon one of the great secrets of nature. I am always on the lookout for something which will help me to solve the problem of navigating the air. I have worked hard upon this subject, but I am very much discouraged. We may find something new before that comes; but that will come.

Mr. Edison further said that the great development of electricity will come when we find a more economical method of producing it. During his trip across the ocean he remained for hours on deck looking at the waves, and he said that it made him wild when he saw so much force going to waste. "But one of these days," he continued, "we will chain all that—the falls of Niagara as well as the winds—and that will be the millennium.

Too High.

The new reporter, a young man whose graduating essay, entitled, "The Unseen Forces of Moral Philosophy," had been highly complimented by the professor of might be termed a well-irrigated mouth "Pray, is it to be soon?"

Miss Page had laughed at this, flinging one blue-flanneled arm over the chair in which she sat sideways, and Mrs. Nelson had shuddered both at the laugh and gesture, which she found unpleasantly in keeping with their owner's cropped locks.

"Dear me, no! Goodness, no! I should think not!" the delinquent had replied, heartily. "I haven't even an ideal; but, of course, he'll turn up—they always do. Old maids are accidents."

"Accidents!" the rector's wife had exclaimed, in a tone which I am unable to describe.

She held up the grey cotton gloves, ornamented with wrist-tassels, these last sharing in the good lady's agitation. Their frisky bobbings developed a kittenish desire in Miss Page to seize and secure them. How delightful it would have been to observe the face of their wearer had she done so.

Miss Page did not always control herself so well as on this occasion, however. She yielded to her inclinations without stint not unfrequently.

One of these events took place not long after the visit of the rector's wife, and that was when the rector's son proposed to her.

This gentleman was a pretty little personage, with the physique of a tolerably well-sculptured snow-man. His orange-colored hair surmounted his orange colored ears with a pinion-like stiffness, which suggested the idea of a pair of Mercury-like heel-wings having sprouted in the wrong place. He had orange-colored eye-brows, above little dark blue eyes, like raisins set into his pudding face, and his orange-colored beard grew one way on one side of his face, and another way on the other, as though its owner were standing in a perpetual draught.

But neither a man's personal appearance, nor the fact of his being a rector's son, can have any appreciable effect upon his love affairs (so far as he himself is concerned). Thus it chanced that Timotheus Nelson became enamored of the hoydenish Miss Page, and proposed to her. It was bad enough until he got down on his knees. Judith could not stand that, and so down she went on her knees also, just opposite him, and said, as well as she could for laughing:

"Please get up."

You may be sure he did so with alacrity. He did more—he got up metaphorically as well, and remained from that time in a standing position.

He admitted that very night what he could never be persuaded to even so much as listen to before: namely, that for young women to apply scissors to their hair is as unseemly as a like application is meritorious in young men. He confided to his mother that he had once met Miss Page riding along upon the highway, and that she was whistling. He went so far as to state that with her mouth in that unfeminine position he considered her positively plain, and concluded by stating that flaxen hair worn in demure bands on either side of a flaxen countenance was a sight at once refreshing and ennobling, after having looked for any length of time upon crisp brown curls, and a face that changed as often as an autumn sunset.

Boughton did not in the least recognize her. He had not seen her since the days of white frocks and blue shoes and socks, when her hair had been a pretty tan color, and one of her front teeth missing.

He hesitated a moment, and then reined up and asked if he was or was not mistaken in taking the gate to the left the one that led into the Carylon farm. She nodded and said that it was. Then he saw that her horse was lame, and jumping down, asked if he could not assist her. She thanked him, and said no, that she thought could not; and then yielding—after possessed of a devil, and he let his arm drop at her shoulders, held her so, and kissed her.

She did not burst into tears, and raise her riding whip, and give him a smart blow across the lips, or rail at him like the little shrew he believed her to be. When she saw what was about to happen, she merely drew in her pretty lips to a hard white line over her teeth, and on that hard white line fell Mr. Philip Boughton's kiss. It was certainly nothing at all like what he had supposed it would be. Neither was her conduct. She stood quietly, looking at him squarely in the eyes, and drawing on a little further her dog-skin gauntlets.

"Er—you have mistaken your way after all," she remarked, finally.

"How?" he asked, feeling somewhat curious and extremely uncomfortable.

She still looked quietly at him, while settling her cuffs and pulling forward the billy-cock hat.

"Er—you have behaved like a beast when you should have behaved like a gentleman," she replied, almost sulkily. "Good afternoon." And she turned about in the other direction and walked off with her lame horse.

He had no one but himself to thank for all this, but that did not in the least mitigate his violent indignation. To be called first a "dandy," and then a "beast," in less than twenty minutes, by a very pretty young woman, is not calculated to add to one's enjoyment even of an Albermarle scene in the flush of a November sunset. And, by George! if one wasn't to kiss one's cousin, who was one to kiss?

Boughton was actually more furious than he remembered to have been in the whole course of his life.

As for Judith—well, I really do not know how to write concerning Judith's state of mind. It may perhaps be most concisely expressed by saying that, had she been in the place of her Jewish namesake, and Boughton in the sandals of Holofernes, she would have secured his head with decided feeling of satisfaction.

Judith had never been kissed, and had had a charming and romantic fancy that the man who married her should be the only man to kiss her. Now Boughton had dashed this pretty ideal to bits, and broken the charm, and polluted—yes, polluted, Miss Page told herself—with violence, her so long cherished lips. His mustache had scratched her nose, and whether one turns one's lips in over one's teeth or not, a kiss is a kiss, and she would be quits with him.

Judith's face was decidedly wicked as she made this last announcement, and there was ever so much more red than brown in her wide open eyes.

The Secret of Health.

Don t worry.

Don't hurry. "Too swift arrives as tardy as too slow."

"Simplify! Simplify! Simplify!"

Don't over-eat. Don't starve. "Let your moderation be known to all men."

Court the fresh air day and night. "O, if you knew what was in the air!"

Sleep and rest abundantly. Sleep is nature's benediction.

Spend less nervous energy each day than you make.

Be cheerful. "A light heart lives long." Think only healthful thoughts. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

"Seek peace and pursue it."

"Work like a man; but don't be worked to death."

Avoid passion and excitement. A moment's anger may be fatal.

Associate with healthy people. Health is contagious as well as disease.

Too High.

The new reporter, a young man whose graduating essay, entitled, "The Unseen Forces of Moral Philosophy," had been highly complimented by the professor of botany, took a seat near the city editor's desk. "I am delighted," said he, speaking to the editor, "to think that I have so easily and with so little delay found the work for which I am will fitted. How do you like my sketch, 'Walraven St. Borrie?'"

"It is magnificent," the editor answered, as he took out the manuscript. "Your diction is delightful and your style is captivating; and in nearly every line there is a gentle yet strong rebuke to the blunt and commonplace writer."

My dear sir," exclaimed the reporter, "you charm me."

"For instance," said the editor, taking no notice of the reporter's enthusiasm, "you say that Walraven located in this portion of the country."

"Yes; do you like the way I express it?"

"I am delighted. Some writers—old Pinkney, out there, for instance—would have said that Walraven settled in this part of the country."

"Yes, I see. He doesn't understand rhetoric very well, does he?"

"Oh, no, not at all. Here is another excellent point," said the editor, turning the leaves of the manuscript. "You say that Walraven went to a hardware establishment and procured a rifle."

"That's good, isn't it?"

"First-class. Old Pinkney would have said that he went to a hardware store and bought a rifle."

"That's because he is crude in his manner of expression, isn't it?"

"Assuredly. And again you say that Walraven partook of refreshments."

"How does it strike you?"

"Way up."

"What woud Pinkney have said?"

"Oh, in his vulgar way he would have said that Walraven ate supper or luncheon, or something of that sort."

"I wonder that he does not learn better," said the reporter.

"It seems that he should. By the way, we cannot afford to use this sketch. I too high for our readers."

"What must I do with it?"

"Bring it out in pamphlet form and sell it on the campus."

"That's a good idea; I'll do it. Shall I go ont now and write something?"

"No, old Pinkney is covering the ground pretty well. You may go to the county asylum, though."

"To write up the abuses of the institution?"

"No, to stay there until we send for you. Good-bye."

Editor Stone, of The New York Journal of Commerce, has not taken a day's rest from routine work for thirty years. He has not missed a day at his desk since the death of his wife. He has not been sick once since he began editorial work. He recently gave his recipe for retaining perfect health in journalistic labors. It ran thus:—"Plenty of exercise, plenty of sleep and plenty of religion.'

Up to last Wednesday evening no less than 556 talesmen had been examined in the wearisome effort to secure a jury in the Cronin case in Chicago. The defence had exhausted seventy and the State fifty peremptory challenges. Each side is allowed one hundred, so that it is probable that the fight over this stage of the proceedings will continue for some time yet. It would be difficult to find stronger evidence than this case affords of the necessity for some change in the jury system of the United States.

Did not Believe in Killing.

Zachariah P. Hardigree is a member of Company I, of the 41st Georgia Regiment, living in this county, who was in every battle fought by his regiment in every skirmish in which his company was engaged, in every charge made by his command and did not fire a gun. He was then, and is now, a minister of the Gospel. He did not believe in killing men, and frequently charged the enemy with a yell, saw his comrades fall by his side, and whether routing the Union soldiers or being routed, he would not shoot. He was always ready for duty—stood guard, remained at the picket post, and obeyed implicitly every command of his superior officers, except to draw cartriges, load his gun, nd shoot.—[Haralson (Ga.) Banner.

CANDIED FRUITS.—Make a thick sirup with a teacupful of water to a pound of sugar, and in this boil peaches, pears, plums, apricots, cherries or other fruit until tender—no longer. Let the fruit remain two days in the sirup, then drain it out, sprinkle sugar over each piece and dry in the sun or a moderately warm oven.

SPANISH CREAM.—Beat the yolks of three eggs with half a cupful of powdered sugar; heat half an ounce of isinglass with a quart and a half of milk; let it come to a boil and stir it slowly into the yolks; allow it to boil up again and stir in the beaten whites of the eggs, pour into molds and let it cool.

PEACH PUDDING.—Fill the pudding dish with alternate layers of crumbs, dotted with butter, and sliced and sweetened peaches, having crumbs on top. Pour over custard made of one pint of milk, the yolks of two eggs, and two tablespoonfuls of sugar. Steam, and serve with any good sauce.

RUSSIAN SALAD.—Procure a tin mould, ring-shaped, about the size of a dinner plate, only oval instead of round; it should be an inch and a half deep, an inch and a half wide, and hollow. Pour into this a little clear aspic jelly, and when this is partially set arrange in it a macedoine of vegetables. These macedoines can be made at home, but seldom in such perfection as they can be bought; besides the preparation of them involves such an immense amount of patience that it is the general custom to buy them all ready for use. The macedoine is composed of carrots, turnips, peas, parsnips, French beans, asparagus, beetroot, gherkiks, horseradish, capers, etc. These vegetables are cut small, turned into pretty, fanciful shapes with a vegetable cutter, and properly cooked. Care must be taken in arranging the macedoine to contrast the colors tastefully, as this lends such an attractive appearance to the dish. Fill up the mould with more jelly and set it in a cold place—on ice if convenient—until quite firm. When required turn it out on to a pretty dish and fill in the centre space with a nicely prepared mixture of lettuce, watercress, radishes, endive, beetroot, and hard boiled eggs, all chopped rather fine. Pile these up high, and pour over them some daintily prepared salad dressing. The dressing must only be allowed to cover the mound in the centre, not the ring of vegetables, or the dish will lose altogether its pretty, uncommon appearance. If a little lobster coral is at hand, sprinkle a tiny morsel over the top and it will add a still further charm.

Fingers before Forks.

The Duchess of Beaufort, dining once at Madame de Guise's with King Henri IV. of French, extended one hand to receive his Majesty's salutation while she dipped the fingers of the other hand into a dish to pick out what was to her taste. This incident happened in the year 1598. It demonstrates that less than three hundred years ago the fingers were still used to perform the office now assigned to forks, in the highest and Catching Consumption.

Dr. Whittaker, of Ohio, has recently alled attention to the danger of infection with tuberculosis through the means of sleeping cars, and makes some valuable remarks respecting the means by which the danger may be obviated:—

"It would be difficult to conceive of a conjunction of circumstances more directly contributive to disseminate this disease than is offered in the palace car. It is always badly ventilated; the vestibule car especially, is close and hot, sixteen to thirty people being crowded into a space that might make a small hall in a house, but never a bedroom for a pair of human beings. Somebody is always hurt by a draught, so that windows are kept closed to prevent free ventilation, as well as the ejection of sputum, which is mostly deposited on the floors. Cuspidors never contain water, and are mostly used as waste baskets or slop jars, and the temperature is raised to a degree sufficient to rapidly disseminate infectious matter.

"With the gathering shades of evening, the compartments containing the bedding are opened into the car to diffuse through it a disagreeable musty odor. The traveller is treated to the luxury visibly of clean sheets and pillow cases, but the blankets, mattresses, carpets, and worst of all, the curtains, remain the same until worn out.

"Consider now that every car contains or has recently been occupied by a consumptive traveler, if only en route for a change of climate, and that through ignorance, carelessness, or weakness, there comes to be deposited upon bedding, curtains, etc., tuberculous matter. What becomes of it, if it be not dried and disseminated throughout the car, gradually incorporated into the lungs of the traveller?

"It is a curious fact that the first note of alarm of this kind should have been sounded by a layman, viz, a barrister in Australia, who published in the Australian Medical Gazette, last November, a protest against the admitting of consumptive travellers into the same cabins with healthy people. The danger is in one sense far greater on a ship, in that the people are so closely confined in the cabins, and, as the author states, considerations of humanity prompt the well man to close the port in protection of the sick. Then, also, the trip is much longer.

"These advantages are compensated on the car by the fact that there is from it no escape to the outer air, not even on express trains, for meals or other necessities of life. A man may mount for a breath of fresh air to the deck of a ship, where indeed he passes most of the day; a prisoner is allowed some part of the day a walk in the 'free,' as the Germans say; but a traveler on an express train is for all the world in the condition of the dogs made to breathe, inclosed in boxes of atomized tuberculous matter, until even these animals, naturally immune, become infected with the disease.

"But it is one thing to find fault and another to suggest the remedy. The plush, velvet and silk hangings must go. Seats should be covered with smooth leather that may be washed off, carpets substituted for rugs, to be shaken in the open air at the end of every trip, or better still, abolished for hard-wood floors. The curtain abomination must give place to screens of wood or leather; blankets of invalids' beds subjected to steam at a high temperature; mattresses covered with oiled silk or rubber cloth, that may be washed off; and above all things, invalids provided with separate compartments, shut off from the rest of the car, with the same care taken to shut out the smoke of tobacco.

"The cuspidors, half filled with water, should abound in every car, and consumptive travelers provided with sputum cups, which may be emptied from the car. For Family Affection Repressed.

No home can be truly happy in which the members of the family circle are ashamed to show their affection for each other. There comes a period in the life of all children, boys particularly, when they regard a kiss or any other lovable demonstration as too babyish for them, and they shun it as they would poison.

Perhaps this is the outgrowth of neglect on the mother's part. The care of younger children crowds the older ones aside and before she knows it these dear little ones have become accustomed to do without the endearments that were showed on them in infantile years, and can hardly be won back. Bishop Vincent says the average boy at the age of thirteen or thereabout, has not a friend except his mother. He is a terror to every one, but for all that his young heart probably often yearns for a little petting and loving.

Too often we take home-love as a matter of course, just as we take the air, the sunshine and other blessings of life; we fail to realize that it is like a plant and that to give the best returns it must be fostered and cultivated carefully. It is no uncommon thing to find a houseful of half grown children who can scarcely remember when they have been kissed by father or mother, unless, perhaps, on a return from a long journey. But a good-night embrace, a little hug, a sympathizing pat on the shoulder when they are in trouble, is so remote an experience, dating back so many years, that they have utterly forgotten it. However, let one of these boys cut his hand or fall out of the haymow and get a bloody head, how quickly the whole family are alarmed, and run to his assistance with loving service! Through his wounds he sees they really have hearts, that they do care for him after all, and secretly he rather enjoys being bruised since it has revealed to him that his family have an interest in him beyond merely seeing that he has enough to eat and a place to sleep. How sad it is that he must nearly break his neck to find it out!

As for the attitude of the children among themselves, any loving demonstration toward each other would be almost as overwhelming as if a cyclone had struck them.

They are ashamed of the pet names of babyhood, and are distressed beyond measure if their mother addresses them as "dear" in the presence of a stranger. To grow up ignoring or cultivating a contempt for these little tendernesses makes boys boorish, and does not add one whit to there manliness or dignity. The manners of girls are, somehow, less influenced by the absence of these demonstrations—at least, it is less painfully noticeable, but all the refinements of society cannot balance the gentle schooling of home, and although sister may not be as clownish and rude as is her brother under the same surroundings, yet her character soon takes on petty deceits and habitual dissimulations.

This repression of the emotional side of our natures in our family life is a grave mistake, and to it may be attributed one half the heart burning and little gnawing griefs that beset us daily. Many a good mother lives her life through, and goes to her grave misunderstood by those she would have died to serve, because she never gave expression to her real feelings. She has kept back her sweetest self untill her children have come to regard her as unemotional and cold. Like begets like. This is a law from which there is no deviation. The children in turn soon learn to check any show of tenderness, until as the years go by, they have so well learned the lesson of indifference, that when they have arrived at manhood and womanhood and come to separate each to take up his own life work, they do so without a pang, and henceforth care no more far each other than for strangers.

fingers of the other hand into a dish to pick out what was to her taste. This incident happened in the year 1598. It demonstrates that less than three hundred years ago the fingers were still used to perform the office now assigned to forks, in the highest and most refined circles of society. At about this time, in fact, was the turning-point when forks began to be used at table as they are now. When we reflect how nice were the ideas of that refined age on all matters of outer decency and behavior, and now strict was the etiquette of the court, we may well wonder that the fork was so late in coming into use as a table-furnishing. The ladies of the middle ages and the Renaissance were not less proud of a delicate, well-kept hand than those of our own days, and yet they picked the meat from the platter with their slender white fingers, and in them bore it to their mouths. The fact is all the more remarkable, because the form of the fork was familiar enough, and its application to other uses was not uncommon.

Through Boston Spectacles.

Prof. Geo. Wright, D D., who attended the recent Convention of Scientists in Toronto, contributes a letter to The Congregationalist, of Boston, in which he chiefly discusses "the Sabbath in Toronto." The following are the concluding sentences of the letter: "But what seems the more striking element in the situation is the fact that the secular as well as the religious and the educational interests strongly support the present strictness in observing the Sabbath. The three great daily papers of the city are advocates of the present state of affairs, and those who would relax the strictness of the Sabbath observance are here made the object of ridicule to about the same degree that the secular press upon this side of the line ridicules the advocates of strict Sabbath observance. If any one doubt the advantages of a strictly kept Sabbath to a great city, two or three weeks in Toronto can be confidently recommended as a tonic sure to strengthen his faith and increase his respect for the law of the Lord."

Awkward.

Inability to express themselves gracefully in English sometimes places our good German friends in embarrassing situations; and that, too, when they really mean to the complimentary.

An artist, who chanced to be a very small and inferior-looking man, was showing some of his paintings, which were really meritorious, to a stout old German gentleman, who was keenly appreciative of the merit of the pictures, but who expressed his approbation in the following awkward way:

"Vell, vell, vell! Dey vas pewteeful, pewteeful! Und you bainted dem mit your own hands? Vell, vell! und von vould not dink, to look at you, dot you could baint noding at all! Vell, vell!"

Sea gulls' wings and pigeons' feathers are much used for hat decoration.

In Britain the working women are guilty of that sincerest form of flattery, imitation, and are going to take pattern by their male co-laborers. Lady Dilke, addressing a women's league at Dundee recently, advised them to combine for the protection of their interests as the men had done, and her suggestion met with favor. In almost every direction are to be seen the evidences of concessions obtained by British women which old rules and laws rendered impossible. The Queen's College, Belfast, for example, has decided to throw open the medical classes to young ladies, who will get their degrees the same as the men. These are signs of a general movement.

car, with the same care taken to shut out the smoke of tobacco.

"The cuspidors, half filled with water, should abound in every car, and consumptive travelers provided with sputum cups, which may be emptied from the car. For it is not necessary to say here that the sole and only danger lies in the sputum. The destruction of the sputum abolishes the disease. When the patient himself learns that he protects himself in this way as much as others,—protects himself from auto-infection, from the infection of sound parts of his own lungs,—he will not protest against such measures."

A Bad Year for Kings.

This appears to be a bad year for kings, let alone the proverbial three or four that the poker player wishes he had not held. The king of Monaco has just died. The king of Holland's death is apparently a question of only a few weeks. The mental condition of the king of Bavaria is becoming worse. The king of Portugal is seriously ill. The king of Servia has been forced to abdicate. The king of Bulgaria may soon be sorry that he did not follow suit. The king of Montenegro is wedged in between Russia and Austria in a very uncomfortable way. The king of Greece is worried over the yet unsolved Cretan question. The king of Italy is still at war with the Pope. The king of Denmark has a hard winter before him. And the king of Belgium is thinking seriously of an African trip to avoid the cares of state.—[Utica Herald.

Last on the List.

After twenty years of loose living in Bohemian fashion, Ricardo comes in for a legacy of ten million reals.

"Now's the time to pay off my creditors," he exclaims.

The latter begin to call upon him. One of them, all smiles and obsequiousness, remarks—

"You see, I have not troubled you much, and therefore consider myself entitled to be paid before the rest."

"If I rightly remember, says Ricardo, "your name is Zoilo Zamora"

"Exactly!"

"Then, my good friend, I am sorry to have to tell you that I am paying my creditors in alphabetical order, so that it will not be your turn till last."—[Madrid Comico.

Alexander Dumas is hopelessly orderly, and is often to be seen in his shirt sleeves, feather duster in hand, employed in dusting his study or changing the place of a piece of furniture. This is his hobby and it is generally on Sunday that he indulges it.

A clergyman who was an ornament to the pulpit in an exceedingly æsthetic regiment of the Lord's army, was delivering a series of discourses upon the history of Jonah. At the opening of one of the discourses, he said: "You will remember that in our last discussion we spoke of the fact that Jonah was three days and three nights in—in the—whale's—society."

The Baedekers, of guide-book fame, are an interesting family. The late Karl Baedeker (born 1801) originated the series and edited all the early issues. His name is still retained on all the title-pages, but the only Baedeker now in the business is his son, Mr. Fritz Baedeker. An elder son, Mr. Karl Beadeker, retired some ten years ago on account of ill health. Both the brothers Baedeker served as officers in the late war—Karl in 1866 and Fritz in 1870 '71. The latter received the Iron Cross for good service under fire. The former was in his time a distinguished mountaineer, and among other first ascents made that of the Silberhorn in [illegible] 18[illegible]3.

have so well learned the lesson of indifference, that when they have arrived at manhood and womanhood and come to separate each to take up his own life work, they do so without a pang, and henceforth care no more for each other than for strangers.

Many years ago I was visiting in a family, and after tea was engaged in conversation with the host and hostess in the parlor, when the door opened and in trooped the children to say good night to papa and mamma. As they ran in turn to the parents, clambered on their laps or clasped them around the neck to receive a loving kiss, I thought I had never seen a lovelier sight. I have never forgotten it, and to this day whenever mention is made of home happiness, my mind instantly reverts to that pleasant scene.

"It would have looked better had the mother and father gone to the children's room and bidden them good night, rather than have them make a show before strangers," did you say?

My dear Mrs. Punctilio, don't you know that in the beautiful innocence of childhood there are no shams—that everything is genuine? Their little hearts are too full of love and warmth to think of stage-effects. Let cold-blooded older people continue to enjoy a monopoly of repression and cultivated indifference, but for the sake of all that keeps us sweet, don't let us encourage it in the children.

Treading on a Tender Spot.

Miss Porcine—"I am afraid, Henry, that our engagement must be broken. Papa and mamma are both very angry with you."

Henry—"For heaven's sake, Clara, what have I done to offend them?"

Miss Porcine—"It is all on account of the conversation you had with mamma the other night."

Henry—"Why, I spoke of your father in the highest terms."

Miss Porcine—"Yes; you said he 'bristles with good sense.' You know papa is at the stock yards, and mamma thought your allusion to 'bristles' simply dreadful taste."

According to a computation just issued by an eminent statistician, the cost in human life of the wars of the last thirty-four years has been 2,253,000 souls. The Crimean war cost 750,000 men; the Italian war (1859) 45,000; the Danish war (1864) 3,000; the American civil war—the Northern States 280,000, the Southern States 520,000; the Austro-Prussian war 45,000; the Franco-German war—France 155,000, Germany 60,000; the Turco-Russian war 250,000; the South African wars 30;000; the Afghan war 25,000; the Mexican and Cochin-Chinese expeditions 65,000, and the Bulgaro-Servian insurrection 25,000. This list does not include mortality from sickness.

A professional murderer named Paul Gyomber has been condemned to death in Szegedin, Hungary. He is described as a prepossessing and intelligent-looking young man. His master in the art of assassination was a prison companion named Peter Bessenyei, with whom he had been confined for some time in the same cell while undergoing a long term of imprisonment for theft. Bessenyei advised him never to join a band, but to operate alone. He told him that the best weapons to use were a stout walking stick and a hatchet. When Gyomber was released he deliberately began the career of murdering for a living. He killed in all six persons, mostly old, though in no case did he obtain much booty, and took his sentence like a stoic. He was very fond of his mother and also of his wife, to whom he had been married for a short time.

YOUNG FOLKS.

AFORE HE KNOWED WHO SANTY-CLAUS WUZ.

Jes' a little bit o' feller—I remember still—
Ust to almost cry fer Christmas, like a younster will.
Fourth o' July's nothin' to it!—New Year's ain't a smell:
Easter Sunday—Circus day—jes' all dead in the shell!
Lordy, though! at night, you know, to set around and hear
The old folks work the story off about the sledge and deer,
And "Santy" skootin' round the roof, all wrapped in fur and fuzz—
Long afore
I knowed who
"Santy-Claus" wuz!

Ust to wait, and set up late, a week er two ahead:
Couldn't hardly keep awake, ner wouldn't go to bed:
Kittle stewin' on the fire, and mother sittin' here
Darnin' socks, and rockin' in the skreeky rockin' cheer;
Pap gap', and wunder where it wuz the money went,
And quar'l with his frosted heels, and spill his liniment:
And me a-dreamin' sleigh-bells when the clock 'ud whir and buzz,
Long afore
I knowed who
"Santy-Claus" wuz!

Size the fire-place up, and figger how "Old Santy" could Manage to come down the chimbly, like they said he would:
Wisht that I could hide and see him—wundered what he'd say
Ef he ketched a feller layin' fer him that away!
But I bet on him, and liked him, same as ef he had Turned to pat me on the back and say, "Look here, my lad, Here's my pack—jes' he'p yourse'f, like all good boys does!"
Long afore
I know who
"Santy-Clus" wuz!

Wisht that yarn was true about him, as it 'peared to be—
Truth made out o' lies like that un's good enough fer me!—
Wisht I still wuz so confidin' I could jes' go wild
Over hangin' up my stockin s, like the little child
Climbin' in my lap to-night, and beggin' me to tell
'Bout them reindeers, and "Old Santy" that she loves so well,
I'm half sorry fer this little-girl-sweetheart of his—
Long afore
She knows who
"Santy-Claus" is!

Old Sultan and His Friends.

A countryman once had a faithful hound, who was called Sultan, and who had grown old in his service. He had lost all his teeth and could no longer follow with the pack.

One day the countryman stood before the door with his wife and said to her: "Old Sultan is no longer of any use. I shall shoot him to-morrow."

But Sultan's mistress, who had great pity for the faithful animal, exclaimed: "How had promised to stand second. They appointed to meet in the wood, and poor old Sultan had no one to stand by him but a cat who had only three legs. Puss had, however, plenty of spirit. Although she hobbled a ong on three legs in great pain, yet her tail stood erect, as if she cared for no one in the world. The wolf and the wild boar were already on the appointed spot, but when they saw their adversaries approaching they thought that the cat's tail was a sabre, and that each time puss humped her back as she hopped it must be a large stone which Sultan intended to throw at them. They were both so frightened that the wild boar crept in among the dried leaves and the wolf sprang up a tree.

The dog and cat were very much surprised when they reached the place to find no one there; but the cat espied something on the ground which he took to be a mouse.

Now, the wild boar, when he crept among the dried leaves to hide himself, left the gray ears sticking out, and when the cat began to smell about she saw the ears move, and, taking one of them for a mouse, sprang forward, caught the ear in her teeth, and bit it in half. The wild boar started up with a terrible scream, exclaiming: "There is the real offender up in the tree!" and ran away as fast as he could. The dog and cat looked up and saw the wolf, who was ashamed of his cowardice and so angry with his pretended friend who had betrayed him that he came down from the tree and made friends with the cat and dog from that moment.

Broken Laws.

Rye did not come down to breakfast, and Jane was sent up to see what was the matter.

"He is really very sick," she said. "He has headache and a high fever."

"He went without his dinner yesterday," said Mabel, "all for the snow fort the boys are building at school."

"Ah, sure, but he didn't go hungry," said Jane. "He came in before supper and ate the best of my hot friedcakes."

"And his feet were very wet,' put in Mabel. "And then he went to the rink with me, and all I could say he would not put on his overcoat when he came out."

"Anything more?" asked his father, leaving his breakfast untasted, "His illness is surely not to be wondered at."

He found the boy as he expected and sent for the old family nurse at once. There were peanut shells on the stand beside the bed and bits of confectionery. Rye's Latin grammar was opened on his exercise book. He had evidently tried to study after going to his room, and had nibbled nuts and candy to keep awake. The room was oppressively warm, and he owned to having forgotten to shut off the furnace heat.

Auntie Perkins, the old nurse, understood the case perfectly. She did not need a doctor, and the next morning Rye came down to breakfast a little pale, but decidedly disinclined to eating only oatmeal gruel when the omelette was so tempting.

"Oatmeal or nothing, my boy," said his father, "and be thankful that you are as well off as you are this morning; that your punishment for offending against God's holy laws is as light as it is."

Mabel gave a frightened gasp and dropped her fork.

"Why, what has Rye been doing, papa?"

If his father had accused Rye of stealing the communion alms, the boy had hardly looked more abused.

"Law breaking! He has broken God's holiest laws—the laws of health. He has abused his body shamefully, and God has given him his body for a house—a temple in which his soul may do good service. How can his soul be kept pure and holy in a body

A MOHAMMEDAN HAREM.

A Matrimonial Institution with Hundreds of Inmates.

There were more than 1,000 women in the harem of the last sultan and there are probably as many in the imperial seraglio of Abdul Hamid. The number is recruited every year by slaves from Georgia and Circassia, and it is a curious thing that none but slave girls can be a part of the sultan's female establishment. All of the sultans of the past have had slave mothers and it is contrary to the custom of Turkey for the sultans to marry. There are thousands of servants about the palaces of the sultans. He has several hundred eunuchs, and these receive salaries according to their position. The chief eunuch is quite as important a man as the grand vizier. He takes part in the imperial councils and is a man of great influence. I saw him on the day that the sultan took his yearly visit when he went to kiss the mantle of Mahomet. A tall, broad-shouldered negro with dull black eyes, but with features expressive of intellect and will. He was dressed in clothes embroidered in gold lace, and he rode a magnificent Arabian horse. The sultan probably bought him as a slave, and the most ordinary eunuchs are a costly article. They are imported by slave dealers from Africa, where they are raised. They are of as different grades as are other men, and the sultan has all kinds. The more important of them have in the palace. Each of the more favorite slaves of the harem must have her eunuchs to wait upon her. She uses them as her servants but they are guards as well. This chief eunuch has charge of all the women of of the palace and it is through their power with the sultan that much of his influence comes.

The eunuchs, however, form but a small part of the servants of the palace. There are something like 7,000 people about the sultan, and the greater part of these are employes. The kitchens of the last sultan had 300 servants, and it must take a number of hands to attend to the thousands of horses and to keep the 200 royal carriages in good condition. The sultan has his barbers, his musicians, and his boatmen, and I am told that their are 100 porters at Yildiz who do nothing else but carry burdens. The ladies of the harem have their servants and the hairdressers and the dressmakers must be numbered by hundreds. The less favored among the women sometimes act as the servants of others, but many of these ladies have their separate establishments, with, their own eunuchs slaves, doctors, and beggars. They receive visitors in their own apartments and make visits to the other ladies of the imperial city which is hidden behind the walls of the sultan's palace grounds. The feeding of 6,000 or 7,000 people every day, year in and year out, costs a fortune, and a good part of the sultan's $10,000,000 a year passes through the hands of his cooks. The chief part of the cooking for the palace is not done in the grounds where the emperor lives. The food is prepared at the great palace of Dolma Bagtche, about a mile away, and it is carried on trays on the heads of porters to the harem on the hill. It is safe to say that a large part of the best of its dainties are served cold.

The sultan never eats with his harem, and it is not the custom for the sexes to eat together in Turkey. His majesty sits down to his meals with his officers of state. He drinks his coffee out of gold cups and he uses a Turkish article which is as thick as molasses and as strong as lye. He has his ministers of state often to dine with him, and he gives and could no longer follow with the pack.

One day the countryman stood before the door with his wife and said to her: "Old Sultan is no longer of any use. I shall shoot him to-morrow."

But Sultan's mistress, who had great pity for the faithful animal, exclaimed: "How can we destroy him after he has served us so many years and lived with us so long! I am sure we could spare him some allowances for his old age."

"No, no," replied her husband. 'That is not just reasoning. He has not a tooth in his head and is of no further use in keeping away the thieves, for they are not afraid of him, so he might as well go. If he has served us well, so has he also been well fed, and could eat as much as he wanted."

The poor dog, who was lying stretched out in the sun not very far off, heard all that was said, and it made him very sad to know that the morrow would be the last day of his life.

Now, Sultan had a very good friend, a wolf, who lived near; so in the evening he slipped out into the forest to visit him, and complained to him of the fate which awaited him.

"Listen, grandfather," said the wolf; "take courage, I will help you out of your trouble. I have thought of something. To-morrow early your master and his wife are going out into the fields haymaking, and they will take their little child with them. While they are at work they will put the child under the hedge in the shadow. You lay yourself by him as if you meant to watch him. I will wait till all is quiet, and then I will run out of the wood, seize the child and carry it away. Then you must spring after me with the greatest zeal, as you used to do in your hunting days. I will let the child fall, and you shall bring it back to its parents again and they will believe that you have saved it from me and will be the more thankful, because they intended to kill you. Instead of that you will be in full favour, and nothing will ever cause them to give you up."

The dog followed this advice, and, as it had been planned, so it was accomplished. The father screamed as he saw the wolf running away with the child through the woods; but when poor old Sultan brought it back, his joy and gratitude knew no bounds. He stroked and patted the old dog, saying: "Nothing shall ever hurt you now, you dear old dog, and you shall never want food and shelter as long as you live."

To his wife he said, "Go home at once, wife, and cook some bread and milk for poor old Sultan. It is soft, and will not require strong teeth to bite it. And bring the pillow from my arm-chair. He shall have it for a bed."

And so from this time old Sultan had every comfort and contentment that his heart could wish. By and by Sultan went to pay the wolf a visit and told him joyfully of his good fortune.

"Grandfather," he said slyly, "I suppose now you will shut your eyes and not see if I carry away a fat sheep from your master's flock. It is very hard to get food nowadays.

"I can't help that," said the dog, "my master trusts in me and I dare not allow you to touch his property."

The wolf, however, did not believe the dog spoke in earnest, so he came in the night, slipped in the fold and would have carried off a sheep if Sultan had not forewarned his master of the wolf's intention.

He watched for him and gave him a good combing with the flail until the wolf was almost bare of hair.

So he was obliged to run away, crying out, however, to the dog, "Only wait a little, you false friend, you shall pay for this!"

The next morning the wolf sent a challenge to the dog by his friend, the wild boar, who

"Law breaking! He has broken God's holiest laws—the laws of health. He has abused his body shamefully, and God has given him his body for a house—a temple in which his soul may do good service. How can his soul be kept pure and holy in a body that has no care? If I break the windows of my library, and let the fire go out, and fill up the place with unclean things, what wonder that I cannot study there, or write a sermon? Rye cannot go to school to-day. He is ill-tempered, unfit for any work. His soul's house is out of order. What with wetting his feet, eating hot friedcakes after fasting, overheating himself at the rink and then coming home without his overcoat, trying to study in a hot room and eating peanuts and candy late in the evening, he is as sorry a law-breaker as I have seen in many days."

"It's hard making boys believe," spoke up Auntie Perkins, "that they cannot do such things without paying dearly for it; that they may never get over the result, but be dyspeptics or rheumatics the rest of their lives. They plant a little thistle seed of sickness, for a bit of fun, some day, and have a life full of briars to pay for it."

"That's what they say in the temperance stories," and Mabel looked her gravest at Rye.

"And you are getting briars in your eyes," he spoke up, pettishly, "when you crochet in the twilight."

"Very good, Rye," said Dr. Dorville. "The truth is, Christians say, Sunday after Sunday, that they have offended against God's holy laws without once thinking what those broken laws are. In my opinion, a good share of them are the laws of health. You must bear that in mind hereafter, my boy."

Smokeless Gunpowder.

The apparently successful invention of smokeless gunpowder adds a new terror to modern warfare. The unseen, like the unknown, appeals powerfully to the imagination. When it assumes the shape of a death-dealing company or regiment of soldiers it is pretty sure to be believed to be much more formidable than it really is. But apart from the moral effect of the new explosive in producing panic by creating apprehensions of danger from sources which cannot be located and the extent of which cannot be estimated, it can hardly fail to give its possessor some very tangible advantages on the battle-field. Hitherto the clouds of smoke accompanying every discharge of infantry or artillery have afforded a very ready and reliable means not only of getting the direction and distance of an attacking force, but even of computing the numerical strength of its different divisions. That the use of the smokeless gunpowder, assuming its effetiveness to be e qual to that of the ordinary kind, will give the army using it an advantage, seems too clear to admit of question. That which the needle-gun did for Prussia in her last conflict with Austria, the smokeless gunpowder may one day do for her in a struggle with some other adversary. It may be doubted whether any nation would be so rash as to enter into conflict with another possessing this superiority. It is not likely, however, that Germany will be able long to retain exclusive possession of the secret of the manufacture, and the general use of the new force will soon restore the equilibrium. Whether the constantly increasing efficiency of the implements of destruction will have the ultimate effect of decreasing or of stimulating the war spirit must, probably, be left for the next century to decide.

The potato crop in England is a failure, too, but there's lots of murphies over in Ireland.

gether in Turkey. His majesty sits down to his meals with his officers of state. He drinks his coffee out of gold cups and he uses a Turkish article which is as thick as molasses and as strong as lye. He has his ministers of state often to dine with him, and he gives dinners frequently to the diplomates at Constantinople. At such dinners he sits down with his foreign guests and he is said to be a very good dinner-table companion. There are a number of little rooms in the palace [illegible] h such of his friends as he wishes to engage in private conversation, and he carries on conversation with foreigners through interpreters. He can speak French, but prefers to use the Turkish and an interpreter in his conversation. He believes in education, and he has a school connected with this harem where the little princes are taught French and the modern sciences as well as the koran.

The guests of the sultan never get a peep into his harem. The man who would attempt to enter the apartments reserved for the women would be punished with death, and a eunuch in Constantinople has a right to knock down any man who speaks to a lady under his charge. A foreigner was nearly killed not long ago for addressing a lady of high caste on the bridge which crosses from Stamboul to Pera, and no one in Constantinople save the sultan has the right to ask a lady to take off her vail. The sultan can go anywhere and he can penetrate the the harem of his officers if he will. This right, however, is never enforced and he has quite enough to do to keep the peace in his own family. Of late years his ladies have been by no means so secluded as in the past and much of their restrictions are nominal. When the sultan made his annual trip to kiss the cloak of the prophet Mahomet, which is kept in Stamboul, I saw at least a hundred of them in his procession. They were in closed carriages but I could see plainly through the carriage windows, and the veils which covered their faces were of gauze so thin that I could distinguish the layers of paint on their cheeks. They were dressed in silks of all colors of the rainbow, but these silks were made in the shape of very full water-proof cloaks and they were rather wrappers than dresses. Many of the ladies wore kid gloves and I noted that some of them had in order to keep their gloves from being soil. Many had their eyebrows painted and their eyes showed out plainly over their veils. Beside each carriage rode a somber-faced negro eunuch dressed in black with a long whip in his hand, and the carriages were drawn by magnificent horsea. There were some beautiful girls among them and I noted half a dozen red-headed Circassians whose cheeks were as rosy as those of an English barmaid, and who would have passed for belles in Cleveland, New York, or Chicago. At the head of the harem procession was the carriage of the mother of the sultan, who is known as the valide sultana and who practically rules the harem.

The valide sultana has one of the wings of the palace set apart for her use. She has a court almost as important as that of the sultan himself. She has her ennuchs and her servants, and she is probably the only one whom his majesty implicitly trusts. She acts as the go-between between the sultan and his wives, and she really chooses his wives for him. I have been in Constantinople during the greater part of the Mohammedan lent, or of the month known as Ramazan. During this month the Mohammedans fast from sunrise to sunset and they engage in numerous prayers. At the close of it will come their easter Bairam, when every Turk will come out in new clothes and when the whole Mohammedan world will engage in rejoicing. At this time each year the sultan takes a new and favorite slave to wife and this slave is selected from a large number by the valide sultana. As I write, the young lady is probably in training for her new position, and she has been within the hand of the valide sultana for a number of months. Six months before Ramazan each year the Georgian slave merchants and others who have girls whom they wish to sell to the sultan bring their young ladies to the sultan's mother. She looks over them and picks out fifteen or more. These are taken into the palace and are carefully fed like so many prize horses. Shortly before Bairam and picks out the one who is to be the bride of the sultan. The sultan has, I believe, the right to take such of the other girls as strike his fancy, but his Bairam bride he does not see until the night after this feast. He finds her in his chamber when he retires to rest at night, and the story at Constantinople is that the new bride must crawl under the clothes from the foot of the bed in token of her subjection. If she happens to please the sultan she is given a separate apartment, and if she has any children they are legitimate and rank with other princes and princesses. If the sultan does not like her she ranks with the other slaves of the palace, and it may be never sees his majesty again.

The favorite ladies of the sultan's harem have by no means a bad time. They are certainly better off than they would be in their native lands, and many of them esteem it a great honor to be brought to Constantinople and sold. There life in the palace is a do-nothing lazy one. They spend the day in chatting, eating, and sleeping. Most of them smoke cigarettes and they go out dining under the charge of their eunuchs when they can get permission. The sultan has a very nice little theater in his palace and music for this is often furnished by the ladies of the harem. The price of a slave is largely increased if she is a good musician and some of these girls are good dancers and singers. The price for an ordinary slave girl of the desirable age, ranging from 12 to 16, is $200. If she is beautiful she may be worth $2,000 and more, and if in addition to this she is a good musician the mother of the sultan will give from $5,000 to $6,000 for her. Rich blonde beauties with blue eyes and transparent skins always bring high prices if plump and well rounded, but I am told that black girls are brought from Africa and sold for a song in Constantinople. The slave market of the city has long since been done away with, but the buying and selling still goes on underhand and the terms of slavery outside of the palace are such that after a slave has served seven years she must, if she desires, be released. More than half the marriges in Turkey are, it is said, made with slaves, but the slave hving a child is usually elevated to the position of wife.

The foreign artists who come to Constantinople are often asked by the sultan to give performances to himself and his friends in his royal theater within the palace. At such times the favorite ladies of the seraglio get through latticed windows of their boxes and the event is the subject of gossip in the harem for weeks to come. In connection with this theater I was told an incident which gives some insight into the kindliness of the sultan s nature. On the 22d of last February when an Italian opera troop was playing in Constantinople the American minister, Oscar Straus, gave an entertainment to the Americans at his house in celebration of Washington's birthday. At this entertainment he had engaged this Italian opera troop, consisting of 250 musicians, to per-some insight into the kindness of the sultan's nature. On the 22d of last February when an Italian opera troop was playing in Constantinople the American minister, Oscar Straus, gave an entertainment to the Americans at his house in celebration of Washington's birthday. At this entertainment he had engaged this Italian opera troop, consisting of 250 musicians, to perform. Late in the afternoon of the 22d Mr. Straus received a note from the Italian manager, saying that the sultan had requested the troop to come that night to the palace, and inasmuch as the request of his majesty was equivalent to a command he could not keep his engagement with him. It was too late at this time to countermand the invitation for the entertainment, and Mr. Straus sent a messenger to the sultan, explaining the situation and asking him to allow the troop to come to his house either before or after the entertainment at the palace. His majesty at once sent back a messenger, saying that he would under no conditions disturb the entertainment of Mr. Straus, and that it would suit him just as well to have the troop come to the palace after their entertainment was over, which was done. At another time he disarranged one of his dinners at the palace to accommodate the American minister, and I am told here that a close friendship has existed between Mr. Straus and his majesty during the whole of the former's ministry.

Driving Oxen.

In the Western States and on the Plains oxteams are driven with whips, and the oxen are trained to canter along the road in a not ungraceful trot. The use of the whip is humorously described by Mr. Kerr in his account of South African travel.

Many and many a time had I used the short-handled whip employed in herding cattle on the Western prairies of America, but I was a complete stranger to the gigantic and indispensable whip common to all South African caravans. In becoming initiated into the mysteries of its use, I left numerous marks upon my face and neck, and was more than once nearly strangled.

While vigorously pressing on the leading oxen I would fall heels over head into some deep hole. Sometimes the oxen would wheel quickly round, rush through the forest and break the young trees, while the old wagon rolled along like the grounding of a wrecked balloon. When evening came, after such experiences, I felt as though I had been mobbed and hustled at an election.

At the crossing of any of the large river-beds, John's aid became indispensable. He could crack the whip and make a report like an Armstrong six-pounder; while his shouts and fiendish yells resounded wildly through the rocks in such a manner that even the hoarse roar of a fog-horn, or the shrill shriek of a steam-whistle would have had no chance against him.

A Modern Tyrant.

Penelope: All right, Jack, you may put that ring on my finger and we'll call it engaged, but it must be definitely understood that you are to have but one kiss a day and one dance at each hop, for you dance horribly, and I don't like to kiss a man without a mustache. I am to go boating, riding, or walking with any fellow I please, dance as much as I please, and flirt with whom I please. You are to give up smoking, card playing and wine, and finally you are not to tag around after me all the time, for I'm not going to have my enjoyment spoiled just because I'm engaged.

Jack (her humble slave): Well, but Penelope, tell me what I can do?

Penelope: You can read Tennyson and think of me.

THE SOCIAL AT W. T. GIBBARD'S

Rev. J. B. Clarkson says "Good-bye."

The large gathering at the comfortable home of W. T. Gibbard Esq., on Friday evening last, gave evidence of the warm feelings of the people of Napanee towards Rev. J. B. Clarkson, the assemblage being called together for the purpose of saying good-bye to that worthy gentleman and his estimable wife. The trying circumstances under which Mr. Clarkson is compelled to withdraw from the active ministry, have awakened widespread sympathy and many were the words of regret spoken on the occasion referred to. The commodious house was filled to overflowing and a thoroughly pleasant evening was spent by all, the only cloud being the approaching departure of those who had in such a short time won so prominent a place in the affections of the people. About nine o'clock A. L. Morden Esq. C. C. A., was called to the chair and he immediately called upon J. C. Drewry to read the following resolution:

It is moved by John Gibbard, and seconded by W. N. Doller, that this congregation deeply sympathize with our pastor, Rev. J. B. Clarkson, in the affliction which has befallen him, necessitating as it does his leaving the active ministry, and our separation for a time. We therefore take this opportunity of not only expressing our sympathy, but feel that we ought to express our thanks to Mr. Clarkson for the deep interest he has taken in the work while with us, and for providing us with so desirable a supply.

We beg to express the hope that in the near future Mr. Clarkson will be restored to perfect health and to assure him that whereever he goes he will always have a warm place in our affections.

This motion was supported by M. S. Madole, H. V. Fralick, Chas. Stevens and C. O. Johnston, the new pastor. All of the speeches were gems in their way, those of Mr. Madole and Rev. Mr. Johnston being especially good.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Rev. J. B. Clarkson made a very feeling reply. His voice is so far gone that he could with difficulty speak above a whisper. Mr. Clarkson said that though it was a severe trial for him to give up the work he so dearly loved, yet he had learned to trust God and to bow in submission to His will in all things. He thanked the people for their kindly sympathy and urged them to love Christ and work together for the upbuilding of God's kingdom. Mr. Clarkson was listened to with deepest attention and all who were within sound of his voice were visibly affected by his touching remarks. Good-byes were said and the social was at an end. During the evening Rev. C. O. Johnston became acquainted with a large number of his congregation, and judging from words of praise heard during the evening, the Western has secured a worthy successor to a worthy man. Rev. J. B. Clarkson and family left Saturday noon for their new home in Montreal.

The Great Hunt.

Mr. Editor,—On Saturday last a quartette left Napanee for the township of Effiingham on a hunting expedition for both game and minerals, and wandered through vales and over the hills where red men were wont to follow the trail in search of game, and fish in the lakes for bass and smaller fry. For Squaws and pappooses like others human had inward cravings, but now their day is passed and men accustomed to the noise and bustle of city life are camping on the banks of the beautiful Massouga. Thus far with manly tread and watchful eye they've marched eager to shoot the stately deer, or wrestle with the mighty bear, or climb the tallest tree to

—W. D. Madden is the only authorized agent of the C. P. R. in Napanee and if you are going to Manitoba, British Columbia or in fact any point on the C. P. R. you will find a great advantage if you purchase tickets from the authorized agent. Call or write to W. D. Madden for maps, folders and all reliable information. adv.

—The improved Pease Furnace has a larger heating capacity than any other warm air furnace invented. The fire pots are heavier than those of any other. All parts above the cast iron fire pot are made of heavy wrought Scotch plate steel. Nine tenths of the furnaces put up in Toronto where they are made, and three-fourths in Napanee are the Pease furnaces. Proof positive they are the best. BOYLE & SON, Sole Agents.

—An organ recital will be given in the Eastern Methodist church on Tuesday evening, November 12th, by Prof. W. H. Donley, of Bridge st. church, Belleville. The programme will be interspersed with vocal selections by distinguished local talent and a most enjoyable entertainment may be looked forward to by the music-loving people of our town. adv.

—A distressing accident happened at Bloomfield on Saturday. A bright little boy of some two years, the youngest son of Aaron McDonald, farmer, while playing about got hold of a phial containing toothache remedy and swallowed a portion of the mixture, causing immediate congestion of the throat. All that friends and prompt medical aid could do were of no avail. In less than an hour he was dead.

—We extend heartiest congratulations to Mr. Edward Merrill, of Picton, on his appointment to the County Judgeship of Prince Edward. His Honor Judge Merrill is an honest, upright, painstaking lawyer and is held in the highest esteem by the whole community. If Sir John's Government made more appointments like the present one, less fault would be found with them. We trust that Judge Merrill may long live to enjoy the honors just conferred upon him.

—For the past two weeks we have been sending out "duns" and between this date and the first of January, if you are visited by the Division Court bailiff you will know that the fault is not ours. We are tired of asking people to pay up their subscriptions and now we intend using harsher means. If you wish to save costs pay up at once. If you can't call at the office, send the amount due by registered letter or Post-office order. THE EXPRESS is $1 a year IN ADVANCE. If you owe us anything please settle without further delay or further trouble.

—The local circle of the King's Daughters will give a social at the residence of J. C. Drewry, on Friday evening, October 25th. Proceeds in aid of the poor of Napanee. For the past two winters this organization of young ladies under the leadership of Mrs. Drewry have relieved the wants of a great many poor people, and they are now busily engaged in preparing for further work. Everbody will be made heartily welcome at the social. Refreshments and a good programme will be furnished. Dont forget the date and the object. If you can't be present send in your contribution.

—Mr. and Mrs. I. Abrams returned this week from visiting in New York and other American cities and are looking much better for their outing.

—We regret to learn that Rev. F. B. Stratton, of Tamworth, is seriously ill. On Wednesday medical aid was summoned from Napanee, but up to the hour of going to press, Mr. Stratton is dangerously ill.

—Mrs. Freeman Lane leaves to-morrow morning to take up her residence in Toronto, where her sons Mort and Willie are attending College. Mrs. Lane has been a Class Leader and Sunday school teacher in connection with the Western Methodist church and will be greatly missed from town.

customed to the noise and bustle of city life are camping on the banks of the beautiful Massouga. Thus far with manly tread and watchful eye they've marched eager to shoot the stately deer, or wrestle with the mighty bear, or climb the tallest tree to avoid the danger that inexperience brings. But now at rest smoking the pipe of peace, they talk and crack their chestnuts, listen to the croaking of frogs and think of songs and home, and wonder why men versed in law, in metals precious and in financeering should shoulder warlike arms and march like Davy Crockett through forests of mighty oaks and lofty pines in search of game. Within their hut they seek repose. The rest they so much need to brace them up for arduous toil and no doubt dream of jack pots and wolves, whose melodious voices beyond the massive rock the natives hear and tell to fresh arrivals, tales of human slaughter. One more restless than his friends, owing to inexperience, before the break of day did venture out to gaze upon the moon or count the hosts of stars that form the milky way, but listening, hears a sound, and gazing in the forest sees a substance dark, "in form a quadruped." In accents low but thrilling he awakes the sleeping trio, "Methinks I see a bear." Seizing his deadly weapon he rushes madly forward, raises it to his shoulder. The trying moment has arrived! Can he face the music? Yes. The first shot of the campaign is echoed and re-echoed over the still waters of the Massouga. Patiently Stan awaits for indications of the death struggle, but waits in vain. No groans are heard, no pawings of the ground, no commotion visible. With silent breath they press forward to view the remains, when Durl exclaims in sepulchral tones, "Only a stump!" Yes, 'tis a stump. Well, the aim was good. See where the leaden missile entered its side! Behold the splinters! And, if 'twas not a bear, this much I know, the aim was true.

After breakfast a meeting of the quartette was called, when it was moved by Mr. M—, and seconded by Mr. S —, and Resolved, that in future, before firing, we satisfy ourselves fully whether the object to be shot at is animate or inanimate, as mistakes of that kind have a tendency to lessen our standing in the community in which we reside. Carried unanimously.

After a few stump speeches the meeting adjourned. The indications are good for a successful hunt, and in the not far distant future venison and bear's meat will be the principal article of food in many of our homes. Yours, BRUIN.

THE GRAND JURY'S REPORT.

To His Honor Judge Wilkison.

We the Grand Jury of our Soverign Lady the Queen, beg leave to report as follows :

We have visited the jail and find it kept in an exceedingly neat and proper condition. We find confined thereln three old men committed as vagrants.

We congratulate your Honor on the absence of crime in the county and trust that on many future occasions, the condition of affairs may be such as to justify the Sheriff in presenting your Honor with a pair of white gloves.

The Grand Jury further desire to express the hope that your Honor may be long spared to enjoy your present robust health and handsome appearance.

Twenty cents a number, two dollars a year. William Briggs, Wesley Buildings, Toronto, and S. F. Huestis Halifax. The thirtieth volumn closes well. It has four illustrated articles—describing Paris during the Exposition, a visit to Cypus and the Levant and Notes of Travel in Spain; Christmas Stories and Poems and other Christmas Reading. A paper on the Epworth League Movement, and other articles, make up an excellent number. The announcement for the 31st and 32nd vols. for 1890 is particularly strong. The substance of Lady Brassey's "Last Voyage," a sumptuous and costly book, will be given with 16 fine engravings, illustrated life and adventure in India, Ceylon, Burmah, Borneo, Celebes, Australia and New Guinea. The Editor will describe, with over 100 illustrations the adventures of his large tourist party in Europe last summer. A series of special interest will be the "Vagabond Vignettes," describing the journey on horseback thoughout the length and breadth of Palestine and the Levant, with nearly 100 woodcuts. The Serial Stories will be Mrs. Barr's "Master of His Fate," a Yorkshire tale, and "Kathleen Clare," an Irish story. An important series of papers on "Social Progress" will be given, and a series of "Character Sketches," and stories illustrating Social Reform. A sketch of Thomas Brassey, the great "Captain of Industry," by Prof. Goldwin Smith, will appear, and other important papers. 189a Newburgh.

Mr. Cephas Miller, one of our oldest and most respected citizens has been very sick, but we are glad to know that he is now some better. We all most earnestly hope his long and useful life may be spared much longer. None in our town would be missed more than Uncle Cephas.

Our beautiful snow has left us and with it the sleighing so much enjoyed and appreciated. We will doubtless have more snow in the near future. When it comes we will make good use of it.

The Principal of our Common School, Mr. Deroche, was made the recipient of a present and an address from his pupils one day during last week. Mr. Deroche is considered a capable and pains-taking teacher.

The congregations were small in both Churches on Sunday evening last on account of inclement weather.

The Methodist Church is preparing for a grand entertainment to be given in the Church on Christmas night. Mr. Crossley promises the best programme ever given in Newburgh, and we are all on tip-toe of expectation. Tell the people of Napanee that we will welcome a score or two from that town and make it pleasant for them too.

The Presbyterian church is also preparing for an entertainment a day or two before Xmas.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

Latest News From the Townships.

NORTH FREDERICKSBURGH.

The Tory organ has come out straight for a party fight in the hope of controlling the next County Council. They have undertaken a big task. Among other things they must defend the clique who have opposed Reeve Parks in North Fredericksburgh. The Beaver will find it rather up hill work to pull the Baird party together sufficiently to oust Mr. Parks. His election is a foregone conclusion.

AMHERST ISLAND.

Robert Filson has retired from politica life.

Robert Patterson is a candidate for the Reeveship.

ADOLPHUSTOWN.

Fred Membery is in the field again. He may get a few votes, but we doubt if the honest, church-going yeomanry of Adolphustown can be induced to cast their ballots for Fred Membery.

Either Jacob H. Roblin or Wilkie Dorand will contest the Reeveship with Mr. Membery or any other aspirant.

ERNESTTOWN.

There is nothing new to chronicle.

Byron Derbyshire is actively canvassing although he might as well be at something else, for he is sure to be elected.

I. O. Fraser has been so useful in the council that he deserves promotion and will undoubtedly get it. He will make a good Reeve.

Wellington Babcock will ask the electors to return him as second deputy-reeve. Mr. Babcock is recognized as a safe, careful councillor and he can be relied on to do good work in the more responsible position.

RICHMOND.

The fiat has gone forth and the faithful have decreed that Messrs. Sexsmith and Dafoe shall oppose all-comers. We are not among those who think that Mr. Dafoe will be content to accept a second position on the ticket. In Ibra B. Sills, Mr. Dafoe will find a foeman worthy of his steel. Mr Sills has served his township faithfully for twelve years and in all fairness is entitled to promotion.

Ira B. Hudgins will likely try conclusions with Mr. Sexsmith, and the fight will be a lively one. Mr. Hudgins need not fear the result.

SHEFFIELD.

The Tory organ announces that Benjamin Detlor will again try to be elected so as to keep the taxes down. The electors remember how he worked his little game and will have nothing to do with him in the future. Instead of paying money into the Sinking Fund of the township, Mr. Detlor and his friends actually used up the interest accuring from that fund and when they went out of office, the township was over two thousand dollars in debt. The new council had to raise money to pay off the debts incurred by Reeve Detlor and his associates. No! no! the electors want nothing more to do with Benjamin Detlor.

The electors also remember that if Mr. Detlor was elected, it would likely mean that James Shields would again be appointed clerk, and the present treasurer dismissed. The ratepayers of Sheffield remember the muddle into which ex-Clerk Shields got township affairs, many important by-laws never having been entered in the by-law book. Then, too, the people have confidence in honest "Larry" Way, and no one will be elected to the council who would be likely to be antagonistic to him.

Messrs, Wager and Reid will doubtless be re-elected by handsome majorities.

—If you want to take a drive, get a rig from W. Burns' livery. His rigs are all first-class.

—Watches, clocks, jewelery, silverware, and spectacles. The cheapest place in Napanee is at Chinneck's.

—Through tickets to Manitoba, British Columbia or any point in the United States can only be purchased from J. L. Boyes, G. T. R. R. ticket agent. His office is on Dundas street, Napanee. Mr. Boyes is also agent for the G. N. W. Telegraph Company.

HUMORS OF THE BENCH.

How Far a Judge May Go in Joking and Maintain the Dignity of the Court.

If a body of men are engaged in work of any kind and their leader insists on playing the wag, the moral atmosphere soon becomes entirely unsuited to the discharge of affairs. If, then, when lawyers are engaged in the solemn and important duties of a court of law, an example of frivolity is set by the person in authority, it is pretty certain that the public interest will suffer.

The principle which can be applied to determine how far it is allowable for a judge to exercise his gift of humor stands, therefore, thus: Nothing should be said by him which can in any way destroy the essential sense of seriousness which should pervade a court of justice, or introduce a temper of jocular familiarity, such as must infallibly breed contempt. As a matter of fact it will be found that such a rule is practically observed by most of the judges and that its operation does not in the least cut us off from that species of judicial wit which is most worth preserving. It prevents the court from being turned into a bear garden, but leaves ample scope for snubbing an impudent or restraining a tiresome advocate wittily, and for placing the results of an investigation or of the application of a legal principle in the shape of an epigram.

For example, it cannot be said that the dignity of the court suffered in the least when Baron Maule used his extraordinary power of humor to rebuke Mr. Cresswell's inordinate arrogance. Counsel had been treating the bench throughout his speech with the utmost lack of courtesy. At last the judge could bear it no longer and stopped him: "Mr. Cresswell, I am perfectly willing to admit my vast inferiority to yourself. Still I am a vertebrated animal, and for the last half hour you have spoken to me in language which God Almighty himself would hesitate to address to a black beetle."

Such phrases were not, we imagine, likely to make Baron Maule's court unmanageable, or to let counsel get out of hand. Surely it is absurd to say that the exercise of such wit must be condemned, because we protest against the use of an ill timed, ill judged and jaunty jocularity. The one need never for a moment lower the tone of the court. The other, "easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting," is sure to end in a loss of dignity and respect.

Again, the judge who reminded an advocate in the following manner that he was wasting the time of the court did no violence to decorum. The barrister had been explaining at great length certain transactions in regard to a furnished house. Having dealt with the house in a long and dreary oration utterly beside the point, he coughed and began: "And now, my lord, I propose to address myself to the furniture." "You have not been addressing yourself to anything else for the last hour and a half," was the reply.

In Honor of Reeve Parks.

Last Friday evening there was a pleasant little gathering in the sitting room of the Brisco House, the occasion being the presentation of a purse of money by the members of the County Council, to Mr. Irvine Parks, Reeve of North Fredericksburgh. The purse contained $86 and was given to show the good will of his fellow members. As soon as it was learned that Mr. Parks had to pay a portion of the costs in connection with the North Fredericksburgh protest trial, his friends in the County Council decided to show their sympathy in a practical manner. Warden Filson, Reeve Reid, Sexsmith and others made short speeches, all of them speaking in the highest terms of Mr. Parks. Their testimony was that he had faithfully performed the duties of his office while in the council, and had conducted himself as a gentleman. We congratulate Mr. Parks on being the recipient of the purse of money and the many kind but justly deserved words which accompanied it. Mr. Sweetnam, the popular Reeve of Denbigh, Abinger and Ashby, made the presentation.

cate in the following manner that he was wasting the time of the court did no violence to decorum. The barrister had been explaining at great length certain transactions in regard to a furnished house. Having dealt with the house in a long and dreary oration utterly beside the point, he coughed and began: "And now, my lord, I propose to address myself to the furniture." "You have not been addressing yourself to anything else for the last hour and a half," was the reply. Here, though counsel could hardly have felt comfortable, the court suffered no loss of respect.

Indeed, under certain circumstances, a judge may find in his wit the means of bringing clearly home to the public mind the ill results of any portion of our legal system which he considers imperfect.

Baron Maule had once to sentence a man tried before him in a case of bigamy, in which it appeared that though the crime had actually been committed, there were very great excuses for the prisoner. His wife had been drunken and unfaithful and, leaving him with a large family of children to bring up, had disappeared for several years. Under such circumstances he had thought himself able to marry again. In giving sentence Baron Maule in detail stated how the prisoner ought to have acted, how he should have brought one action for crim. con. in the civil courts and another in the ecclesiastical courts for a divorce, and, finally, how he should have obtained a private act of parliament dissolving the first marriage and allowing him to contract a second. "You will probably reply," ended Baron Maule, "that this would have cost you £1,000 and that you have not a thousand pence. But let me tell you, prisoner at the bar, that this is no excuse, and that in England the law is the same for the poor as for the rich."

As may be deduced, this passage led up to a sentence of three days' imprisonment, to begin from the first day of the assizes, and therefore, in this case at least, the prisoner had something beyond "his judge's joke for consolation."—The Spectator.

Rising Time at Sea.

The old sailors being called gradually rise to sitting postures in their berths with yawns, oaths and grumblings. If the hideous caller is seen, a boot or other missile may be shied in that direction. Otherwise the prejudice and disgust for his clamor on the part of those called expresses itself in irritable sarcasm such as, "Oh, why don't you make a little more noise?" "Think yourself smart, don't you?" "Say, don't you s'pose we can hear?" To-morrow morning at 12 or 4 these personalities and conditions of mind will be reversed. The awakened irritable grumbler will be the joyous caller, and the joyous caller of this early morn will be searching about his bunk for some offensive implement to hurl at the biped who thus performs the matutinal office of the early village cock.—Prentice Mulford.

ERASTUS WIMAN,

Energetic Advocate of this Policy.

Of all the portraits taken of that celebrated Canadian, Erastus Wiman, the one from which the above picture has been made is the best. All readers of the newspapers know what an energetic and successful man of business Mr. Wiman is. He is an alert and active statesman as well, though an unofficial one. During the past two years he has given a great many addresses in many parts of Canada in favor of Unrestricted Reciprocity between the Dominion and the United States, and the present aspect of the question in Canada is due, in a large measure, to the intelligence and persistency with which he advocated this great question.

A millionaire to-day, it may startle some readers to know, that not a great many years ago he was a struggling editor in Canada. He is at the present time President of the Northwestern Telegraph Company of Canada, a director of the Western Union, the moving spirit in the Staten Island Rapid Transit Company, and connected with other vast interests. One of his latest enterprises is a crushing machine for refractory ores, etc. The automatic weighing machines at New York ferries and other public places are of Mr. Wiman's introduction.

The wealth that enables him to be at the head of so many enterprises was made mostly by railroading. When the Pennsylvania railroad was doing its utmost to keep the Baltimore and Ohio out of New York, it was Mr. Wiman who suggested the feasibility of the latter building terminal facilities on Staten Island. The rival road had expected that the Baltimore and Ohio would seek to enter New York over the Reading Railroad and Jersey Central track, taking advantage of the excellent terminal facilities of the later road in Jersey City. Such would have been the programme had not the Pennsylvania spoiled the game. It was then that Mr. Wiman stepped to the fore. The fight began in earnest and in the New York Legislature it waxed hot and was continued in Congress. After the most determined opposition Mr. Wiman and the Baltimore and Ohio won, being allowed to

OF PUTTING OUT FIRES.

QUESTIONS TO BE DISCUSSED IN THE NEAR FUTURE.

The Making of Fireproof Buildings and the Matter of Adequate Fire Escapes Are Also Interesting—The Recent Fires in Lynn, Boston and Minneapolis.

The occurrence of three such fires as that at Lynn, Boston and Minneapolis; the fact that at one time the firemen lost control and the flames threatened to sweep Boston and repeat the conflagration of 1873, and that there was appalling loss of life at Minneapolis, will doubtless lead to redoubled vigilance in the matter of fire extinguishing systems, fire escapes and fireproof buildings. At such times those most interested are led to inquire,

MINNEAPOLIS TRIBUNE BUILDING BEFORE THE FIRE.

Do new conditions need new adaptations? The character of material used, the height of buildings, the exposure of frame districts, which, when aflame, act as kindlers to more substantial structures—these and many similar matters entering into the problem of fighting fire in great cities, come up to excite a new interest.

The growth of fire departments in the older cities where modern systems have been perfected has been very slow. London during the Eighteenth century was far ahead of New York in fire apparatus, but during the halcyon days of the American volunteer system, and during the early days of steam fire engines, New York shot far ahead of her old mother across the ocean. While London had the primitive fire engines, which, it is true, were worked by people who were considered too old for any other purpose, their principal operators being old women, lines of New Yorkers were passing buckets filled with water from the North and East rivers.

After relying on these for more than half a century, they sent to London and secured some engines such as were then in use there. These engines were the beginning of the New York fire department. Out of those who were accustomed to take them to fires grew the volunteer system, which attained its greatest perfection and prominence in the "fifties." Then hand engines were superseded by steam, and since there rule. During the first half of the Eighteenth century the insurance companies began by keeping fire engines for the purpose of protecting property on which they held insurances, and in 1733 seven offices combined under the title of the London Fire Engine establishment. Others were gradually added till all the principal offices were members, and the establishment became the city fire department. Even to this day the insurance companies constitute one of the principal sources of income to the brigade.

In London they have 53 steam fire engines and 95 hand engines. There are 32 miles of hose carried on 75 hose carts. Besides these there are 7 steam vessels and 11 rafts. Of fire escapes there are 146, besides 9 long wire ladders. The firemen number 591, including all ranks, 16 pilots and 67 coachmen. They have some ingenious contrivances for saving life in London, one of the most useful of which is a canvas shute, in which a person may come down and be received by the firemen without injury. Capt. Eyre M. Shaw is chief of the brigade.

The New York department, when steam fire engines were adopted, was built entirely anew. The management was placed in the hands of commissioners, the command being given to a chief. In New York there are nearly double the number of firemen employed in London, being about 1,000 in all. The steamers number 85, and the fact that there are no hand engines, as in London, indicate that the people of the United States are far more ready to throw off the old than the people of England. But in New York there are 3 water towers, 33 hook and ladder trucks, 10 chemical fire engines, 130 chemical extinguishers, with 35 miles of hose and 54 hose tenders. Charles O. Shay is chief.

This force and apparatus protect the abodes and the goods of less than 2,000,000 of people, while the London fire brigade is supposed to protect a city of some 4,500,000. It will appear that the New York apparatus is more modern from the excess of steamers and the "chemicals." Indeed, a comparison of the number of men and apparatus seems to indicate a far more effective service in New York than in London, though, perhaps, the buildings are more substantial in the Old World.

In efficiency, doubtless, the Chicago department comes next to New York. After her great fire her citizens saw the necessity of perfecting her fire department, and the result is today a very fine service. Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati and other large American cities also now have a very perfect system. The department in Boston, in checking the career of the late great fire there, showed fine generalship on the part of its chief and great efficiency on

READY FOR THE FRAY.

The late Capt. Ericsson bears such relation to the modern method of fighting fires as Harvey, the discoverer of the blood, bears to the modern practice of medicine. Ericsson was a pioneer, but he was not a practical developer of the present system. John Braithwaite and John Ericsson built a steam engine in London sixty years ago, but they had to fight a prejudice against innovation which then existed in England; besides, none of the earlier steam fire engines were available on account of the time required for getting up steam. The difficulty was overcome when A. B. Latta, of Cincinnati, introduced tubular boilers. Since then the steam fire engine has been the only method of throwing water on fires in large cities.

The fire department of London is called the Metropolitan Fire brigade, and exists by virtue of a parliamentary act. The chief is an autocrat during a fire; he may pull down houses, shut the water off the mains of any district, and, if necessary, would doubtless not hesitate to blow up one-quarter of the city if he could find dynamite enough. In London everything has grown out of some exigency. The fire department there is no exception to the general

now have a very perfect system. The department in Boston, in checking the career of the late great fire there, showed fine generalship on the part of its chief and great efficiency on the part of the men.

A great feature nowadays in fire fighting is the telegraph system. To know of a fire the instant it occurs, and to get to it with apparatus for its extinguishment without delay, are of the utmost importance, especially in windy and dry weather. The large cities now all have a fire department telegraph, with numerous signal stations. The horses are so placed that they can be harnessed in the quickest possible time, and learn, when they hear the gong which is struck by electricity, that they are going to race to a fire, and are eager to be off.

The appurtenances for use at fires have been increasing in ingenuity till there are now water towers, telescope ladders, life saving hooks with cross pieces for climbing and tools for extinguishing in profusion. But of late years a new problem has been staring the firemen in the face: that is, the height of the town buildings such as are being put up in New York, Chicago and other large cities. No fire apparatus has yet been devised for reaching these buildings from the outside. They are usually considered fire proof, but many of them are not, and there is enough combustible material in any of them to cause no inconsiderable fire, especially when they are exposed to one beside and beneath. This, taken in connection with general conflagrations, such as have swept Portland, Boston and Chicago, becomes an important subject for speculation. Already in Chicago there is a district composed almost exclusively of these tower buildings. They are exposed to the west by other bricks, and then a forest of frames. Let a great fire occur among them. How can the firemen work at so great an elevation? And what is true of Chicago will become so of all other large American cities.

BANISHING A BRAGANZA.

BRAZIL SHIPS DOM PEDRO AND DECLARES HERSELF A REPUBLIC.

Remarkable Epochs and Changes of Fortune—Doubtful Future of the Republic. Strange Melange of Races—Large Forest Tracts of Brazil.

The American continent does not now hold a monarchy of any sort, "from the Aurora Borealis of the north to the frozen serpent of the south," as Burke said. Canada is a nominal vice royalty, it is true, but practically as much a republic as any country on the continent. Brazil but a few days ago finished the job; the emperor and family have gone to Portugal and a republic is proclaimed—and without the sacrifice of a life.

Eighty-two years ago the royal family of Portugal fled before Bonaparte to the then Portuguese province of Brazil, and soon raised it to an independent empire; now the imperial family of Brazil return to their royal Portuguese cousins. It is a romance in history. Dom Pedro has a private fortune of over $3,000,000, and is promised a pension of $450,000 a year from the Brazilian republic; so he will not be a burden to his relatives. It would indeed be a calamity if he had to "live on his wife's folks," for they were revolutionized out of business many years ago. The father of the empress, whom Dom Pedro married in 1843, was then Francis I, king of the two Sicilies; but the general overturning which made the united kingdom of Italy threw all the Bourbon rulers of that time out of employment.

DOM PEDRO II.

Dom Pedro himself has a score of well-to-do relatives, though the revolutions of this century are rapidly reducing them to the ranks. When Bonaparte invaded Spain and Portugal, John VI, the reigning Braganza of the latter, fled to Brazil; but the revolutionary movement soon infected all Spanish America, and one by one the provinces from Mexico southward were torn from their allegiance. Yielding to the inevitable, King John avoided a war by proclaiming a constitution, Feb. 26, 1821. He then returned to Portugal, leaving his son, Prince Pedro, as regent. But the Brazilians wanted complete separation, and Oct. 12, 1822, the empire was proclaimed. Dec. 1 Dom Pedro was crowned emperor. He married the Archduchess Leopoldina of Austria, and their son, the present Dom Pedro, was born Dec. 2, 1825.

The next year King John of Portugal died, and the Brazilian ruler was called on to choose between the two countries. He resigned the crown of Portugal to his infant daughter, Dona Maria da Gloria, of sex and intensity (according to the structure of Spanish and Portuguese) for each, so as to greatly increase the number.

It is roughly estimated that 80 per cent of the total population is of freedmen—emancipated by slow processes for many years or by the sweeping act of sudden manumission last year. And there is reason for suspecting that this rapid emancipation without promise of indemnity to the owners was the cause of Dom Pedro's overthrow, and that this new republic is really a reactionary affair—a view greatly strengthened by the fact that of the 2,500,000 or more adult males in the country not more than 200,000 have so far enjoyed the right of suffrage. Color is no bar, but there are many other limitations. And, finally, 84 per cent. of the adults are illiterate! To sum it all up, this new born republic has perhaps 12,000,000 people, of whom but a third are white, nearly half colored, one-tenth or so degraded heathen, and five-sixths unable to read. Americans would not, in the present state of their own politics, consider that very promising material for a republic.

The trade of Brazil is really quite important for so limited a population, and this is the point of most enduring interest to Americans. For many years Brazil's exports have averaged $150,000,000, occasionally running much higher, and her imports $125,000,000 or more. Like most new and poor countries, with lavish abundance of raw materials, her exports are apparently much greater than her imports. To the United States Brazil sends annually about $34,000,000 worth of coffee, $12,000,000 of rubber, $6,500,000 of sugar and $1,500,000 of skins, other products being in many minor classes. Her imports from the United States are relatively quite small. Her trade with Great Britain may be said to nearly balance—about $30,000,000 exports to $33,000,000 imports from England yearly.

If one might venture a prophecy as to the future of Brazil, it would naturally be something like this: The present republic will run a little more recklessly than the empire did, but still with some degree of conservatism as long as the power is kept in the hands of the educated few. In no long time, however, by concession or by revolution, the power will pass to the many, and then will come the "bloody sweat" through which all these prematurely born republics have to pass before their people learn self government. And, finally, there is good reason to expect that the whites will retreat to the limited area most favorable to them, and in time the negroes, strengthened by black immigration from other nations, will fill the central region and rule the country.

present Dom Pedro, was born Dec. 2, 1825.

The next year King John of Portugal died, and the Brazilian ruler was called on to choose between the two countries. He resigned the crown of Portugal to his infant daughter, Dona Maria da Gloria, but only five years later he had to give up the rule of Brazil also, as the people demanded a still more liberal government. He abdicated in favor of his son, Dom Pedro, but the country was governed by a regency till the latter reached the age of 16, when, in 1841, he was formally crowned, to serve as emperor forty-eight years. He has had, on the whole, a successful reign. His daughter Isabella, crown princess, born in 1846, was married in 1864 to the Count D'Eu, or Prince Louis of Orleans, oldest son of the Duke of Nemours, and therefore in the line of Orleanist succession to the French throne—if that amounts to anything nowadays. Dom Pedro also has three sons. His second daughter, Leopoldina, married Prince August of Saxe-Coburg, and left four sons.

The future of the republic of Brazil is somewhat cloudy. Its area is a little larger than that of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, and next to Russia the largest continuous tract under one government, covering at least 3,200,000 square miles—from 5 degrees north to 33 south of the equator. An enumeration of its products and resources is simply bewildering. It has, for one item, a million square miles of virgin tropical forest, in one small section of which Agassiz found 117 species of valuable woods and such a vicious variety of snakes and insects that their "botanical names" alone would fill this column. Yet in all the republic there are certainly not more than 12,000,000 people (some put it as low as 8,000,000), and only one-third of them are of the Aryan (or Caucasian) race. There were originally about 100 tribes of Indians, of which at least a dozen remain.

One is surprised to learn, after all the discussion about slavery and emancipation, that there is no complete census of the colored people; but the latest attainable puts the full blacks at "about 2,000,000" and the "metis" at 3,801,787. There were at the same time (1872) 3,787,289 whites and "about 390,000" Indians. It is, therefore, important to discover what a "meti" is. As the name indicates, he is a "mixed." The largest class of the "mixed" is thought to be the "mamelucos" or "mestizos"—those combining Aryan and Indian blood. Next are the mulattoes of all shades, and lastly the "cafuzos" or Indian-negro mixtures. It is evident, however, that there must be many who unite the blood of all three races, and in fact the language has names for sixteen different grades and race mixtures, and qualifying inflections

A STUDY IN BLACK AND WHITE.

The Art of Prolonging Life.

Somewhat different advice must be given with regard to bodily exercises in their reference to longevity. Exercise is essential to the preservation of health; inactivity is a potent cause of wasting and degeneration. The vigor and equality of the circulation, the functions of the skin and the aeration of the blood are all promoted by muscular activity, which thus keeps up a proper balance and relation between the important organs of the body. In youth the vigor of the system is often so great that if one organ be sluggish another part will make amends for the deficiency by acting vicariously, and without any consequent damage to itself. In old age the tasks can not be thus shifted from one organ to another; the work allotted to each sufficiently taxes its strength, and vicarious action can not be performed without mischief.

Hence the importance of maintaining, as far as possible, the equable action of all the bodily organs, so that the share of the vital processes assigned to each shall be properly accomplished. For this reason exercise is an important part of the conduct of life in old age; but discretion is absolutely necessary. An old man should discover by experience how much exercise he can take without exhausting his powers, and should be careful never to exceed the limit. Old persons are apt to forget that their staying powers are much less than they once were, and that, while a walk of two or three miles may prove easy and pleasurable, the addition of a return journey of similar length will seriously overtax the strength.—Dr. Robson Roose in Popular Science Monthly.

REAR ADMIRAL WALKER

commanded the gunboat De Kalb at Arkansas Post as lieutenant commander in the United States navy. There is a considerable rise from the position of head of a Mississippi river gunboat to admiral of a fleet of five such vessels as the Chicago, the Atlanta, the Yorktown, the Boston and the Dolphin. No United States naval officer has ever made a cruise with any such fleet.

After the civil war Admiral Farragut went abroad in the old Franklin, a wooden ship of an antique pattern. He was received everywhere with marked honor, which was rather for the man than his ship. Admiral Walker goes in charge of a fleet of modern ironclads which are supposed to compare favorably with the best in the world.

The squadron will sail from Boston on or before Dec. 1 to Lisbon, probably stopping at Madeira where they will be joined by the old wooden ship Enterprise. From Lisbon they will go to the Mediterranean, and while on the cruise will touch at many prominent European ports. The object of the cruise is to show the world what Uncle Sam has been doing lately in the way of war ship building.

A Novel Dress Suit.

At a recent convention of merchant tailors Mr. Henry Turner, president of the Tailors' National exchange, appeared in a new and original dress suit, which he offered for the consideration of his brother tailors, with a view of making it the fashion. If he should succeed in this, it will be the last great triumph of that democratic movement which was inaugurated in America with the Declaration of Independence. No potentate or prince could survive this blow to royal prerogative as a setter of fashions.

NEW DRESS SUIT.

This is what Mr. Turner proposed:

The coat is of dark material, with a light shawl collar, silk faced, with no lapel seams, and with the skirt and fore part cut together, being only partly separated by the waist seam. The skirts are boldly rounded over the hips, and the fore part and sleeves ornamented with elaborate embroidery.

The vest is of white figured silk, closing with four buttons, having a moderately curved crease and plain rolling collar.

The trousers are of lavender shade, and contrast "very effectively with both the coat and vest."

A MINER'S CHRISTMAS.

HOW THE YULE TIDE IS CELEBRATED UP IN THE ROCKIES.

"Stag" Dances—In the Lonely Cabins Where Two "Pards" Are Shut in for Months by the Snow—Flowers from Loving Letters—"Home, Sweet Home."

Imagine a point in midair about two miles above New York city, and you have the elevation at which over 1,000 miners in Colorado spend the holiday season. They are shut in by snow and ice, and for months to come they will know as little about what is going on in the busy world as though they were sailors on some vessel frozen up for the winter amid the icebergs of the Arctic regions. Early in the fall, before the snow flies, they are housed in on some of the lofty peaks of the Rocky mountains, and not until May or June will they again mingle with their fellow men.

It is often the case that some one of the boys is a good fiddler, and Christmas night he will rosin the bow, tune up the old fiddle, and with alternate "pards" for girls the boys will dance and make merry.

But there are those who are not as fortunate as the miners who are shut up in the big mine for the winter. There are the lonely cabins, far up on the mountain side, many miles distant from human habitation. Here three or four men are snowbound together for the winter. Often there are just two "pards," and "pard" in the mining camps means almost the same as "comrade" does in the army. Their Christmas meal is a frugal one, and with eager longings their hearts will reach out from that deep gorge or lofty peak to eastern homes, and wonder what the loved ones there are doing. It is at these holiday times that the prospector and wanderer longs for the old associations of home and the dear faces he has not seen for years. For months they have undergone many hardships and privations, been through hairbreadth escapes and thrilling adventures, and yet in the Christmas time all the tenderness and love that comes with thoughts of home is in their hearts. In the mining camps of the Rocky mountains I have heard little groups sing "Home Sweet Home" on Christmas eve. How each felt it! It was not sung so much, as it was the melody each felt in heart as he thought of home. It was sung in that dreamy kind of way, showing that the thoughts of all were far away, and each one was thinking as well as singing, and that if a tear did steal down some grim visaged face, there was nothing unmanly in it, was there?

I was writing about the lonely cabin. The scene there is not always one of merry making at Christmas. Of those two who dwell there alone, far away from all contact with the world—gold hunter ascetics—one may be sick. If you could force your way through that wilderness of snow, lift the latch gently, for it is never bolted, you will find one nursing and keeping faithful watch by

The scene there is not always one of merry making at Christmas. Of those two who dwell there alone, far away from all contact with the world—gold hunter ascetics—one may be sick. If you could force your way through that wilderness of snow, lift the latch gently, for it is never bolted, you will find one nursing and keeping faithful watch by his sick "pard." It may be a son watching by the cot of a father. Why is that old man braving all these hardships? Aye, there is the mortgage on the eastern home. If they find the precious vein by spring, next Christmas will find that old home free from debt. Mr. Banker, could you witness such scenes as these, as I have done, you would tell the old man that you would be a little easy about the interest on "that ar mortgige," that has troubled him so long.

One Christmas I spent up on the mountain side with two or three others, and there we had our holiday dinner, and it was a wholesome meal, but wanting in those delicacies that a mother or wife can best prepare. A snow storm was raging along the mountains, but with our cheerful fire and warm cabin, we cared nothing for it.

"If we had some flowers for the wish table," said one of the boys.

We all wished the same.

"Get out your old letters," said one.

We all knew what that meant, for many a flower from the old house finds its way in letters to the boys out west. One found a rosebud, another a violet, another a daisy, and then another rose was found in a mother's letter. Withered and faded were these tokens from the old homes, but never did men value flowers more than we did that withered bouquet.

"Can't some one say grace," said one of the boys.

No one volunteered.

"The closing lines in my mother's letter," said a boyish fellow, "might do."

"Read them," was the response that came from all.

Heads were bowed around that frugal Christmas board, and the young man read:

"God bless you, my son, and God bless us all."

I then looked up and saw tears on the cheeks of weather beaten faces.—Denver Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

An Unnatural Mother.

"I believe I've got the meanest ma in Texas."

"What did she do?"

"Just before Christmas she put me into long trousers. She did that so I would have to wear short stockings that wouldn't cost so much to fill. What do you say to that for meanness? She'd make a nice stepmother, she would."—Exchange.

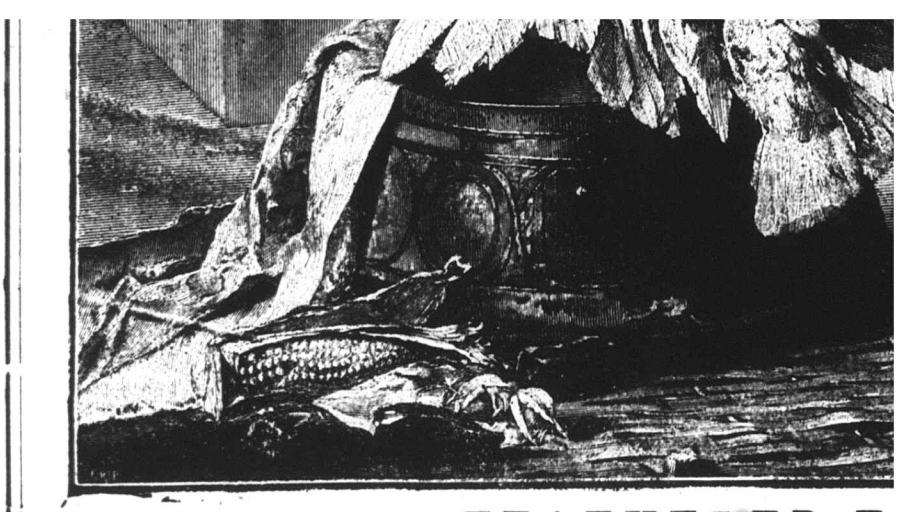
An Excuse for Not Giving a Present.

Clara—Mother, Charles was very rude last night.

Mother—Well, don't you know what it means?

"No, I don't."

"He is trying to pick a quarrel with you so he can get out of giving you any Christmas present. I know these men."



FEATHERED F

AFTER THE RAIN.

The sunset on the water's breast
  Is casting down its mellowed light;
The clouds are floating into rest,
    Before the night.

Now that the storm has passed away,
  A parable of nature lies
On path and field, for those who say
    That they are wise.

Beside the placid mere I stand,
  And watch the rainbow's wondrous stain;
A fragrance from the moistened land
    Gives thanks for rain.

A twitter from unnumbered birds
  That haunt the tangled flowery ways—
What is it but the simple words
    Of love and praise?

We thank our father for the light
  In which his tenderness appears,
For sunny joys—forgetting quite
    To thank for tears;

Forgetting that his testament
  Is written on the rainy skies—
That blessed comforters are sent
    For tearful eyes;

Forgetting he that goes in tears
  To sow upon a field of pain,
Shall come when harvest season nears
    To gather grain.

—Arthur L. Salmon in Good Words.

They Didn't Want to Appear in Print.

At a dinner not long ago Wilkie Collins related instances proving how impossible it was to introduce into a novel descriptions of places and things wholly imaginary. In one of his works he described a house which he had never seen, and which was entirely the offspring of his imagination. A few days after the publication a man called upon him to protest against the introduction of his house into his novel. Strange to say, the pages of the novel contained a perfect description of the man's property. At another time he used as one of his characters a man who was so exact about his eating that he weighed every morsel which entered his stomach. Mr. Collins had in reality never heard of such a man. He was greatly surprised, one week after the appearance of his book, by the visit of an utter stranger, who wished to know by what right Mr. Collins made him ridiculous in print by mentioning one of his peculiarities.—New York Star.

A New York judge sentenced a highwayman to an imprisonment of sixteen years for stealing thirteen cents. The sentence probably convinced the thief that thirteen is an unlucky number.

A CHRISTMAS STORY OF REAL LIFE, BY DAVID A. CURTIS.

[Copyright, 1889, by American Press Association.

TO THE younger generation who know New York only as it has been for twenty years past, growing better all the time despite the sneers of pessimists, it is impossible to realize that only a few years farther back there was such a place in the center of the city as the Five Points. Nowadays it does not take unusual courage for a moderately athletic man to walk alone in broad daylight through any public street in the city. Then it was not safe to do so, and even policemen rarely ventured alone after dark into the region known by the old name. Now the horse cars run through the center of it. Broad streets have been cut through, and old buildings replaced with new. Factories and stores stand where were formerly tumble down rookeries, that had stood since the last century, and that were swarming with the most degraded poor and the most desperate criminals. When the Rev. W. C. Van Meter, with a few friends as earnest and determined as himself, first started a mission school within the borders of this valley of the shadow of crime, he was repeatedly warned by the police of the dangers he incurred, and it was some time after the work was started before he dared to take, even under escort, in the middle of the day, the ladies who were anxious to aid by teaching in the school. It seems now like a story of a foreign land and another age, but I saw in 1854 or 1855 a party of a dozen ladies and gentlemen mobbed as they started homeward from the school one Sunday noon, hustled into the street and assailed with volleys of obscene oaths and rotten vegetables, and so beset by a horde of half drunken men and women that they were glad to escape with whole bones and ruined garments. And the police seemed powerless to prevent or punish such outrages, for this was no unusual occurrence.

square, for the distance of a couple of blocks in every direction, was honeycombed with blind alleys and secret passages, some of them running underground from one block to another. It was a city of refuge for criminals, and, though they warred and preyed upon one another with entire lawlessness, they combined as a unit to protect any one among them from the processes of the law. Aside from the criminals the population consisted almost entirely, if not quite so, of the poverty stricken, for dire poverty and desperate crime then, as very often in history, went hand in hand.

The children, who were coaxed one by one into the mission schoolroom, were a crowd of little savages. Their ignorance was something amazing. It was not very uncommon to find among them boys and girls of 6 or 7 years old who did not know their full names, but who stoutly declared that "Sally" or "Bill" was the only name they had, and once or twice children were found who actually did not know whether they had ever had fathers and mothers. Some had no homes. God only knows how they kept alive, for they slept in holes and corners, and fed like vagrant cats and dogs on whatever they could beg, find or steal. Impossible? Certainly it is, but it is true, nevertheless.

Among the wildest and shyest of all who came in was a boy who was the originator of at least one famous joke, though without intention. The teacher asked him his name and he said it was George. Being asked what his last name was he said that was his last name.

"But you must have another name," urged the teacher. "Is it George Smith, or George Johnson, or George What?"

"Nope," he said, shortly. "Taint George What, nor George Nothin', it's George. I hain't got no oder name."

But the joke came when the teacher, wishing to know whether he had learned anything at all, asked him, "Do you know who made you?"

At the same instant a boy behind him stuck a pin into George. Such tricks were very common among the little savages, but it did not hurt any the less because it was not unusual. George jumped from his seat and shouted at the top of his voice "Goddemitey."

"Well, that's right," said the teacher, who had not noticed the trick. "But don't shout so." The story was told afterwards, with enlargements, until it became a "chestnut" many years ago.

It was a long time—some months—before the teachers could learn much about the boy, for he was distrustful to the last degree. He kicked the Rev. Mr. Van Meter on the shins very violently, and twisted himself away like an eel when that gentleman, according to his habit, laid his hand affectionately on the boy's shoulder. George thought he was going to be beaten, and took his usual precaution of eluding the preliminary hold. He had, it seemed, never known what it was to have anybody take hold of him in kindness, and was no more to be handled than a young bird or a squirrel. There was hardly anything, in fact, that he did know, as the good mission people reckoned knowledge. He knew

And the police seemed powerless to prevent or punish such outrages, for this was no unusual occurrence.

The region about what is now Paradise square, for the distance of a couple of blocks in every direction, was honeycombed with blind alleys and secret passages, some of them running underground from one block to another. It was a city of refuge for criminals, and, though they warred and preyed upon one another with entire lawlessness, they combined as a unit to protect any one how to swear fluently, as his accidentally correct answer as to his Maker indicated, but he did not know, and it was a long time before he could be made to understand, that swearing was wrong. In fact, he did not know what wrong was. So far as his experience of life went, everybody did precisely what seemed at the moment desirable to do, unless prevented by superior physical force, or by bodily fear. Stealing was to him a perfectly legitimate mode of acquiring anything that he might happen to want, and the only reason why it should be done secretly was that too much ostentation about the act was apt to provoke interference on the part of the owner, who might and probably would want the article himself. Lying was simply the easiest way of concealing anything that he did not care to reveal, and the only inkling he had of the objectionable character of the act was that anybody to whom he told a lie would beat him savagely if he did not lie cleverly enough to escape detection. As to the Sabbath, the first knowledge he had of the difference between one day and another came from his noticing that once in a while these people who had whole clothes on and who spoke gently came into the neighborhood and opened the little mission room and tried to get the children to go into it.

George was among those who were coaxed in with much difficulty, but after going once he went regularly. The room was clean and pleasant, and as the autumn days came on there was a stove put in and a fire made it warm. That was a novelty to him—being allowed to sit undisturbed in a warm room. The story the good teacher obtained from him after winning his confidence was appalling by its very absence of detail; but it was only one of many like stories, and she could do very little to alleviate the misery that was all around her.

George lived with a woman whom he had been taught to call Aunt Sally. Whether she was his aunt, who his

Mrs. Harrison's father was a wealthy manufacturer, whose two daughters were the children of different mothers, and developed as they grew to womanhood strikingly different characteristics. The elder one, Sarah, was the daughter of his first wife, who had deserted him and her infant child to run away with one of his clerks. He knew little of her story after her flight, but in the course of a year and a half he learned that she had been forsaken by her lover and had plunged into such a terrible course of dissipation that death had been mercifully speedy in overtaking her. A year later he married the second time.

SUCH A CHRISTMAS.

Again a daughter was born to him, and as the two children grew up they were treated, as nearly as possible, exactly alike. Everything that money could buy, or affection dictate, was at their command, and every influence of refinement and education was exerted to fit them for a high place in society, but whether it was some taint in the blood, or a morbid brooding over a mother's sin and shame, something led the elder daughter to turn away from good and seek evil from her early youth. The father sought in every way possible to avert the misery which he foresaw for himself and for her, but it was of no avail. A wayward youth was followed by utter recklessness as the unhappy girl became a woman. She still made her father's house her home, and would spend a large portion of her time there; but there were prolonged absences which the family strove in every way to conceal, and into which they dared not inquire closely for fear of shameful disclosures. The climax came in a peculiarly painful way. Among the gentlemen who visited at the house was Mr. Harrison, and it happened that, while the younger daughter was the one he sought in marriage, both the girls fell in love with him. Sarah's passion was none the less violent because of its lawless character and its utter hopelessness, and when she learned that her sister was to marry the man she herself loved, she left home finally, after a terrible scene in

The region about what is now Paradise square, for the distance of a couple of blocks in every direction, was honeycombed with blind alleys and secret passages, some of them running underground from one block to another. It was a city of refuge for criminals, and, though they warred and preyed upon one another with entire lawlessness, they combined as a unit to protect any one among them from the processes of the law. Aside from the criminals the population consisted almost entirely, if not quite so, of the poverty stricken, for dire poverty and desperate crime then, as very often in history, went hand in hand.

The children, who were coaxed one by one into the mission schoolroom, were a crowd of little savages. Their ignorance was something amazing. It was not very uncommon to find among them boys and girls of 6 or 7 years old who did not know their full names, but who stoutly declared that "Sally" or "Bill" was the only name they had, and once or twice children were found who actually did not know whether they had ever had fathers and mothers. Some had no homes. God only knows how they kept alive, for they slept in holes and corners, and fed like vagrant cats and dogs on whatever they could beg, find or steal. Impossible? Certainly it is, but it is true, nevertheless.

Among the wildest and shyest of all who came in was a boy who was the originator of at least one famous joke, though without intention. The teacher asked him his name and he said it was George. Being asked what his last name was he said that was his last name.

"But you must have another name," urged the teacher. "Is it George Smith, or George Johnson, or George What?"

"Nope," he said, shortly. "Taint George What, nor George Nothin', it's George. I hain't got no oder name."

But the joke came when the teacher, wishing to know whether he had learned anything at all, asked him, "Do you know who made you?"

At the same instant a boy behind him stuck a pin into George. Such tricks were very common among the little savages, but it did not hurt any the less because it was not unusual. George jumped from his seat and shouted at the top of his voice "Goddemitey."

"Well, that's right," said the teacher, who had not noticed the trick. "But don't shout so." The story was told afterwards, with enlargements, until it became a "chestnut" many years ago.

It was a long time—some months—before the teachers could learn much about the boy, for he was distrustful to the last degree. He kicked the Rev. Mr. Van Meter on the shins very violently, and twisted himself away like an eel when that gentleman, according to his habit, laid his hand affectionately on the boy's shoulder. George thought he was going to be beaten, and took his usual precaution of eluding the preliminary hold. He had, it seemed, never known what it was to have anybody take hold of him in kindness, and was no more to be handled than a young bird or a squirrel. There was hardly anything, in fact, that he did know, as the good mission people reckoned knowledge. He knew mother or father was, whether they were alive, or whether, indeed, he had ever had a mother or a father, were matters concerning which he absolutely knew nothing, even by hearsay. Aunt Sally was negatively good to him, it appeared. She did not beat him, excepting when she was drunk, which was, however, much of the time. She let him sleep in her room, and when she had food she gave him some. When she was drinking heavily she did not bother about eating, and George had learned, as young as he was, to keep away from her, and get his food for himself. How or when he got it, only God's ravens could have told. Such cases are not as common in New York as they were twenty-five or thirty years ago, but they are found now and again, even in these days. Who Aunt Sally was, or why she took any interest whatever in him, he knew nothing about. She was a fact, and her interest, faint though it was, was a fact, and he had not come to the age of reasoning about facts. He only recognized them.

One day—and it chanced to be Christmas eve—a lady and gentleman appeared in the little room as visitors. They had read of the mission work, the gentleman explained, and had come from their home in a nearby city to see it and to give what little help was in their power. There was a story back of it, but this story was not told till afterward. Their name was not Harrison, so I may call them that.

GEORGE LIVED WITH AUNT SALLY.

"My wife," said Mr. Harrison, "is painfully, almost morbidly, anxious to do everything she can for poor children, especially for orphans. And about Christmas time she seems especially nervous about it. There is a story about it, of course, but it is too long and too painful to tell now." This to Mr. Van Meter, whose earnestness in his chosen work made him rejoice in every new found friend, and whose enthusiasm was contagious.

Before long the story was known.

Harrison, and it happened that, while the younger daughter was the one he sought in marriage, both the girls fell in love with him. Sarah's passion was none the less violent because of its lawless character and its utter hopelessness, and when she learned that her sister was to marry the man she herself loved, she left home finally, after a terrible scene in which she swore vengeance, defied all authority, and spurned the love of her father, mother and sister.

For three years nothing was heard of her. Her father, old before his time with sorrow, mourned for her truly, and would at any time have received her back with open arms, but no word came, and he knew too well the futility of trying to track her or to lure her home again. At last one evening she presented herself and demanded an interview, which was readily granted.

It was behind closed doors, and no one but the father ever knew just what passed between them. He told his wife and daughter, however, the substance of it. Sarah had demanded a portion of his fortune, and had offered for it to hide herself from him forever, to take another name and lead her own life in her own way.

"I told her," said the sorrowing man, "that she should always have a home with me, no matter when she came to claim it, and that I would never see her want for anything if she would come back to me, but that, if she persisted in the life she plainly said she proposed to live, I would do nothing for her before or after my death. And then she left me, saying it was forever, and cursing me—cursing me, her father, who even now would die for her if need be."

For a time after this nothing was heard of the prodigal. Then one Christmas eve she wreaked her hate, or vengeance, as she chose to call it, in an awful crime. Mrs. Harrison's only child, a boy not quite three years old, was in one of the public parks of the city, in charge of a nurse, when Sarah approached, and, by pretending a violent fancy for the child, threw the careless servant off her guard. Whether she bribed the girl, or really succeeded in tricking her, was never known, but it was two hours later when that frightened individual reported to Mrs. Harrison that her boy had been stolen.

It would be impossible to describe the agony of the parents, and useless to detail all the circumstances of the search that was made. The servant gave a sufficiently accurate description of the strange woman, whom she had never seen before, for the family to know who the kidnapper was, but Sarah had had a sufficient start to get on a train for New York, and all efforts to trace her were ineffectual. Had the newspapers even at that time learned the particulars of the story it would have become as famous as the Charlie Ross case, but the family shrank from the exposure that would have been inevitable, and though all the detective skill that could be procured was employed, no publication was made in the press.

Six years had passed from the day the boy was stolen when Mr. and Mrs. Harrison entered the little mission school in

A CHRISTMAS STORY OF REAL LIFE, BY DAVID A. CURTIS.

O THE younger generation who know New York only as it has been for twenty years past, growing better all the time despite the sneers of pessimists, it is impossible to realize that only a few years farther back there was such a place in the center of the city as the Five Points. Nowadays it does not take unusual courage for a moderately athletic man to walk alone in broad daylight through any public street in the city. Then it was not safe to do so, and even policemen rarely ventured alone after dark into the region known by the old name. Now the horse cars run through the center of it. Broad streets have been cut through, and old buildings replaced with new. When the Rev. W. C. It seems now like a story of a foreign land and another age, but I saw in 1854 or 1855 a party of a dozen ladies and gentlemen mobbed as they started homeward from the school one Sunday noon, hustled into the street and assailed with volleys of obscene oaths and rotten vegetables, and so beset by a horde of half drunken men and women that they were glad to escape with whole bones and ruined garments. And the police seemed powerless to prevent or punish such outrages, for this was no unusual occurrence.

The region about what is now Paradise square, for the distance of a couple of blocks in every direction, was honeycombed with blind alleys and secret passages, some of them running underground from one block to another. It was a city of refuge for criminals, and, though they warred and preyed upon one another with entire lawlessness, they combined as a unit to protect any one among them from the processes of the how to swear fluently, as his accidentally correct answer as to his Maker indicated, but he did not know, and it was a long time before he could be made to understand, that swearing was wrong. In fact, he did not know what wrong was. So far as his experience of life went, everybody did precisely what seemed at the moment desirable to do, unless prevented by superior physical force, or by bodily fear. Stealing was to him a perfectly legitimate mode of acquiring anything that he might happen to want, and the only reason why it should be done secretly was that too much ostentation about the act was apt to provoke interference on the part of the owner, who might and probably would want the article himself. Lying was simply the easiest way of concealing anything that he did not care to reveal, and the only inkling he had of the objectionable character of the act was that anybody to whom he told a lie would beat him savagely if he did not lie cleverly enough to escape detection. As to the Sabbath, the first knowledge he had of the difference between one day and another came from his noticing that once in a while these people who had whole clothes on and who spoke gently came into the neighborhood and opened the little mission room and tried to get the children to go into it.

George was among those who were coaxed in with much difficulty, but after going once he went regularly. The room was clean and pleasant, and as the autumn days came on there was a stove put in and a fire made it warm. That was a novelty to him—being allowed to sit undisturbed in a warm room. The story the good teacher obtained from him after winning his confidence was appalling by its very absence of detail; but it was only one of many like stories, and she could do very little to alleviate the misery that was all around her.

George lived with a woman whom he had been taught to call Aunt Sally. Whether she was his aunt, who his

Mrs. Harrison's father was a wealthy manufacturer, whose two daughters were the children of different mothers, and developed as they grew to womanhood strikingly different characteristics. The elder one, Sarah, was the daughter of his first wife, who had deserted him and her infant child to run away with one of his clerks. He knew little of her story after her flight, but in the course of a year and a half he learned that she had been forsaken by her lover and had plunged into such a terrible course of dissipation that death had been mercifully speedy in overtaking her. A year later he married the second time.

GEORGE LIVED WITH AUNT SALLY.

"My wife," said Mr. Harrison, "is painfully, almost morbidly, anxious to do everything she can for poor children, especially for orphans. And about Christmas time she seems especially nervous about it. There is a story about it, of course, but it is too long and too painful to tell now." This to Mr. Van Meter, whose earnestness in his chosen work made him rejoice in every new found friend, and whose enthusiasm was contagious.

Before long the story was known. Harrison, and it happened that, while the younger daughter was the one he sought in marriage, both the girls fell in love with him. Sarah's passion was none the less violent because of its lawless character and its utter hopelessness, and when she learned that her sister was to marry the man she herself loved, she left home finally, after a terrible scene in which she swore vengeance, defied all authority, and spurned the love of her father, mother and sister.

For three years nothing was heard of her. Her father, old before his time with sorrow, mourned for her truly, and would at any time have received her back with open arms, but no word came, and he knew too well the futility of trying to track her or to lure her home again. At last one evening she presented herself and demanded an interview, which was readily granted.

And then she left me, saying it was forever, and cursing me—cursing me, her father, who even now would die for her if need be."

For a time after this nothing was heard of the prodigal. Then one Christmas eve she wreaked her hate, or vengeance, as she chose to call it, in an awful crime. Mrs. Harrison's only child, a boy not quite three years old, was in one of the public parks of the city, in charge of a nurse, when Sarah approached, and, by pretending a violent fancy for the child, threw the careless servant off her guard. Whether she bribed the girl, or really succeeded in tricking her, was never known, but it was two hours later when that frightened individual reported to Mrs. Harrison that her boy had been stolen.

It would be impossible to describe the agony of the parents, and useless to detail all the circumstances of the search that was made. The servant gave a sufficiently accurate description of the strange woman, whom she had never seen before, for the family to know who the kidnapper was, but Sarah had had a sufficient start to get on a train for New York, and all efforts to trace her were ineffectual. Had the newspapers even at that time learned the particulars of the story it would have become as famous as the Charlie Ross case, but the family shrank from the exposure that would have been inevitable, and though all the detective skill that could be procured was employed, no publication was made in the press.

Six years had passed from the day the boy was stolen when Mr. and Mrs. Harrison entered the little mission school in the Five Points. It was her own loss that had made her so peculiar anxious to benefit poor children; but though she was forever searching for her own little one, both she and her husband had almost given up the hope of ever finding him. While Mr. Harrison was talking with Mr. Van Meter, however, her eager eyes were scanning the faces of all the boys in the room.

Suddenly she turned pale. "Oh, George!" she said, or gasped, rather, and without another word she flew rather than ran to the other end of the room. Dropping on her knees in front of the poor little waif who had drifted in so strangely, she seized him with both hands and looked eagerly, almost wildly, into his eyes.

"What is your name?" she said to the startled child.

"George," he said.

"George what?"

"I dunno," he answered, beginning to cry, for he had developed a sensitiveness about his lack of a proper compliment of names, and, moreover, he was half frightened by the now frantic woman's strange behavior.

Suddenly she tore open his jacket and the poor, ragged shirt he had on, and looking on his breast found the birthmark she sought. Then, quick as a flash—the whole thing happened so quickly that it was over before her husband reached her side—she gathered him into her arms, dirt, rags and all, and kissed him until it seemed as if she were trying to devour him. Then, of course, she fainted.

It did not take long, though, for the other ladies in the room to bring her back to consciousness, and then such a scene as is rarely witnessed in this world put an end to anything like the usual order of exercises. Mr. Harrison was naturally a little slower than his wife to recognize the child, but only a little, and the bewildered boy was shortly embraced and kissed as few children in this world ever have been.

Such a prayer as Mr. Van Meter uttered, while the tears streamed down his cheeks and every person in the room dropped on his knees, has seldom been heard even from his eloquent lips, and in a few more minutes Mr. Harrison proposed to leave. It was obvious enough to him that he had to take his child home, but the good missionary was too well acquainted with the neighborhood to let him go unattended.

"You would be mobbed before you had gone a block, if the people saw you carrying away the child," he said, and it was presently arranged that a policeman should be summoned to escort the party up to Broadway, and a carriage should be taken there.

This was done as quickly as possible, for there was real danger of trouble if the news had been spread through the neighborhood before they got away. As it happened, however, all passed off quietly, and little George had seen such a Christmas as he had never dreamed of.

"Aunt Sally" was found, and every effort was made to induce her to reform. She consented to go home, but whether she remained there or not I do not know.

CLEVELAND SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

A Rare and Beautiful Structure to be Completed in 1891.

The soldier and sailors' monument soon to be erected in Cleveland, O., will be one of the most imposing memorial structures in the country.

The monument will be erected in the public square, where it can be seen for miles on all approaches. It will be surrounded by a lawn studded with beautiful patterned flower beds, representing the Grand Army and Loyal Legion badges, flanked with the different corps badges of the army. The lower esplanade will have, bordering the terrace, a row of low posts in the form of the muzzle ends of cannon sticking out of the ground, on the top of which will be flaming cannon balls connected by a massive chain. Leading from the lower to the upper esplanade, at the four corners of the monument, will be quarter circle steps, each flight twenty-eight feet wide at the base. Here the monument proper begins.

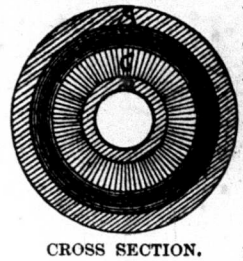
The shaft will be of black granite, twelve feet square at the base. The column, including the capital, pedestal and surmounting figure of Columbia, will be 125 feet in height. The shaft will be built up of sections or layers five feet deep, with a gradual taper to the top. At every other bedding joint of the courses will be a massive band of cast bronze, on which will be inscribed the most prominent battles of the war. The capital will also be of cast bronze, the four sides of which, below the volutes, will be detailed to represent the four branches of the service. In the lower pedestal or base of the column, where it passes up through the building, will be eight large panels of marble, representing the "Emancipation" and other striking incidents of the war.

Encircling the column will be the relic room, forty feet square and twenty feet high. The doors of the vestibules will be of bronze, with rich panels. The floor will be laid in patterns of colored

A NEW GUN.

It Will Doubtless Set the Experts by the Ears.

A new gun, called the Brown wire gun, invented by Mr. John Hamilton Brown, is proposed, which will undoubtedly set the experts at loggerheads. The gun consists of an inner tube of longitudinal steel segments, wound about with wire under such a strong pressure that the expansive power of gunpowder will not force them apart. Outside of the wire is a steel jacket, to contain and protect the whole, while within is a steel lining tube. The wire wound about the segments is with a tension capable of resisting a pressure of 125,000 pounds to the square inch. The circumferential strain is all thrown on to the wire, which has an elastic limit of 125,000 and a tensile strength of 267,000 pounds to the square inch.



CROSS SECTION.

The wire is wound by the aid of an electric tension regulator, which governs the tension at which it is wound to one-tenth of an ounce of uniformity throughout the entire mass.

The steel segments are made six inches wide and a quarter of an inch thick at the inner edge, and less than half an inch thick at the outer edge.

The lining tube will be inserted in two pieces, the joint being slightly in advance of where the base of the projectile rests at the moment of greatest pressure.

It will readily appear to any one that, if the gun can be constructed practically, as the plan is conceived theoretically, it ought to be a very tough arm. The rigidity of a gun cast all together renders it liable to a number of defects. But can the gun be practically constructed? The great difficulty seems to be uniformity. Can the wire be wound by means of an electric regulator uniformly? And even if a uniform tension is obtained it is claimed that it will not answer, as in that case the outer layers would have a tendency to loosen the inner layers. It is also asserted that there will be a difficulty in tempering so long a piece of steel as that required for the segments. As to the wire ex-for there was real danger of trouble if the news had been spread through the neighborhood before they got away. As it happened, however, all passed off quietly, and little George had seen such a Christmas as he had never dreamed of.

"Aunt Sally" was found, and every effort was made to induce her to reform. She consented to go home, but whether she remained there or not I do not know.

Sensational as anything in fiction, is it not? Yet, excepting in some few details, it is a true story.

WASHINGTON'S SENATORS.

They Are Watson C. Squire and John B. Allen.

Of the two men first to represent the new state of Washington in the United States senate New York furnishes one and Indiana the other.

Watson C. Squire was born at Cape St. Vincent, N. Y., in 1838. He was graduated at the Wesleyan university at Middletown, Conn., in 1859. The law then claimed his attention, besides school teaching. But at that time the great struggle between north and south came on, and young Squire enlisted in the Nineteenth New York infantry. He served on the Potomac till the fall of 1861, when he was mustered out and returned to the study of the law.

WATSON C. SQUIRE.

In the fall of 1862 he raised a company, and was afterwards placed in command of the First battalion of Ohio sharpshooters. He served in all the battles of the Army of the Cumberland, and finally was made judge advocate on the staff of Gen. Rousseau and afterwards Gen. George H. Thomas.

After the war Mr. Squire became an employee of the Remington Arms company and went abroad to make contracts. In 1879 he went to Washington territory, and was made governor by President Arthur in 1884. He has done a great deal to make Washington what it is.

John Boord Allen, Senator Squires' colleague, was born at Crawfordsville, Montgomery county, Ind., in 1845. Senator Allen is one of those men who got his education by hard knocks. At 18 years of age he enlisted in the One Hundred and Thirty-eighth Indiana infantry and served in the West till he was mustered out in 1865. He then went to live at Rochester, Minn., acting for a time as an agent for a grain firm. But having a predilection for the law he studied first in an office and then at Ann Arbor, Mich., being admitted in 1869. Going to Olympia, W. T., he opened an office and a public reading room, he being custodian of the latter. He speedily thrived at the law and in 1875 was appointed United States attorney for the territory. In 1881 he removed to Walla-Walla. Six years later he was elected a representative in congress, but did not take his seat. The two senators are Republicans.

pedestal or base of the column, where it passes up through the building, will be eight large panels of marble, representing the "Emancipation" and other striking incidents of the war.

Encircling the column will be the relic room, forty feet square and twenty feet high. The doors of the vestibules will be of bronze, with rich panels. The floor will be laid in patterns of colored marble with military emblems. The walls are to have a wainscoting of endolithic marble, in which the inscribed names of the dead soldiers of Cuyahoga county, numbering between eight and ten thousand, will be placed. The ceiling will be of light colored marble, with molded ribs and plain panels. The roof is to be of massive slabs of stone, and in the whole structure there will not be one square inch of perishable material. On each side of the monument, or relic building, will be a bold, massive pedestal 7x19 and ten feet high, surmounted by groups of bronze statuary representing the four principal branches of the service.

The infantry will be represented by "The Color Guard" of nine figures, depicting a scene witnessed upon many a battlefield when a regiment has had the bitter experience of unsuccessfully charging an enemy's works "too strong to be carried by direct assault." The artillery will be represented by "The Defense of the Last Gun," a full squad, with officer commanding (six figures) and all engaged in a desperate hand to hand struggle. The cavalry group of six figures will have a color sergeant still astride his fallen horse valiantly defending his flag in a fierce encounter. The navy will have a group of six sailors in the act of loading a mortar. The bronze figures are from 7 feet 6 inches to 8 feet in height.

The architect and sculptor, Mr. Levi T. Scofield, has erected many public buildings and monuments throughout the country. The sculptors assisting him are George T. Brewster, George Wagner and August Godis.

Commissioner of Navigation.

Capt. William W. Bates, of Buffalo, who recently appointed commissioner of was navigation by President Harrison, was born in Calais, Me., in 1827. He learned shipbuilding in the towns of Washington county, Md., and after a season at Detroit, Sandusky and Huron, returned in 1846 to Maine, where he entered into business with his father. In 1849 he built the schooner Challenge, the first clipper on the great lakes, at Mantowoc, Wis. At this time he was an acknowledged authority on marine architecture. From 1854 to 1857, with the late J. W. Griffith, he edited and published The Nautical Magazine and Naval Journal. He took part in the civil war, after which he resumed shipbuilding in Chicago. He built a dry dock at Portland, Ore., in 1881, and in the west and east continued to study problems of shipping economy. For several years he has been the chief inspector and manager of the Inland Lloyds, with headquarters at Buffalo.

have a tendency to loosen the inner layers. It is also asserted that there will be a difficulty in tempering so long a piece of steel as that required for the segments. As to the wire, experts fear that it will be found impossible to get wire men to furnish large quantities up to standard. Mr. Brown, the inventor, is confident as to the practicability of constructing the gun and its availability, and thinks that it will be proof against longitudinal wearing of furrows because of the give to the gun. Lieut. G. N. Whistler, of the Fifth United States artillery, has spent much time with Mr. Brown in making the mathematical calculations incident to the invention.

Tello d'Apery is the name of the youngest journalist in New York, and one of the youngest in the world. He is only 12 years of age, and is already editor of a monthly journal for boys and girls. The journal is less than a year old, but has already made its mark, and won numberless compliments for its youthful editor. It has been the aim of the young lad to do good with his little paper. It has not been started with the intention of making money, but rather for aiding poor little children by calling attention to their wants.

Tello has received letters and contributions from some of the most noted people in the world. Among them appear Ferdinand de Lesseps, Gen. He has also received contributions from several royal hands, and the accompanying cut is of a medal sent to him with a letter from the president of Bolivia. It is the "Decoration of Liberator" conferred for good deeds.

Many ladies of literary fame have also contributed to The Sunny Hour. Mary Mapes Dodge, Mrs. Frank Leslie, Ella Wheeler Wilcox, the queen of Roumania, Amanda M. Douglas, the countess of Martel ("Gyp"), etc.

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Head of the Largest Organized Body of Women in the World.

The Convention of the National Woman's Christain Temperance Union in New York re-elected Frances E. Willard President of tne organization. She therefore remains at the head of a body comprising about two hundred thousand members, having forty National Departments, and doing great work for temperance. The late John B. Gough, once said, in speaking of the society: "It is doing more for the temperance cause to-day than all the other societies combined." When he said this the W. C. T. U. was not as great an institution as it is now.

Miss Willard, of whom we give a newly made picture, is fifty years of age, more or less. She was born in the East. When she was about three years old her parents removed West, first settling in Oberlin, Ohio. They removed to Janesville, Wisconsin, when she was eight years old, Her education was superintended by her mother who had an excellent governess as her assistant. Its methods were highly practical. To know was made the incentive to do. Hence the home Journal, the home debating circle, and so forth. So grew Frances in body and mind and heart until eighteen. Then she went to Milwaukee, where one term was spent in the college founded by Catherine Beecher. Evanston, Illinois, was her next place of abode, the home selected by her parents as the best for their family, because containing the advantages of the healthiest domestic life with facilities for self-improvement. At Evanston her father died, in 1867. After graduating, Frances taught in Evanston, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Lima, New York State. From 1868 to 1870, she made a trip to Europe and the East, giving one year of the time to study in the French capital.

Upon her return a wider field of activity awaited her. Her ability to speak in public had been discovered and invitatiions from the Northwest poured in upon her. A year later her admiring townspeople elected her President of the Woman's College, at Evanston, which position she resigned in 1874, when the college became incorporated with the University. She then accepted an invitation to devote her and as well as by the less ancient lake dwellers of western Switzerland and of Italy, by the people of Hungary in the stone age, and by the Egyptians on the evidence of a brick of pyramid in which a grain was imbedded, and to which the date of 3359 B. C. has been assigned.

The existence of names for wheat in the most ancient languages confirms this evidence of the antiquity of its culture in all the more temperate parts of Europe, Asia and Africa, but it seems improbable that wheat has ever been found growing persistently in a wild state, although the fact has often been asserted by poets, travelers and historians.—Edinburgh Review.

Connubial Bonds in Australia.

An Australian colonist recently caused to be inserted in the newspapers the following brief announcement: "Not having heard of my wife for the past ten years, I intend to marry again—John Leary, postoffice, Geelong." A husband who has waited a whole decade in the hope that his errant spouse may turn up, hardly appears open to the charges of being short tempered; but unless the laws of the colony of Victoria already include a statute of limitations applicable to matters connubial and covering the case of Mr. Leary, it would seem that that gentleman is at length prepared to run the risk of committing bigamy rather than continue any longer in the condition of single blessedness. Probably the above announcement is to be explained by a measure now before the parliament of Victoria, and which will, in all probability, shortly become law. This is the so called divorce law amendment bill, by which in that portion of the British empire the dissolution of the marriage tie is to be greatly facilitated.

By this measure a divorce may be granted on various grounds not hitherto admitted as justifying so extreme a remedy. Desertion or habitual drunkenness, with neglect or cruelty on the part of either husband or wife, will henceforth enable either to obtain a divorce a mensa et thoro. If either commits a violent assault on the other, or is convicted of crime, the injured party may, in either case, demand not a mere judicial separation, but a final and complete dissolution of the marriage. Legislation of this sort is calculated to shock not a few people in this country, but there can be no doubt that the public feeling is overwhelmingly in its favor in Victoria. Indeed, on the passing of the act, a rush of discontented husbands and wives anxious to avail themselves of it is anticipated from the other colonies, and a clause has accordingly been inserted rendering it necessary that married persons must have been domiciled in the country for two years at least before their petitions for divorce can be entertained.—London Standard.

Physicians and Persian Women.

When a Persian lady is ill and requires the attentions of a physician, she must be concealed by a screen, and he makes his inquiries without seeing her. She may be permitted to put out her hand and wrist in order that her pulse may be felt, but only when actually necessary. Among the lower classes in the villages a little more freedom is permitted in consulting a doctor, for they live a more communal life, and the physicians in the rural districts are itinerants, who on arriving at a village open an office under a broad plane tree by the side of a murmuring brook. Of course veiled, the women flock around him, and he prescribes heroic doses, sometimes adding a charm to be worn over the suffering member, consisting of an extract from the koran inside of an amulet. After dosing the village and carefully collecting every fee on the spot, the rustic Æsculapius prudently decamps to the next village. If the patient recovers, praise is given to God

Upon her return a wider field of activity awaited her. Her ability to speak in public had been discovered and invitatiions from the Northwest poured in upon her. A year later her admiring townspeople elected her President of the Woman's College, at Evanston, which position she resigned in 1874, when the college became incorporated with the University. She then accepted an invitation to devote her energies to the cause of the Woman's Temperance Union. Her work was varied in 1876-7 by assistance rendered to Messrs. Moody and Sankey in their meetings at Boston. In 1878 she took charge of the Chicago Post, in the place of her brother just deceased. This proved a failure, and her appointment as President of the Illinois State Woman's Christian Temperance Union succeeded as a grateful change from the editorial supervision of an unsuccessful journal.

Miss Willard has been connected with the W. C. T. U. ten years, and during that time the amount of work which she has accomplished seems almost incredible; she has travelled thousands of miles, making on an average a speech every day, and has visited every town in the United States of ten thousands inhabitants and most of those of five thousand, organizing branches of the W. C. T. U. She is described as having no equal among the members of the W. C. T. U. as an organizer, both planing work and being the life and inspiration of the workers. Her admirers say she has the preception and ready tact and strength to utilize ability of any degree, and knows where to place everyone who is willing to assist the movement with which her name is identified. The degree of strength she possesses in the W. C. T. U. is evidenced in the vote which re-elected her. An informal ballot resulted in 360 votes for her, out of a total of 391. This vote was then made formal, and Miss Willard was declared elected.

The Origin of Wheat.

Wheat, which is now the bread corn of twelve European nations, and is fast supplanting maize in America and several inferior grains in India, was no doubt widely grown in the pre-historic world. The Chinese cultivated it 2700 B. C. as a gift direct from heaven; the Egyptians attributed its origin to Isis and the Greeks to Ceres. A classic account of the distribution of wheat over the primeval world shows that Ceres, having taught her favorite, Triptolemus, agriculture and the art of bread making, gave him her chariot, a celestial vehicle which he used in useful travels for the purpose of distributing corn to all nations.

Ancient monuments show that the cultivation of wheat had been established in Egypt before the invasion of the shepherds, and there is evidence that more productive varieties of wheat have taken the place of one, at least, of the ancient sorts. Innumerable varieties exist of common wheat. Col. Le Couteur, of Jersey, cultivated 150 varieties. Mr. Darwin mentions a French gentleman who had collected 322 varieties, and the great firm of seed merchants, Vilmorin-Andrieux et Cie., cultivate about twice as much in their trial grounds near Paris. In their recent work on "Les Meilleurs Bles" M. Henry L. de Vilmorin has described sixty-eight varieties of best wheat, which he has classed into seven groups, though these groups can hardly be called distinct species, since M. Henry L. de Vilmorin has crossed three of them—Triticum vulgare, Triticum turgidum and Triticum durum—and has found the offspring fertile.

Three small grained varieties of common wheat were cultivated by the first lake dwellers of Switzerland (time of Trojan war)

After dosing the village and carefully collecting every fee on the spot, the rustic Æsculapius prudently decamps to the next village. If the patient recovers, praise is given to God as well as to the doctor; if he or she dies, the result is laid to kismet, or fate, but at the same time it is well that the doctor should not be on hand, for human wrath is liable to overcome faith in the decrees of destiny.—S. Impossible.

There was to be company at dinner, says The Binghamton Republican, and Bobby's mother had cautioned him to be careful of his behavior, especially to eat sparingly, and always to say thank you when anything was passed to him.

The older people were rather numerous and perhaps rather hungry. At all events they kept the hostess so busy that she found no time to wait upon Bobby. The little fellow grew desperate.

"Say, ma," he whispered, after a time, "how can I eat sparingly and say thank you, if I don't get anything?"

PARLOR ENTERTAINMENTS

OLIVE HARPER WRITES ON THE BEST WAY TO CONDUCT THEM.

She Gives a Sample Programme Which Will Without Doubt Be of Vast Assistance to Many Who Are a Little Uncertain as to How to Manage the Matter.

RIGHTLY to organize and conduct a parlor entertainment requires many and varied talents, among which are executive ability, unusual tact and persuasive powers, besides an eye for effect and an understanding of what will please the audience for whose amusement the entertainment is designed.

In the first place, canvass for talent, and see how much we could find. There is always a pianist, often a good amateur banjoist or violinist, and generally several persons who can sing fairly well. Those who can play upon any instrument should be secured first, and then a quartet chosen, if possible, to make up one, and these same singers can also be relied upon each for a solo. They are useful as interludes between other things, even if they do not sing very well, and if they sing beyond the average they are doubly valuable.

In these days, and in mixed assemblages, there is always some one who recites, and we have learned to listen to them with praiseworthy patience, and so one or two recitations may be given, one tragic or dramatic; one or two others should be humorous, if possible. People who have precocious children are apt to put them forward on this part of the programme, and it requires great tact and judgment on the part of the manager to keep them from attempting some piece that the most capable elocutionist would scarcely dare to undertake. Who has not heard some lisping child say all in one breath, "Avaunt-angel-of-death-oh-god-o-god-you-shall-not-TAKE-my-child," and been consumed by a desire to laugh and break things both at once. If a child is to recite, let it be some simple thing, the simpler and quieter the better, something that will not be ruined and made ridiculous by a wrong emphasis or lack of emphasis.

Recitation and music being provided for, there still remains a hiatus to fill, and this can be done with tableaux, or a bright little comedietta, in which the best talent in that line must be secured.

I am now wearing one of your Artificial Legs over two years and I can conscienciously say, that I have never experienced the slightest inconvenience from the first day. Its construction is perfect. Regarding your knee and ankle joints, they are the very acme of perfection, in short, gentleman your Artificial Limbs are without a par.

Respectfully yours,

MARKHAM, Aug. 3rd 1888.

Dear Sirs,—This is to certify that I have worn one of your Trusses about three weeks, and have found it the best Truss that I have come across. I have tried it in every position that I could, and find that it will not move out of its place, and therefore I do not want any better Truss and would not like to do without it. I hope the Lord will bless you.

Yours very respectfully, place sufficient very fair talent could be found: First an overture by piano with violin or flute accompaniment. Second, quartet in popular ballad, or, where possible, three or four or more young girls dressed in college gowns and trencher caps, who sing the rollicking college song of—

All you fellows who have peanuts and give your neighbors none,
You sha'n't have any of my peanuts when your peanuts are gone.

This song never fails to set a properly disposed audience off into roars of laughter, and half the battle is done if you can make your audience laugh heartily in the beginning of the evening. Next, you may have a recitation, after which a solo song or instrumental music. A very pretty thing next would be a minuet by the smallest children you can get to dance it, and they can be dressed in costume. The very mistakes and awkwardnesses of tiny little tots are pronounced "sweet" and "cunning."

I remember one case where four little midgets were to play the three graces and the awarding of the apple. The rosy youth ate it up and handed the core to the chosen one. Another boy was to go and kiss the sleeping beauty, but got frightened and stood in the center of the stage and "lifted up his voice and wept," and he lifted it up high, too, while tears as big as gooseberries rolled down his cheeks and the sleeping beauty raised her head to see what was the matter. Children, charming as they are, are uncertain quantities before the public, and the careful manager must always take this into account and arrange things so that their failure shall bring diversion but not disaster.

If children preponderate in the audience, the tableaux of the good old fairy tales dear to every little heart can be given, the older and more worn they are the dearer. If grown people preponderate, a very pleasing diversion may be made by a few tableaux vivants representing "The Courtship of Miles Standish," "Evangeline" sitting lonely and

Recitation and music being provided for, there still remains a hiatus to fill, and this can be done with tableaux, or a bright little comedietta, in which the best talent in that line must be secured.

A very taking programme might be made upon the following plan, with some slight alterations, and in almost any sad eyed, and Andromeda chained to the rock with Perseus about to rescue her. All the world loves a lover, particularly when picturesque and poetic.

These are easily arranged and can be made to resemble statues or pictures at will. For statues the people who take the character should dress in white, have white wigs and be lavishly powdered with flour, and the light should not be thrown directly upon them, and what there is should be white, though if feasible a curtain of white tarletane can be stretched in front of them and then a direct light thrown, a very dark background being provided. Classical costumes can be improvised of sheets in a few moments. To make one for a woman take two sheets and pass a tape through the wide hems and draw them up so that they fit the shoulders. Then take two big buttons, mold and cover them with white cloth, or gilt, if preferred, and fasten them where the two sheets meet upon the shoulder. The sheets can then be tacked, or even pinned, together under the arms and on down to the feet. A cord or girdle is now fastened about the waist, binding the fullness in, and the gathers should be deftly pulled into the proper shape, leaving the waist portion to droop loosely over the skirt. A picture of an ancient Greek or Roman costume will help the novice to drape her robe—for Greek robe it now is—perfectly and in classic style. Pins will do the rest. The arms are bare, and the shoulders.

If other drapery is required, another sheet is all that is necessary for the mantle, and all that it needs is to be thrown over the left arm. One corner is tucked into the girdle just left of the center of the waist, and drawn loosely under the right arm and across the back, then forward over the left arm and shoulder, the rest falling in natural folds. The effect is perfect, and many modifications can be made, all graceful and classic.

FAIRY TALE TABLEAU.

To present tableaux vivants as pictures they require a green gauze curtain stretched tightly about three feet from the background, which should be dark, and a frame should be simulated of painted canvas. The figures pose in between gauze and background, with a direct light. The effect and illusion are of making money for some specified object, and, of course, requires great care and good management to succeed, and is for the general public more than a strictly private affair. If, for instance, the object is to get money for any one particular purpose, sufferers by fire, famine, deluge or other disaster it would not be amiss to have the tableaux represent one phase of the suffering it is intended to relieve, and of necessity it follows the usual routine to a certain extent. In a future article I wish to furnish ideas for other entertainments adapted to other circumstances.

OLIVE HARPER.

David Hostetter.

David Hostetter, the millionaire "bitters" manufacturer, who died in New York city the other day, was a striking instance of how a man may prosper by industry and attention to business. He was once a clerk in a dry goods store, earning a few dollars a week, but he had the faculty of making money. When he was 23 years of age he went into the dry goods business on his own account. In 1853 he associated himself with Gen. W. Smith and began making bitters. Thenceforward he met with entire success. Mr. Hostetter was said to be worth from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000, and he held a large interest in the much talked of South Pennsylvania railroad.

DAVID HOSTETTER.

Method of Drying Buildings.

A new invention is reported for drying buildings. A Russian engineer, M. De Wreczinsky, has invented an apparatus for drying buildings, which is said to have proved very effective. It is based on the principle of carbonic gas rapidly absorbing the moisture of the air, and to this end the inventor has constructed a closed stove burning charcoal by the introduction of air into it direct from the open through two tubes. A steady current of dry, warm carbonic gas is allowed to escape into the room to be dried, which rapidly absorbs the moisture in the air, and escapes in the ordinary manner through the chimney.—Chicago Herald.

If He Could Only Fill It.

Little Mary is a good little girl nearly 5 years old, but possessed of a poetical genius which runs rather too strongly toward paraphrasing. She has done a good deal of composing during her brief existence, but mainly in the way of words substituted for others, which left her open to the charge of plagiarism. She is also possessed of a fund of humor which would not be expected in one so young. Mary's father the other day, by way of breaking the child of her fault as a poet and testing her capacity at original composition, offered her as a Christmas present the largest and best picture book that could be found in Chicago if she would make up a piece of poetry which would not resemble any other that she had ever heard. She was given two days to complete the task, and yesterday morning sang the following as her original composition:

This song never fails to set a properly disposed audience off into roars of laughter, and half the battle is done if you can make your audience laugh heartily in the beginning of the evening. Next, you may have a recitation, after which a solo song or instrumental music. A very pretty thing next would be a minuet by the smallest children you can get to dance it, and they can be dressed in costume. FAIRY TALE TABLEAU.

To present tableaux vivants as pictures they require a green gauze curtain stretched tightly about three feet from the background, which should be dark, and a frame should be simulated of painted canvas. The figures pose in between gauze and background, with a direct light. The effect and illusion are perfect. Colors can be used in dress and the characters require a theatrical make up.

After the tableaux there should be a short intermission, and the first number on the programme after it should be musical. A quartet is good, and particularly liked when singing ballads or old songs. Culture and pretense are powerful, but popular taste is stronger still, and if one gets up an entertainment, it is to please those who go to it, and so it is better to leave out classical music and all such selections and choose simple, old fashioned airs. The person who tries this once will prove the truth of my assertion.

After the quartet can come an instrumental solo. A little juggling, if there is any one who has a taste that way handy; or perhaps some one will like to show how well he can swing his Indian clubs, or some young lady amateur will give a pretty "endurance" dance or whistle. There are many persons who learn some one little thing like this on purpose to make themselves of use. Lady and child violinists are always in demand.

When these shall all have done their best, and answered all their encores, a short comedietta, or even farce, is good to finish up with, and if good amateur talent is obtainable, the fewer the characters the better. If not, let as many in as possible, and the number of characters on will hide each other's defects and make things livelier. The good manager must give each one the best part, and keep them all good natured, if possible—a thing never yet done, I believe.

A BOY'S CIRCUS.

A song, "Home, Sweet Home," or "Auld Lang Syne," by the whole company is a good ending to such an entertainment. When it is convenient, the floor is often cleared for dancing.

This programme is calculated for an ambitious entertainment for the purpose present the largest and best picture book that could be found in Chicago if she would make up a piece of poetry which would not resemble any other that she had ever heard. She was given two days to complete the task, and yesterday morning sang the following as her original composition:

Hang up papa's stocking,
Be sure you don't forget;
If Santa Claus can fill it,
We'll all be wealthy yet.

It is needless to say that Mary lost the prize, her father pronouncing the pomelet a parody, and one which showed reckless disregard for the truth on the part of the child.—Chicago Herald.

Christmas Sonnet.

Deep shadows fold the dark earth in.
A holy silence everywhere
Tells of that night when, thro' earth's sin,
The cry of angels cleft the air.
"Glory to God, to men good will!"
Hear it thou, who do peaceful rest
With pale hands folded; may it thrill
Thy heart, thou friend; I love thee best;
Peace and good will to all I love.
Yea, friend or foe. Tho' there may be No stars, His light shines clear above,
Who died for us on Calvary;
A star, which, risen in that far east,
Now crowns with love our Christmas feast.
—By Tricotrin.

A False Pretense.

"Well, my son," asked Jimmy Tuffboy's mother, "are you satisfied with your Christmas?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied Jimmy, "only the skates ain't nickel plated, and dad said he'd buy me a double ripper, an' I didn't see it."

"But I am sure you have been happy all day, James."

"I wasn't going to let the fellers know how bad I felt."—Exchange.

Too Near the First of the Month.

"One thing I've got against Christmas."

"What's that?"

"It comes too late in the month."

"How does that affect it?"

"Why, when a man's wife gives him a splendid present the bill is sent to him in about a week. It would be better if he had about three weeks to get ready for it."—Christmas.

An Old English Custom.

Among customs now disused, a ceremony existed at the court of England as late as the reign of Charles II of bringing a branch of the Glastonbury thorn, which usually blossoms on Christmas eve, in procession, and presenting it, with great pomp, to the king and queen on Christmas morning.—New York Post.

Received Some Himself.

"Have a cigar, Charley?"

"Don't care if I do."

"Some that my wife gave me for a Christmas present."

"Er, come to think of it, Tom, I guess I don't feel like smoking today."—Exchange.

His Hands Full.

Jinks—Make any calls today?

Binks—No. I was too busy receiving.

QUEER TEMPERED RAZORS.

Shaving Instruments Discussed from the Metaphysical Point of View.

"When I say that a razor has a good temper," said a barber to a reporter, "I mean something more than that the steel has been hardened by fire and water to just the right point. In my opinion a razor has a disposition like a human being. It may be amiable and always do its work smoothly—though I never did see a razor yet that wasn't subject to off spells once in a while—or it may be sulky half the time and refuse to cut properly, even if the best of tools when in a good humor. And what you've got to do is to humor it. There's no use trying to drive a razor that doesn't want to shave; you'll only put yourself out, maybe cut the customer and make the razor so angry that it won't work again for goodness knows how long. The thing to do is to put it right away in a drawer, without disputing the matter, and give it a rest.

"Take it out again at the end of a week, and ten to one it will be in prime condition and as willing as possible. There was a college professor in here one day not long ago who stuffed me with what he called a scientific explanation of razors' fits. He said that if I would look at the edge of a razor through a microscope I would see that it looked like a cross cut saw, with teeth projecting on either side. By use these teeth were bent out of shape; but if the razor was put away for a while the teeth would get back into adjustment again and the tool would once more appear sharp. Of course, that all sounds very well, but I stick to my theory just the same. And I ought to know, for I've seen more razors, and handled 'em, than that bald headed old professor ever dreamed of."

"It seems to me," said the reporter, upon whom the tonsorial artist was operating, "that the razor you are using upon me at this moment must be suffering from no small degree of irritation on some account or other, judging by the way it hurts."

The barber paused for a moment in the scraping performance, and extending one thumb drew the edge of the blade slowly across the nail in a manner that sent a cold shiver down the newspaper man's backbone.

"It's sharp enough," he remarked, "but I'll try another. Perhaps this razor did not like you. You see, there's no doubt of the fact that razors have their personal preferences. The blade that will shave one customer to a charm won't shave another. Of course, a difference in the toughness and thickness of the beard makes a difference in the sort of razor required, but I am not speaking of that at all. If a razor doesn't happen to like you it won't shave you well under any circumstances. Now, you observe, the razor I am using at present takes to you first rate. I bought it for fifty cents off a man whom it didn't like. It's a good one, and, though I should hate to part with it, I might let it go to you, sir, for $5. The handle's broken, but you could easily have another put on, and it wouldn't cost so much. Did you say 'tonic?' Your hair's getting a trifle thin on top."

"Thanks, no," replied the customer.

"I've been thirty years in the business," went on the barber, accompanying his words with a brief shampoo, "and what I don't know about the ways of razors isn't worth knowing. There was something the professor I was speaking about told me, however, that I hadn't heard before, though I don't guarantee that it is correct, mind you. What he said was that the edge of a cold razor, seen through a microscope, was a wavy line, but when the blade was plunged into hot water the steel expanded and the edge was made straight, like a string drawn taut, and that was the reason why it was a good thing in cold weather to dip your razor into hot wa-know about the ways of razors isn't worth knowing. There was something the professor I was speaking about told me, however, that I hadn't heard before, though I don't guarantee that it is correct, mind you. What he said was that the edge of a cold razor, seen through a microscope, was a wavy line, but when the blade was plunged into hot water the steel expanded and the edge was made straight, like a string drawn taut, and that was the reason why it was a good thing in cold weather to dip your razor into hot water, so as to make shaving easier, as of course it would be, with a straight edge than with a crooked one.

"It's a funny thing about a razor that buying one is always a perfect gamble, even for an expert. A first rate blade is an accident, and often a fifty cent razor will be better than another for $2. You see razors have to be hand made from beginning to end and the most skillful workman can't be sure of getting two just alike. It is in the 'temper drawing' process that the quality of the razor is determined. Laid upon a plate of hot sand the blade changes gradually from a light yellow to a dark straw color, and it is by this color that the workman must judge of the degree of temper. If it is a shade too light the steel will be too soft, if a shade too dark it will be too hard and will crumble. So it happens that razors of the same brand always vary and a really fine one is a prize.

"But no man can tell a good one when he goes to buy with any certainty unless he is given an opportunity to try it on a hone. In that case if he is an expert he can judge. Ninety per cent. of all the razors used in this country are made in England, though dealers have put their own names on them. I should advise any man who shaves himself to have a razor for each day in the week. Then no one of the seven will ever get tired, and if they are all honed once a year it will be enough. The chief trouble with beginners at shaving is that they don't know how to strop their razors. If they would get some one that knew how to show them that, and always have their lather thick and rub it in well, they would be saved a great deal of distress. Next!"—Washington Star.

Onions Instead of Quinine.

One day I was taken with chills and headache, signs that my old enemy, malaria, was on hand. My quinine box was empty, and I was looking forward to a restless, sleepless night. In desperation I peeled a raw onion and slowly ate it, and then went to bed, with warm feet and an extra comforter, when, presto! I was asleep in five minutes, and awakened in the morning free from malaria and ready for the day's duties.

Our homely but strong friend will be appreciated in time as a medicine, and if agriculturists would turn their attention to raising a model onion, with the strong scent taken out that taints the breath so unpleasantly, families will be putting their "pills" in the cellar by the barrel and the doctors would take to onion farming. The onion acts as a cathartic and diuretic, and may help to break up a cold or lessen the bad symptoms. Said a doctor: "I always store a barrel of onions in my cellar during the fall. We have them cooked twice a week, and whoever of the family is threatened with a cold eats some onion raw. If this vegetable were generally eaten there would be no diphtheria, rheumatism, gout, kidney or stomach trouble.

"But bless you! the young men and women are afraid to eat them. One young man went so far as to say to me: 'If my wife ate onions I would get a bill of divorce.'"—American Garden.

Disraeli's Advice.

The late Col. Tomline, member of parliament, who, by the way, was one of the richest men in England, had not a very high opinion of his colleague, Disraeli. "Disraeli told me," he once remarked, "that flattery was the secret of his success in life. The higher a man climbed," he said, "the higher it could be laid on, until, if one could approach the throne, it might be laid on with a trowel." The gentleman to whom this was narrated by the colonel remarked that Disraeli once gave a capital piece of advice, namely, that scandal should never be replied to, but lived down. "Yes, I know," said the colonel, with a cynical smile, "that was my thunder. I remember him writing it down when I said it, and I thought at the time he was putting his pet theory into practice."—London Letter.

About Hair Restorers.

I suppose every barber, at some time in his life, tries his hand on a remedy for baldness. I have, and I've made a failure of all my tonics. I don't believe that there is anything in the world that will put back lost hair on a man's head. But I can tell the man who is anxious about the hair he has how to keep it on his head. He must stop eating greasy food and confine himself to a diet with very little fat in it. If he does that his hair will not only not fall out, but it will return if he loses it by illness. A different rule seems to apply to the hair of the beard and mustache. If the constitution is in good order the hair roots of the face are very vigorous. The hair of the mustache may be pulled out, but it will return again in a short time, and the same thing is true of the beard.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Dear mother, where is your girl to-night?

Confidence Between Mother and Daughter.

There is no relation more beautiful than that which may exist between mother and daughter. The mother can completely control the tastes of the child, if she first proves worthy of her trust and confidence; and there is no one to whom a child would rather confide her secrets than to such a mother. By no means should the confidence be all on one side. The mother, too, should have her secrets which she can intrust to the youthful ears.

Make your daughter feel that she is necessary to the comfort and happiness of the family and tell her how greatly she is missed when absent. Ask her advice, sometimes, and follow it as far as possible; it will make her very happy to know that, at last, she is getting old enough to be a real help to mother. She will begin to cultivate her tastes, taking you as a model, so that she may the more readily offer suggestions in the future. Unconsciously she will adopt your ideal as her own, and when that point is reached, there is no knowing to what extent she will ever after trust your advice.

I know a family where the daughter is now a young woman of excellent judgement. She has always been the confidante and "chum" of her mother who is her dearest and most intimate friend. In the same family the boys also feel that nearness and love toward mother.

It is well to give a daughter something which she may call her own, and that will bring in spending money, as well as to give it to the son. She should be made to feel that she is not dependent, but that her share in the work entitles her to a share in the profits.

A family I have in mind raises a great number of chickens every year. One year the mother tends to them and has the proceeds. Next year the daughter has them and so on, each person doing whatever he pleases with the earnings. But let me say here, it always goes for a "family present,"—something to gladden each member of the household.

I know instances where the daughter would be far better off had the mother no influence whatever over her. Shame, that such a state of affafrs should exist! The mother seems as greatly pleased over the daughter's success in catching fortnightly beaux, as other mothers feel when their daughters receive prizes for efficient work in school. They proudly exhibit the packet of love letters the daughter as received in one week—not from one, but from half a dozen young men!

How careful we shouid be as to the company our daughters keep! Look out upon the street of any town, from about sundown till nine o'clock, often later, and what do we see? Young girls, dressed in their best, walking two and two, or in groups, up one street and down another, or standing chatting with some youth upon a street corner. These are all somebody's daughters. Are they yours? Perhaps some mothers will ask, "What harm, so long as there are other girls with her?" Ah, yes! But who are the other girls, and for what purpose do they walk there, anyway? Usually for a chance conversation with some young man, or for looks of admiration from those who can not find an excuse to talk.

Do you suppose these daughters are the confidential companions of their mothers, or that they repeat to them even half of the conversation which passes between them and their girl friends, or between them and their favorite young men?

For some reason there is a sad lack in child training nowadays; we need more of the Spartan discipline. Where does the trouble lie? Mostly, I believe, in the mother's failure to secure the loving confidence of her child.

The mother, like the American people generally, is in too much of a hurry. At the time when the future looks so large and mysterious, when there are a thousand questions arising in the daughter's mind which she wishes someone could answer, and she hardly knows that she is stepping from childhood into a new sphere, who is better fitted to settle all the doubts, answer the questions, and point out the beauties of a pure and perfect womanhood, than mother?

If you have not previously secured your daughters confidence, however, be sure that it will not be given you then; for her timidity and bashfulness will be greater at that time than ever before. If she does not go to you, she gathers a little information from one young friend a little more from another, and very likely none of it correct, and much of it harmful; but it helps to form that character, which, at that age, grows more stable and life-lasting.

Half of the girls we meet to-day between the ages of thirteen and seventeen, are going out in company without either mother or father accompanying them. Either they go alone, or with a young girl or young man as easily influenced as themselves. These young people have an idea that their parents are growing old and are of a different generation from themselves, and therefore they neither understand nor sympathize with them; so they seek suggestions from those whom they think will coincide with their views, and with the times generally. To get married early, is often their chief aim; "for what" they say, "is more disagreeable than an old maid!"

This reminds me of the last verse of a poem I read long ago and which, I think, forms the foundation of too many girl-marriages.

"And now I'm in haste for my wedding,
I'm in earnest and can't be denied;
'Twill be such a beautiful romance,
To be called 'the little girl bride.'"

But soon the "little girl bride" grows into a heart-sore, discontented mother who vainly questions "why didn't mother teach me to wait until I was old enough to understand what marriage means?"

What nobler calling than that of wife and mother! But how sad when the mother is but a child herself and wholly unfit for the care of God's pure blossoms.

Dear mother, where is your girl to-night? Is she bound up in your love and influence, and is that influence born of God? If not, then do not blame her if, some day, she brings shame upon your family name.

MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER.

The Author of "Proverbial Philosophy," Who Died Recently.

Martin Farquhar Tupper, who died recently in England, lived to discover that, after all, he had only caught the public attention for the hour. Fifty years ago he was in love with his cousin, who became his wife, and it occurred to him to write out his notions on matrimony. It occurred to him to put them in the form of Solomon's proverbs. He extended them to include love, friendship and education. When published they commended themselves to the people of that day, and Tupper suddenly found himself famous. N. P. Willis, who then edited The Home Journal, got hold of a copy and supposed the work was something antique. He quoted it frequently in his journal, and this largely contributed to Tupper's reputation in America.

While Tupper wrote nothing else that became widely known, his "Proverbial Philosophy" gave him a fine position in literary circles, and he lived to a good old age enjoying the friendship of many eminent persons. He went to school with Gladstone and Thackeray. A number of his schoolfellows, including Gladstone, Lord Elgin and others, formed themselves into a social club, which, in honor of its founder, Gladstone, was called the "W. E. G."

MARTIN F. TUPPER.

Mr. Tupper was in America in 1851. That was the time Jenny Lind set every one wild all over the United States. Tupper called on Barnum, who introduced him to the songstress. She told the author how much she had enjoyed his "Proverbial Philosophy." Daniel Webster, Tupper afterwards spoke of as a "colossal, unhappy, feeble browed, dark, angel looking sort of man, with a depth for good and evil in his eye unfathomable." Mr. Tupper made another visit to America in 1876, when he received much attention, as before.

His first work was a volume of poems called "Geraldine and Other Poems," and his second the "Proverbial Philosophy." Afterwards he wrote plays and more poems, but he was destined not to catch the popular fancy but once.

Mr. Tupper was born in London in 1810. Consequently he was 79 years old when he died.

MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER.

The Author of "Proverbial Philosophy," Who Died Recently.

Martin Farquhar Tupper, who died recently in England, lived to discover that, after all, he had only caught the public attention for the hour. Fifty years ago he was in love with his cousin, who became his wife, and it occurred to him to write out his notions on matrimony. It occurred to him to put them in the form of Solomon's proverbs. He extended them to include love, friendship and education. When published they commended themselves to the people of that day, and Tupper suddenly found himself famous. N. P. Willis, who then edited The Home Journal, got hold of a copy and supposed the work was something antique. He quoted it frequently in his journal, and this largely contributed to Tupper's reputation in America.

While Tupper wrote nothing else that became widely known, his "Proverbial Philosophy" gave him a fine position in literary circles, and he lived to a good old age enjoying the friendship of many eminent persons. He went to school with Gladstone and Thackeray. A number of his schoolfellows, including Gladstone, Lord Elgin and others, formed themselves into a social club, which, in honor of its founder, Gladstone, was called the "W. E. G."

MARTIN F. TUPPER.

Mr. Tupper was in America in 1851. That was the time Jenny Lind set every one wild all over the United States. Tupper called on Barnum, who introduced him to the songstress. She told the author how much she had enjoyed his "Proverbial Philosophy." Daniel Webster, Tupper afterwards spoke of as a "colossal, unhappy, feeble browed, dark, angel looking sort of man, with a depth for good and evil in his eye unfathomable." Mr. Tupper made another visit to America in 1876, when he received much attention, as before.

His first work was a volume of poems called "Geraldine and Other Poems," and his second the "Proverbial Philosophy." Afterwards he wrote plays and more poems, but he was destined not to catch the popular fancy but once.

Mr. Tupper was born in London in 1810. Consequently he was 79 years old when he died.

A Moneyless Christmas.

A Christmas without spending money! Midwinter holidays without dolls or picture books, tops, toy cannon or jumping jacks, colored candies or any "store presents" of any kind whatsoever! Christ's nativity celebrated without a Christmas tree or a Christmas carol or a gathering of the children—no evergreen shrub sparkling with glass, no Santa Claus and no pantomime. Could such a thing be in a Christian land?

Yea, verily.

And it is not so very long ago that just such a Christmas was the rule in three-fourths of the United States—nay, it is the rule now in considerable sections where there are no large towns. So easily do we get accustomed to what is, and so naturally do children believe that the system they first noticed has always been the system, that most people do not know, and even the older ones are forgetting, that the Christmas of today is comparatively a new thing.

But what was the old time Christmas, and with what sights and sounds was it ushered in? Well, in the first place, it was—in all the rural regions at any rate—a time when no money could be "wasted." Children must have their fun without extra expense, save as each child had carefully saved his pennies. As to deliberately handing out a half dollar to a boy for Christmas—the average father would as soon have thought of giving him a deed for the farm. It was a season for rabbit hunting and sledding if there was snow enough, and for sliding if there was ice, for a good dinner and an extra piece of pie, and then perhaps, for some home made presents.

A little later toys began to come in—say about 1850—in the central west, and such toys! Blocky horses, square cornered cows, dogs made of clay and burnt black in the fire, and so forth and so forth; a collection of them now would throw a group of children into convulsions of laughter. Be it remembered that less than fifty years ago Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis were the only cities really known to the great mass of people living west of Ohio and north of Tennessee, and nine-tenths of the people under 20 years of age had never seen a city of 10,000 inhabitants. And in those days rural America celebrated Christmas literally without money and without (cash) price.

Plenty of people who do not like to be called old can recall the time when, in all the book stores of the rural regions, only two or three kinds of "story books" could be found, and as to holiday books and holiday goods as such—well, they could be found in the cities, probably, but not one child in a hundred, taking the country through, ever saw one of them.

The Empress of Germany.

AUGUSTA VICTORIA.

Here is a picture, from a recent photograph, of Augusta Victoria, empress of Germany. She is, it will be seen, a woman of truly regal presence.

The Use of Furs.

Furs are much used as trimmings on every garment where they can be put, even to under petticoats. Many of these are made of eiderdown flannel with an eight inch border of coney around the bottom. Tea gowns have long bands of fluffy fur. Wraps have every kind imaginable, and many that I should never think of. Dress skirts and waists have bits and bands here and there, and if it keeps on the women might as well turn into cats entirely and be done with it.—Fashion Letter.

What Puzzled Willie.

Little Willie has been summarily corrected by his mother for repeated acts of naughtiness. The punishment being over, "Papa," he sobs, in tones of anguish, "how could you marry such an ill tempered woman as mamma?"—Newport News.

Imitation Overgaiters.

Among pretty street boots are the imitation overgaiters for young women and misses. The foxings are of fine calf, goat or kid, and the tops or gaiter parts of cloth or undressed kid. They have the semblance of a binding. A strap passes under the hollow of the foot, with a buckle on the outside. A casual observer would not notice but what they are what they seem. But while they are stylish they will hardly be affected by women who do not change their footwear often, for they would tire of the sameness.—Shoe and Leather Facts

MISS MARTHA SOUCARET,

1st Prize Winner at the Great Beauty Competition at Spa

The above is said to be a most correct picture of Miss Martha Soucaret, the winner of the first prize in the Great Beauty Competition which took place recently at the famous watering resort, Spa. Miss Soucaret is described as being a brunette of rare beauty, with brilliant black eyes. She is tall and queenly looking, her very appearance commanding attention and respect. The competition was very keen, some of the most famous beauties in Europe being in the list, but the beautiful young lady whose picture we publish carried off first honors with flying colors.

LAST TESTAMENTS.

THE STRANGE FANCIES WHICH FIND EXPRESSION IN THEM.

Something About Mills of Olden Times. Stacks of Such Documents in Somerset House—The First Mill and Awful Fate of Its Maker.

The many little whimsicalities which crop out in human nature as the hour of final dissolution draws near are equally as unaccountable as the other peculiarities—every one is distinctively peculiar in his way—for which he or she was noted "when the pulse beat high with life," and death was last in thought.

Any one will attest to the truth of this who has ever had the pleasure—it is a real pleasure to one with a taste for things out of the ordinary—of examining musty old rolls of quaint and curious testamentary documents. The many oddities found in "last dispose of it in any way they saw fit. Some writers believe that the "Twelve Table Laws" were the foundation upon which all old Roman wills rest. These laws were enacted between 400 and 500 years before the time of the Saviour, as mentioned above, where allusion is first made to ancient Roman wills.

In some respects these old time documents are surprisingly like those of modern date, the laws respecting their final administration were very similar. At the present time if a maker of a will is drunk, insane or unduly influenced at the time the document is signed, it is void and without effect. The ancient Romans had precisely the same provisions with others added, one of which did not allow a deaf and dumb person the privilege of disposing of his realty or chattels.

Augustus Cæsar was the first millionaire to dispose of his property through the instrumentality of a will.

The custom of disposing of property through wills was carried west into Britain by the Romans, and prevailed until the time of the conquest, when stringent laws were passed making it all but impossible for the landed interests to get outside a certain circle, the leaders of which soon become lords solution draws near are equally as unaccountable as the other peculiarities—every one is distinctively peculiar in his way—for which he or she was noted "when the pulse beat high with life," and death was last in thought.

Any one will attest to the truth of this who has ever had the pleasure—it is a real pleasure to one with a taste for things out of the ordinary—of examining musty old rolls of quaint and curious testamentary documents. The many oddities found in "last wills and testaments," cannot with any assurance of infallibility be taken as an index or criterion to the real character of the person whose signature is attached thereto. One may pursue the even tenor of his way and live out the afternoon, the twilight and the shady evening of a long life, and at last plunge into darkness which follows it at its close, respected for his sagacity, his good sense and good management, with provisions in his will which, had they been given ante-mortem instead of post-mortem publicity, would have been the cause of his last days being sper within the precincts of some insane asylum.

SOME STRANGE CASES.

These thoughts have been suggested primarily by recent events, some remarkable specimens of testamentary curios having quite lately been made public. I refer to the Nashville, Tenn., woman who left $6,000 to her two dogs as beneficiaries; to the Columbus, S. C., man who left a vast estate of 8,000 acres tied up in such a shape that it cannot possibly benefit the persons for whom intended before the year 1989, and the Wabash, Ind., woman who requested that her heart be removed from the body, and that her hands and feet be amputated and together be sent to and buried in France, the scenes of her childhood days, while the mutilated body was to be consigned to mother earth near her late home in the Hoosier state.

With these three extraordinary documents as a text, I propose to trace the origin of will making, and consider the most uncommon provisions in the hundreds of testamentary rarities which have gone on record since the first property owner wrote: "I hereby will and bequeath."

The father of all wills and the most ancient document of its kind known to the historian and the antiquarian, is that of "the great king," Sennacherib, mentioned so frequently in the Scriptures by Herodotus and by Josephus. Sennacherib lived and reigned between the years 702 and 680 B. C.—over 2,500 years ago. In the will, which was found by excavators on the site of the royal library, the "great invincible" wills his sons certain "stores of precious things" at that time on deposit in the Temple of Nebo. It is a sad commentary on the crude civilization of the times that these same sons should so far forget their filial duties as to assassinate their considerate parent while he was busily engaged in worshiping his favorite god.

The Romans, 400 or 500 years before the birth of Christ, adopted the plan of setting forth, before taking their departure for the unknown world, their wishes as to what disposition should be made of the treasures accumulated during an aggressive lifetime. These instruments, which were written by the testators upon skins and parchment, were kept in the Temple of Vesta, the senior priestess having special charge of all such documents. Under the oldest of English laws regarding will making an infant—any one under the age of 21 years is supposed to be an infant in English law—was, and is even to this day, debarred from bequeathing property. The old Roman laws, before the time of Christ, were more liberal. According to the code of these ancient times a male who had arrived at the age of 15 years, or a female who had only passed her fourteenth summer, could, if they had amassed property, a good deal like unto person the privilege of disposing of his realty or chattels.

Augustus Cæsar was the first millionaire to dispose of his property through the instrumentality of a will.

The custom of disposing of property through wills was carried west into Britain by the Romans, and prevailed until the time of the conquest, when stringent laws were passed making it all but impossible for the landed interests to get outside a certain circle, the leaders of which soon become lords and noblemen. In the 200 or 300 years which followed in the wake of the conqueror the will making custom was almost lost sight of. It was revived, however, about the time of Edward V, and has since remained a recognized institution. One of the grandest treats incident to a visit to London is a day at Somerset House, the English Temple of Vesta, the place where London wills are stored. As an historical institution this will repository is a good second in point of interest to the British Museum itself. All the wills which have been made in London since the latter part of the Fifteenth century are now reposing upon its many shelves. They number thousands upon thousands, so many indeed, it is said, that were they pasted together end to end they would girdle the entire globe with a paper belt.

Charles V, the monastical watch collector, made a will in which he left his watches and rich tapestries to the monastery where he ended his days. Other famous historical personages have similarly disposed of their realty and personal property. At Somerset house the will of the immortal Shakespeare, the one in which he bequeaths his best bed and bedding to his wife, rests beside those of Johnson, the dictionary maker, Sir Isaac Newton, Van Dyke, and those of Wellington, "the iron duke," and Nelson, the hero of Trafalgar. Of the hundreds of other wills of greater or less historical interest, crowded at the rates of 12,000 to 15,000 per year into this paper Pantheon, space forbids mention, as a step outside the above named immortals would only open the floodgates for an avalanche of names, each of interest to some particular reader.—John W. Wright in St. Louis Republic.

Interesting Engineering Feat.

The method of constructing the foundations of the great drawbridge over the Thames at New London is of exceptional interest. Timber curbs were constructed, which were sunk eighty feet into the bed of the river, the bottom of which was soft mud for this depth. The mud inside the curb was excavated, and the piles driven into the solid ground then obtained. The heads of these piles were then bound together with concrete, on which the masonry of the pier was finally erected.—Exchange.

WHO WILL BE SPEAKER?

REED, M'KINLEY, BURROWS, CANNON, HENDERSON AND BUTTERWORTH.

Some Points of Interest About Six Congressmen Who Are Already Prominent.

There is a marshaling of followers of the candidates for speaker of the United States house of representatives. The battalions of Reed, Burrows, Cannon, Butterworth, Henderson, McKinley and others who have been spoken of less prominently, are furbishing up their accoutrements preparatory to inspection by their chiefs. Will the contest be short, sharp and decisive, or will it drag along for weeks? Since the memorable struggle thirty-four years ago, which resulted in the election of N. P. Banks, the people have occasionally looked forward to something similar at the approach of a balloting for speaker. But until there is a division of parties, such as existed in the "fifties," it is not likely that there will be another such prolonged deadlock.

In politics the men who are familiarly called "Joe" or "Bob" or "Dan," generally seem to have a strength behind them that their more dignified competitors do not possess. At least, it is of a different kind. "Tom" Reed is looked upon as the candidate for the speakership, having, perhaps, the best chance for winning the race. Maine seems to be as good a soil for growing big brainy men as big pine trees. At any rate Tom Reed is a Maine man, and has some of the faculty of that other man of Maine, James G. Blaine, for winning stanch supporters.

Reed is a fighter. He hits hard with his harsh voice and biting satire. This, of course, has gained him plenty of enemies in the party he opposes, but it only makes him more popular with the men in his own ranks. Indeed, he gath-house to his heart, while he stands looking at them with his beautiful blue eyes.

Burrows is hearty enough toward those with whom he is familiar, but with strangers he is dignified. He is one of the soldiers of the house.

Then comes Uncle Joe Cannon—original and humorous. He doesn't want to be considered a dignified solon, and he isn't. His style of oratory is as different from the stately sentences of Daniel Webster as is that of a street preacher. When he wants to say anything to the members of the house he talks to them. He rushes about while speaking, gesticulating wildly and taking up the most familiar positions. But Uncle Joe is no fool; indeed he is a very cunning politician.

"JOE" CANNON.

And Joe Cannon has a wife who wil help him immensely in his race for the speakership, for she is an excellent hand at making friends.

Joe Cannon looks like a country deacon or a justice of the peace. He is long and gaunt and wears chin whiskers as Abe Lincoln used to wear them.

Another candidate belongs to that class who have the short given name. He is "Ben" Butterworth, of Ohio. Yet it is said that he is not a candidate. There are possibilities in his case, however. He is said to be the most popular man in the house, taking both parties into consideration. He has a superabundance of good nature, and is very ready in debate. He also has the faculty of unhorsing his adversary on so soft a sod that he does not suffer trom the fall or treasure bad feeling.

"BEN" BUTTERWORTH.

Among the candidates is the one legged soldier, Gen. David B. Henderson. He is a Scotchman by birth, and that sturdy race are not prone to give things up with over readiness. Indeed, this trait is evident in the general, for having been driven out of "the service" in 1863 by the loss of a leg, he went back on horseback at the head of a regiment to fight it out till 1865, when there was nothing more to fight for. He is a Grand Army man, who believes fully in pensions for soldiers. Though has gained him plenty of enemies in the party he opposes, but it only makes him more popular with the men in his own ranks. Indeed, he gathered in the reins as leader of his party in the house because of his right of possession by force and not by persuasion. Here is a sample of Reed's thrusts:

One day Representative Taulbee was speaking. Reed listened for awhile attentively, and at last said, in a stage whisper:

"What a pity! What a pity!"

Being pressed by some of his immediate neighbors to state the object of his sympathy, he quietly observed, with inimitable drollery and a malicious twinkle in his eye:

"I was meditating upon the magnificent proportions of that robust thorax, and thinking how sad it was that heaven had not made any mind to supplement and bear it company."

Reed's tribute to Logan while Gen. Logan was still alive is on a par with this:

"I like Logan," he said, "because he is so damned human."

Reed is a high protectionist to the point of rabidness. The late Larry Jerome took advantage of his knowledge of this fact to perpetrate one of his practical jokes at the annual dinner of the Philadelphia Clover club two years ago. Jerome, although himself a protectionist and although politics is never discussed at the club's board, when introduced made a violent free trade speech in the most serious manner. Reed could not contain himself. Springing to his feet he loudly denounced the utterances. The company laughed, and when the situation was quietly explained to the eloquent congressman he only gesticulated more wildly and shouted: "Not even under the guise of the motley will I hear the sacred doctrine of protection attacked." Then the club shouted. It was one hour before Reed regained his good humor.

Among the rivals of the Maine man is the diplomatic Julius Cæsar Burrows. He is a blonde, handsome man, with a fine physique and an excellent voice. He is no orator as Brutus is; or, rather, Tom Reed; he has the subtle persuasive charm of Mark Antony. It is not often that men try to lead men with a smile. They usually reserve that delicate method for women, but Mr. Burrows charms the house with his smile. A great deal has been said about this smile, which is a peculiarly attractive one, such as no one else can imitate. It is gentle and confidential and winning. With it the speaker takes the whole ment to fight it out till 1865, when there was nothing more to fight for. He is a Grand Army man, who believes fully in pensions for soldiers. Though radical he has a pleasant way with him, frank and outspoken, which makes him very popular. Gen. Henderson is now very near 50 years of age.

D. B. HENDERSON.

Last and one of the greatest comes Maj. McKinley—Napoleon McKinley he is sometimes called, from his resemblance to France's first emperor. Of all the candidates, McKinley had the main following at the last Republican convention in which Harrison was nominated. His personal appearance has been thus described: "His face in repose suggests at once Tom Keene and Daniel Webster. The profile is clear in its cutting, like Keene's, and the dark eyes are seen in the shadow that is so cavernous in the portraits of 'Black Dan.' There is little color in McKinley's face, and that white complexion contrasting with the shade about the eyes gives him the appearance of a man under some heavy nervous strain.

"When he is speaking his eyes are quick, nervous, apprehensive. The muscles of the face show like those of a comedian's in daylight, and they twitch. Some startling thought invades the mind of this wide awake Ohioan and the clean cut lips respond immediately with an alertive play and then shut tighter and more bloodless in their watchfulness of the secret. His voice is rather higher than one would expect from a man of his type, but it is not unpleasant in its pitch. McKinley is not particularly demonstrative in his address, but conveys an impression of reserved force."

WILLIAM M'KINLEY.

McKinley is still quite young for a man who aspires to the speakership, being not yet 46 years old. He went into the military service at 17, coming out brevet major at 21. He differs from most of his competitors in his dignity and reserve. He is not a frequent speaker, but when he speaks he produces a powerful effect. He won his present position with his party by his skillful handling of the tariff question. His great dignity is largely in his favor, since if there is any one trait becoming a presiding officer it is this.

It is generally conceded that of all the candidates Reed and McKinley are the strongest. As they are both strong men, perhaps they may deadlock each other, and both have to give way to some of their less prominent competitors.

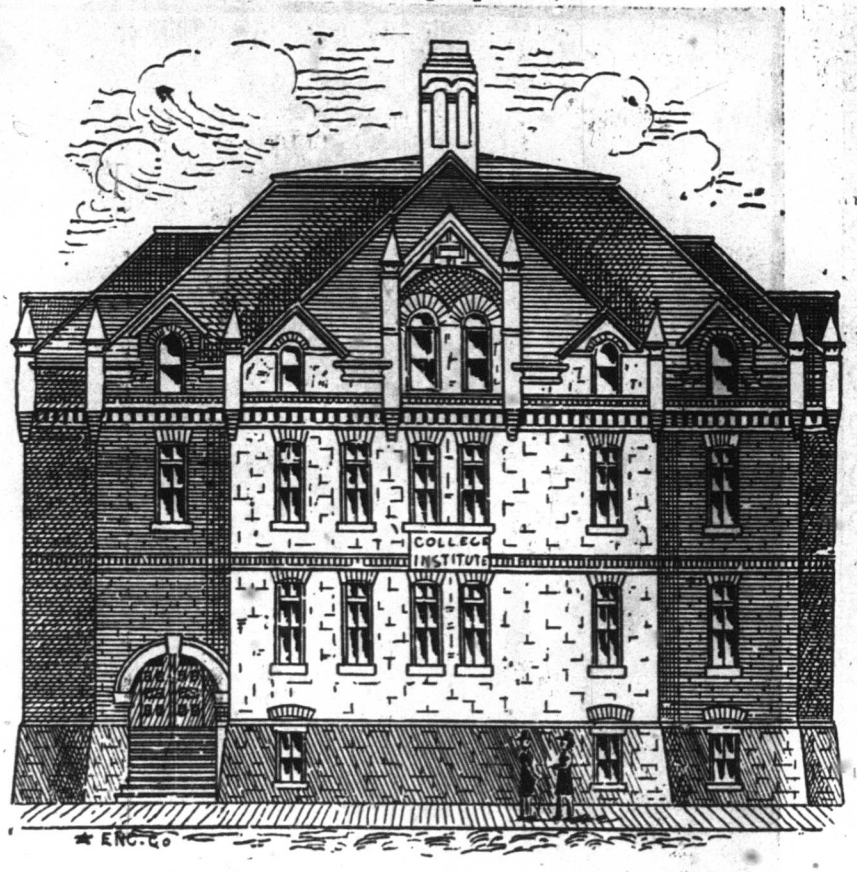
A year ago we published a cut of the proposed Collegiate Institute. To-day we re-publish the same cut, but we are able to call it not the proposed, but the ACTUAL



New Collegiate Institute.

—:o:—

The attendance at our High School has increased more than four-fold during the last nine years. This growth has been regular and natural. No effort has been made to attract pupils beyond so carrying on the work of the School that those anxious to learn would appreciate its advantages. Moreover for three years the old building has been so overcrowded that those from other Counties seeking admission, and there have been many, have been refused.

The Citizens of Napanee when asked by the Board of Education to raise money necessary to erect a new and perfect High School building, responded with wonderful unanimity, meeting the School Board fully half way in their efforts to make Napanee an educational centre and to place our town in a position to receive a good share of the Provincial grant for secondary Education.

The new building is being constructed from plans prepared by an Architect who has made school buildings a speciality, and it is to be furnished with the most perfect system of heating and ventilation known. It is certain that in all Ontario, though there are larger and more expensive schools, there is not one more perfect, and only two or three as perfect, as our new Collegiate Institute will be.

Easily Accounted For.

"Young Naturalist" writes: "Do you think the dog is losing his sagacity? If not, how do you account for the fact that we have fewer narratives and incidents of wonderful displays of human intelligence on the part of dogs nowadays than formerly?" Oh, it isn't the fault of the dog at all; he's just as bright and intelligent as ever he was; more intelligent, we should say, as he is better trained and taught. But people don't lie so recklessly about such matters as they formerly did. The railway has reformed the country in that respect. It used to be that a man could tell a story that would make an iron lamp post cringe about a dog his uncle owned out in Ochiltree county, and he was safe, because nobody could get there in a life time. But now, a man can jump on a train and go anywhere in a week, and find out all about everything in two days after he gets there. So, even people who are not naturally truthful have to restrain their imaginations because there is no safe place to locate the dog if you make him too remarkable. You notice that most of our remarkable dogs and snakes, etc., are located in the most inaccessible places.

The snake editor of this paper, for instance, who was engaged away back in Stanley Huntley's time, was secured in the first place as geographical editor, and it was later on that it occurred to the manager to utilize his intimate knowledge of remote places in the compilation of interesting facts and stories in natural history. Don't you notice that every year the Smithsonian institute sends the curator away to all manner of wild, unheard of places that nobody else ever thought of to gather up a lot of new material? And whenever the scientific men want to observe the transit of Venus, or an equatorial eclipse of the sun, or anything of that sort, they never stay at home, as the rest of us do, and take in the scene through a piece of smoked glass; no, they go away from home some nine or ten thousand miles, with no end of things that a layman doesn't know how to look through. Then when they come home; my, my! The things they have seen! Dear, dear! H'm? Am I a scientist? Well, in some things I am; I have a little smattering of science, yes. I know how to fix up a report so's to make your hair curl.—Burdette in Brooklyn Eagle.

A Mean Reporter.

Several years ago, when W. K. Sullivan, now managing editor of The Journal, was a reporter on The Tribune, he was sent up to Evanston to do the college commencement exercises. When he had written up the afternoon session he took it to the telegraph office and incidentally remarked to the operator that he would have some more stuff to send in the evening about 9:30 or 10 o'clock. The operator informed Mr. Sullivan that the office would be closed at that time, and he could not send any message. Mr. Sullivan said that what he desired to send would be important matter for his paper, and asked the dignified young man why he could not be there to receive it. The reply was that he was going to a ball with his girl that night and he did not propose to give it up for the paper, the college or for anything else. Mr. Sullivan endeavored to argue the point with him, but the young fellow would listen to nothing.

Finally Mr. Sullivan asked in a mock humbleness if he could send a message then, and as permission was granted he took a blank and wrote: "Anson Stager, Western Union telegraph office, Chicago: A reporter for The Tribune will have about a column of important matter to send to his paper this evening about half past 9 or 10 o'clock; your operator here says he cannot possibly be here at that time to receive it as he is going to a ball with his girl. Will you please send a special man

The new building is being constructed from plans prepared by an Architect who has made school buildings a speciality, and it is to be furnished with the most perfect system of heating and ventilation known. It is certain that in all Ontario, though there are larger and more expensive schools, there is not one more perfect, and only two or three as perfect, as our new Collegiate Institute will be.

Accomodation will be provided for three hundred pupils, about one hundred more than attending at present, and it is not unlikely that it will soon be fully utilized. The people of this Town and County are awake to the necessity of providing their children with at least as good an education as those with whom they must compete in after life, and they realize that a thorough High School training is of no less advantage to a farmer or an artizan than to a doctor or a lawyer.

Napanee, a healthy and quiet market town, is the best possible situation for a good High School, and the School Board and the High School staff are determined that in its new quarters, which will be ready for occupation early in 1890, our High School shall achieve a success far beyond anything in the past.

With our present Head Master, who has won a Provincial reputation and stands at the top of his profession, and an experienced staff, carerully seclected with a regard for special qualifications for Collegiate Institute work, the people of Napanee feel warranted in confidently inviting the attention of the public to the superior facilities for secondary education which the Town affords.

Finally Mr. Sullivan asked in a mock humbleness if he could send a message then, and as permission was granted he took a blank and wrote: "Anson Stager, Western Union telegraph office, Chicago: A reporter for The Tribune will have about a column of important matter to send to his paper this evening about half past 9 or 10 o'clock; your operator here says he cannot possibly be here at that time to receive it as he is going to a ball with his girl. Will you please send a special man up here to take the message?" To this he signed his name and handed it in. As the young man read it he turned all sorts of colors and, seeing that he was beaten, laid it down and said sadly, "I will be here." Reporters do not enjoy being hard hearted, but the exigencies of this case in the first place and the lofty air of this young man called out all the flintiness in Mr. Sullivan's nature. —Chicago Tribune.

Obstinate Children.

A friend once told me how, when a child, she was one day kept without food, and sent to bed hungry and exhausted, for not reciting some lines by heart, the punishment being inflicted on the supposition that she was willfully obstinate. She said that she does not now think herself to have been naturally obstinate, speaking generally; and, in this particular instance, she added: "But what no one knew then, and what I know as the fact, was that after refusing to do what was required, and bearing anger and threats in consequence, I lost the power to do it. I became stone. The will was petrified, and I absolutely could not comply." She expressed the conviction that the obstinacy was not in the mind, but on the nerves, and that what we call obstinacy in children, and in grown people, too, is often something of this kind, and that it may be increased by mismanagement or persistence, or what is called firmness in the controlling power, into disease or something near to it.—Dorothea in Ladies' Home Journal.

Chy Hoang Ty's Fatuous Freak.

Chy Hoang Ty, whose name signified the first emperor, and who rendered himself forever famous by the erection of the great Chinese wall, which has now stood for 2,000 years, by another act became entitled to quite a different species of fame. He ordered that all the books of the learned people, including the works of Confucius, should be cast into the flames. Many of the volumes, of course, escaped this fate, through the zeal of those who cultivated learning, but it is said that upwards of 400 persons who tried to evade or oppose the order were burned together with the books they had wished to save. An eminent authority in speaking of the act says: "It is not easy to explain the fantastic wickedness of such an act on any common principles, but one reason alleged for it is the jealousy that this foolish emperor entertained for the fame of his progenitors, and the wish he indulged that posterity should hear of none before himself."—Exchange.

Curing a Hiccough.

Mr. Smithkin had heard that a sure cure for a hiccough was a severe fright. One evening, smoking at his fireside after supper, he was taken with a hiccough, which continued in spite of all his efforts to check it.

Presently he got up suddenly from his chair, and called out in alarm to Mrs. Smithkin:

"I've lost my watch! I've lost my watch!"

Mrs. Smithkin hastened into the room.

"John Smithkin!" she said, "what do you mean?" Why, you haint done any such thing. Here's your watch all right, in your vest pocket."

"Don't you think I know that?" said Mr. Smithkin. "I was jest giving myself a severe fright, you know, to stop the hiccoughs!"—Youth's Companion.

THE EPISTOLARY CRANK.

FUNNY THINGS FOUND IN THE MAIL OF TWO PUBLIC MEN.

Letters Received by the Manager of the St. Louis Exposition—The Mayor of That City Gets His Share of the Same Kind. Specimens from Each Batch.

"The heads of public institutions are targets for all the cranks and queers of the country to shoot their pellets at," said Manager George Mills, of the St. Louis exposition, after examining a bushel or more of letters. "Some of these should be preserved in alcohol—here's one, for instance," and he handed the following to a reporter:

WANTS A MILLION FOR IT.

ALLEN, ALLEGANY COUNTY, N. Y.

St. Louis Exposition Director:

DEAR SIR—I learn you have got a big show in your city that handles everything. I have a natural curiosity that would draw big. I have offered it to a number of museums, but they would not pay what I want for it; I heard you folks give more for attractions than anybody else, and I want to know what you can give. I'd bet my franchise there ain't another one like it, nor half as good. What is it? I'll like some to tell me, but I'll tell you what it's like.

Last spring I felled a hollow butted beech tree, and splitting the butt rail cut I found the center filled, from about two feet above the ground, with something that looked like flesh, and which I parted from the inside of the hollow with some difficulty, as it seemed to be sort of grown to the wood. The thing was somewhat longer than a man, but it had no form—just a straight piece of flesh that fitted the irregularities of the tree's interior. But looking closer, I found what seemed like a kind of face, and then traced out what remained of nose, ears, arms and legs. There was a little orifice where the mouth ought to be that the thing was breathing out of just a little.

The flesh was very white and tender, and shrunk away if touched. I put it on the bob sled, took it home, and the school teacher who was boarding there and me concluded it was the reminiscence of a slave who had run away in war time, and, being almost caught, had squeezed up into the tree; that the hole had been stopped up, and the negro not being able to get out, the growing wood had pinched him and the sap of the tree had supplied him with life until I found him. As he could not grow sideways he was forced to grow some way, and when he had been compressed out of all shape to accommodate the space inside the extension began. The big bunch of woolly hair indicated his Africanness and no mistake. The peculiar food and darkness bleached him. I thought the creature was going to starve to death once, but I made beech nut soup and poured it into what used to be his mouth. I will take $1,000,000 for him.

FRANCIS DENT.

A FREE SHOW AND A FREE PASS.

"You'll invest, of course, in this oddity?" queried the reporter.

"It would be a star," replied the manager, "if it existed except in the writer's brain. But the demand for $1,000,000 betrays him for an insane man, even had we not received similar letters from him before. He was a school teacher, but has been confined four years. Every time he escapes we get one of those epistles."

"Here's one from a museum manager," Mr. Mills continued, "which inquires if I think the girl who receives the beauty premium can be induced to travel for a moderate salary with a sort of side show, and if I will act as his agent in the matter. By way of postscript he says that while she would be a drawing card for him, it would advertise the St. Louis exposition immensely."

"What will you reply?"

"Reply? Why, if I had the fellow here I'd—I'd—I'd"——

And the manager revolved everything mean he could imagine in his mind, but contempt curtailed the assignment until he finally with a sort of side show, and if I will act as his agent in the matter. By way of postscript he says that while she would be a drawing card for him, it would advertise the St. Louis exposition immensely."

"What will you reply?"

"Reply? Why, if I had the fellow here I'd —I'd—I'd"——

And the manager revolved everything mean he could imagine in his mind, but contempt curtailed the assignment until he finally ejaculated:

"I'd tie him in a Chinese laundry to fatten on rats!"

Another oddity was the letter of a Chicago mechanic, who expressed in stultified phraseology the highest admiration for "the show," and summed up with a request that Mr. Mills use his influence to get half fare rates for the writer, wife and baby to visit the exposition; or, he admitted, he would be glad of passes, and, as an inducement, offered "if any plastering wants patchin' " to do it.

Requests for passes to the hall are numerous. One man writes from Ottawa, Kan., asking a season ticket for his family on the ground that he "boosted" Verestchagin while the latter got his sketch for "A Hanging in Russia." Half a hundred offer their services gratis as watchmen if their friends will be passed in. An inventor offers for $5,000 to set up a machine at each entrance that will take, automatically, the picture of every one entering the building, without regard to how fast they come. This is both as an exhibit, the author explains, and to help the police in picking up pickpockets.

RURAL ART—A CHICKEN BARON.

Farther on in the pile was a letter from a farmer, who evidently could not appreciate the Russian painter's talent. "I went thar," he scrawls, "gist to see them paintens I hearn so much about. My girl Jane's only 14, 'n she kin paint better a blamed sight with skim milk 'n huckleberry juice." But unique MSS. are not confined to the exposition. Two days after assuming the assistant mayorship, Acting Secretary Simon S. Bass had a stock of odd applications filed away for mementoes. Among these is one from a thoroughbred Yankee, who asks:

"Mr. Mayor: What chance is there in St. Louis for an official incubator, that is, one that is a first class hatching machine which I could get your indorsement for as mayor for about $200? Besides, I would give you a couple of spring chickens every day while I run and got good business. Or, I could do better and make it worth your while to make a license or something, so I could put in a lot and control the hatching business of your town. Please answer quick, because I have a lot of eggs waiting."

In another line was the letter which asked if a brick making machine would pay here, but the man spread the batter all over the griddle who asked if wheelbarrows had been introduced here yet, and if not how a couple dozen would take after the novelty wore off. This came from Canada.

A farmer near Ironton, Mo., begs Mayor Noonan to refer him to the best poet in town, as he wants, he says, about 100 lines about an old fellow settler if it would cost no more than a nickel a line. Or, he offers the mayor fifty cents to let the job out not to exceed $8, for which he would like to send two deers when the game law comes in. "Every man to his trade," he winds up; "I can hunt; let him as can write poetry."

So common are these appeals that an application to the mayor for the position as a school teacher, etc., scarcely provokes a smile. The answering of these communications is left to the janitor, who affirms they kindle fire as well as any paper he knows of.

The export of diamonds from South Africa for 1887 were 3,598,930 carats, worth £4,240,000, against 3,135,000 carats, worth £3,500,000 for the previous year.

Juries in England.

In one respect England is ahead of America in criminal court procedure. I refer to the selection of juries. I attended courts in London and the assize towns pretty regularly for nearly twenty years, and can only remember one case in which it took more than ten minutes to secure a jury. Then there were only nine jurors in attendance, and the judge, Baron Bramwell, fined the absentees $250 each, and while he was having the fines recorded the sheriff secured three substitutes. Such a thing as challenging a juror is almost unheard of. Once I remember a man charged with shoplifting protested against a brother of the prosecutor serving on the jury. His protest was overruled, the trial proceeded and the verdict was "not guilty." One reason why juries are so easily obtained is that papers never comment on cases that are sub judice; they may report facts, but if they express an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of a person under arrest the publishers may be fined for contempt of court. Of late years, however, greater latitude has been allowed, and comment frequently passes unchallenged.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Discriminating.

To a party traveling across the plains in search of sport the ability to distinguish between a woman and a wild animal is of the first importance. An incident in the journey of Lord Dufferin and his suite across the continent a few years ago brings this truth plainly to mind.

While passing across a plain, out of sight of all human beings, an antelope stood within a few yards of the train looking at it go by. A number of us saw the animal, and called to the next car in order that the governor general and Lady Dufferin might look out.

There was a sudden rush to the window, but no antelope was then in sight. The train had gone swiftly on, and by the time they had reached the window their car was passing a solitary woman dressed in modern fashion, with a veil over her face and a sunshade in her hand.

A disgusted member of Lord Dufferin's staff ejaculated: "Oh, nonsense! that's a woman, not an antelope."—Youth's Companion.

Result of a Dance.

A curious story is told of how Chief Justice Fuller and his family were driven from the Congregational to the Episcopal fold by a dance, when they lived in Augusta, Me. In 1840, when Nathan Weston, Mr. Fuller's father-in-law, was chief justice of Maine, a young ladies' sewing circle was held at the Weston house, and Mrs. Fuller played the piano for the dancing that followed the sewing, her brother accompanying her on the violin. This ungodly innovation stirred up such a rumpus in the Congregational church that the Weston and Fuller families went over to the Episcopalians.—Ladies' Home Journal.

SIR JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

The New British Minister to Washington, and His Family.

Washington is delighted with the new British minister, Sir Julian Pauncefote, and his family, and on the part of the young ladies the pleasure seems to be reciprocal, for they were quite enthusiastic in their enjoyment of American life. Sir Julian combines several valued English attributes, such as high rank and a very long line of ancestors, with the versatile social qualities usually thought more natural to the Irish and American people. His daughters, having spent so much of their life abroad during their father's diplomatic career, are in the best sense of the phrase citizens of the world.

Lady Selina Fitzgerald Cubitt Pauncefote is the full title of the mother and social head of Sir Julian's interesting family. Her father was Maj. Cubitt, of the British army in India, and he was military secretary to the government at Calcutta when he died there. The Cubitts are an old Norfolk family whose ancestral seat is at Catfield; but Maj. Cubitt's widow married a son of Sir Martin Archer Shee, and so her daughter was taken abroad at an early age and educated at Dresden, where she met and was married to Sir Julian Pauncefote. The family is noted among England's soldiers, and her brother, Col. William George Cubitt, won the Victoria Cross for brave service at the siege of Lucknow. She is a highly accomplished and socially attractive lady, so youthful in appearance that she seems like an older sister of her daughters. Her brown hair and bright eyes, shapely head and lithe figure, give her a most attractive personality, and her dignity and courtesy are up to the high standard of the British embassy.

Miss Maude Pauncefote, oldest daughter and the only one formally "in society," was born and partially reared in Dresden, completed her education in London, where she was formally presented at court and "brought out," after which she traveled some time on the continent before coming to the United States. She is a great reader, and especially fond of American fiction, her favorite authors being Howells, Bret Harte and Marion Crawford. She is so pleased with American scenery, actors and society, as well as the bright skies of the Washington climate, that she does not wish to return to England—at least, so she says, and, in view of the many American girls who have married British titles, it looks like an exchange ought to be effected.

Miss Violet Sybil Pauncefote, the sec-to receive," etc. Miss Sybil, as she is called in the domestic classification, was born in London, and is still deep in her studies.

Miss Lilian, the third daughter, born at Richmond on the Thames, is what plain Americans would call a big, healthy girl, full of life, and, extremely fond of riding, boating and walking. She has dark eyes and hair, and resembles her father most of any of the daughters. Last is Audrey, the golden-haired pet, a native of London and already a great favorite in Washington. She too is enthusiastic about America, and says, "Oh, we hope we shall always stay in this beautiful country, and we want to go often to the opera and have a pony we can ourselves ride and drive in the parks."

It, is, perhaps, quite to be desired that Sir Julian should remain long in the country, and it may be considered certain that he will avoid the rock on which his predecessor was wrecked, for he is a wary old diplomatist with a vast amount of experience in most difficult situations. The Pauncefotes are certainly among the very oldest noble families in England; they held high rank far back in Saxon times, survived the Norman conquest, mingled their blood amicably with the Danish, Briton and Norman stocks which have aided to make the English the strongest race in Europe, and came through the murderous Wars of the Roses with an unbroken line. Sir Julian, however, was but the third son of the late Robert Pauncefote of Preston Court, Gloucestershire, and raised himself to his present station by superior achievements in diplomacy.

He began active life at the bar of the inner temple in 1852, but was soon taken into the office of Sir William Molesworth, secretary of state for the colonies, as private secretary, and his rise in diplomacy of the Roses with an unbroken line. Sir Julian, however, was but the third son of the late Robert Pauncefote of Preston Court, Gloucestershire, and raised himself to his present station by superior achievements in diplomacy.

He began active life at the bar of the inner temple in 1852, but was soon taken into the office of Sir William Molesworth, secretary of state for the colonies, as private secretary, and his rise in diplomacy was quite rapid. He was attorney general of Hong Kong in 1886, chief justice of the Leeward isles in 1874, assistant secretary for foreign affairs in 1876, and was made permanent under secretary for foreign affairs in 1882. Thence he was delegated in 1885 as one of the commission to draw up rules for the international regulation of the Suez canal, and was soon after named as minister to the United States.

Built to Sell.

A railroad is a railroad, isn't it? The public thinks so. But under the surface, railroads are sometimes built to sell. For instance, there is a piece of road I recently saw that is laid with rails of thirty pounds to the yard—105,600 pounds of iron to the mile of trade. Now, a local street car company will put seventy-eight pound steel rails down—274,560 pounds to the mile, or 137 tons and 566 pounds. A great many trunk lines are laying ninety-six pound steel rails—337,920 pounds, or 168 tons and 1,920 pounds to the mile. At $30 a ton to iron the first would cost $1,690 a mile, the last $5,070. So it will be seen how railroads are built to sell. But this is not all the saving. Sometimes it is cheaper to build two miles of track around a hill than half a mile straight through; and the miles count in selling, especially western roads. Then, I have seen rails spiked at quarters and centers, or, at most, half the ties skipped. There is also a difference between eight inch clear white oak ties without sap, sixteen inches between centers, and "culled" or soft wood ties two feet apart. In short, it takes a man a long time to learn the difference that can be made in the expense of constructing a railroad.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Napanee Express

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, DEC. 13, 1889.

—If you wish to give your children a good education send them to the Napanee Collegiate Institute.

—If you wish to show your appreciation of our efforts, send along a dollar and, in return, we will send you THE EXPRESS until January 1st., 1891.

—Are you going to get married? Get the wedding ring from F. W. Smith & Bro. They will engrave the ring and sell you the marriage license and keep mum until the event is over.

—Parties wishing to send copies of the Christmas EXPRESS to their friends will do well to send in their orders at once. We are selling the Christmas number at five cents per copy.

—Next Sabbath morning the pastor of the Adolphustown Methodist church will preach on the nature and obligation of Baptism, and will administer the sacred rite to several adults.

—From Saturday, December 21st, to Wednesday, December 25th, single fare return tickets will be sold from all points on the N. T. & Q. Railway, to Napanee, tickets good to return not later than the 26th instant.

—For sale.—One of the most comfortable homes in Napanee. A good brick house, good barn, hard and soft water, gas, furnace and well situated. Easy terms of payment. A bargain for somebody. Apply at THE EXPRESS office.

—Rev. C. O. Johnston has consented to deliver his famous lecture on "Influences", in Tamworth, on Christmas Eve. Those who have heard Mr. Johnston on the platform, know what a treat is in store for the people of Tamworth. The lecture will be preceded by a tea in the Methodist church.

—A. S. Kimmerly takes the lead; 13 lbs. extra granulated sugar for $1; best Coal oil, 15 cts. per gallon; fine mixed candy, 2 lbs. for 25 cts; choice 50 cent tea, 25 cts; good tea 15 cts. I have also a stock of the finest Western flour always on hand, and am selling away below all others. 17 lbs. new currants, $1. It will pay you to call and see our stock. Remember I will not be undersold.

—Messrs. Fralick & Crouch are now manufacturing very superior lines of tables, easels, cabinets, piano stools, music racks and cabinets, fancy stools and chairs and brackets of all descriptions. If you are puzzled as to what to give for a Christmas present, call and see their stock. The work turned out by this firm is strictly first-class and has a reputation extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

—Rev. E. N. Baker, M. A., B. D., delivered a lecture in Port Hope last Monday evening, his subject being "A Ramble in Rome." The Port Hope Guide says:—"We congratulate Mr. Baker on his advent into the lecture field. He will not take a back seat in this department of work, or in any other he undertakes. What he does is done well." We are glad to learn that Mr. Baker is keeping up his reputation as an energetic worker.

—On Wednesday night no less than ten able bodied men sought a night's lodging in the Police station. This makes a total of one hundred and seventeen tramps who have been thus lodged since the eighth day of November last. Many of them have also been fed, a no inconsiderable tax on the ratepayers of the town. Perhaps some admirer of the N. P. will say that this is another evidence of the prosperity of Canada.

—The Seventeenth Annual Report of the Confederation Life Association is a most gratifying one. The careful conservative business methods which have characterized this Association since its inception have been continued; and the results are such as cannot fail to be highly satisfactory to all concerned. The total policies in force numbered 10 896 for the sum of $16,762,937—a magnificent business record when it is borne in mind that every risk has been carefully selected, and that no business has been taken for the mere sake of making up a grand total. This is evidenced by the low death claims for the past year. These only amounted to sixty-seven: calling for the sum of $112,044.09, including bonus additions. The excellent management of this Association is also evideneed by the fact that the death claims for the past eight years have been more than met by the income of rents and interest; thus while the death claims in eight years have mounted to $636,471.48, the income from rents and interest has netted $669,384 27—leaving a balance in favor of the Association of $32,912.79. It is gratifiying to find a comparatively young Canadian life company taking so high a position amongst the great life associations of the continent. Mr. J. K. Macdonald, the able managing director, is to be congratulated on the large measure of success that has crowned his efforts. During all these years he has brought abilities of no ordinary kind to the discharge of his onerous duties. Con-

—The snug little English church which has been erected at Selby to replace the one recently destroyed by fire, was dedicated on Wednesday last. Venerable Archdeacon T. Bedford-Jones conducted the services and was assisted by Rev. Mr. Harding, of Napanee, and the Rector, Rev. Mr. Bailey. The congregation are to be congratulated on once more having such a comfortable place of worship. The building, though small, is very neat and admirably suited to the wants of the people. It is built of red brick and is finished in a first-class manner.

—Are you thinking of having your photograph taken. If so, call on J. S. Hulett and see samples of his work. He is now turning out work fully equal to that done in first-class city galleries. Mr. Hulett is now finishing cabinet photos in what is known as the scroll design, and they are pronounced by competent judges to be gems. Considerable attention is paid to the enlarging of photos either from a new negative or an old picture. These enlarged pictures are finely finished in a manner that cannot be excelled anywhere.

—The many friends of George Miller will regret to learn of his death which took place at London, on Saturday last. Deceased was a little over seventy-seven years of age. He was born in the Township of Ernesttown. For thirty-seven years Mr. Miller was a local preacher in the Methodist church, and only retired because of physical disability. The remains were brought east for interment. There will be a memorial service held in the Newburgh Methodist Church next Sabbath morning, conducted by Rev. D. O. Crossley.

—The Anniversary services in connection with the W. M. Church, passed off very successfully. On Sabbath, Rev. A. B. Chambers, L.L.B., delivered a splendid sermon, in the morning, and at night Rev. C. O. Johnston preached to a crowded house. On Monday evening tea was served in the basement of the church, fully five hundred people partaking of the good things provided. The ladies of the congregation deserve the highest praise for the sumptuous tea served. After the wants of the inner man had been attended to, an intellectual feast was partaken of. The church was well filled and the whole audience enjoyed themselves to their hearts content. After the singing the Doxology, Mr. W. T. Gibbard, the chairman of the evening, called on Rev. S. Card to lead in prayer, after which Miss Marie Tilley and Mr. A. N. Jewell sang a duett, very sweetly. Then the pastor, Rev. C. O. Johnston, delivered a lecture on "Wisdom and Folly in Home Life." It was a racy and instructive address, in which the peculiarities of people were handled in a mirth-provoking manner. For over an hour Mr. Johnston talked to the audience in a manner which must have benefitted each and every one of his listeners. Space will not permit of our giving the many good points in the lecture; suffice it is to say that it was a rare treat. After the rendering of an anthem by the choir, Rev. A. Young pronounced the benediction, and the services in connection with the sixteenth anniversary of the Western Methodist Church, Napanee, were brought to a close. The proceeds of the Tea Meeting amounted to over $150.

Mr. and Mrs. Snider were thrown violently out, miraculously escaping a more serious result. They were badly shaken up, and Mr. Snider lost one of his robes. Chickenpox is playing gently with our younger population.

Returning from Kingston market Saturday, down McMichael's hill, came like an avalanche two teams under full sail and whip. Just ahead was Orange Storms' team, which, hearing the racket behind, became unmanageable, and struck out for more road. Just ahead was David U. Snider and wife, 5th concession, in a cutter, coming nicely along. All at once Storms' team struck them, swinging around each side of the cutter. Mr. and Mrs. Snider were thrown violently out, miraculously escaping a more serious result. They were badly shaken up, and Mr. Snider lost one of his robes. Running horses is a dangerous practice on a crowded road like York is, especially on market days.

TORY HEELERS

TRYING TO WORK THE TOWNSHIPS.

Pulling the Wires From Napanee.

Last week a load of local tories took the trouble to drive out to Roblin with a view of coercing their Richmond brethern into fixing the ticket to suit the Napanee ring. They went as far as Jimmie O'Brien's hotel but were afraid to venture to the hall, where a meeting was in progress. Finally W. C. Scott, the Grit editor of the Tory organ, was sent out to reconnoiter. He ventured into the hall, was invited to speak, but excused himself by saying that he had nothing to say. The crowd thought that Mr. Scott's excuse was like his so-called editorials, altogether too thin, and told him so. He was plainly informed that the people of the township of Richmond were quite capable of looking after their own affairs without being served to any "Beaver soup," etc., etc. In fact the editor of the Beaver had a very uncomfortable time of it and was glad to get back to the hotel without a ducking in the Salmon river. A consultation was held and it was decided to hold an adjourned meeting at Selby, which took place last Monday evening. The cause of all these gatherings is that Peter W. Dafoe refuses to pay second fiddle to Thomas V. Sexsmith, and wants to run for reeve, or nothing. The Roblin crowd say that if Mr. Dafoe will oppose Thomas V. Sexsmith, that they will support him, otherwise they will oppose him tooth and nail. The latest report is that Thomas V. has withdrawn and that Mr. Dafoe will oppose Ira B. Hudgins. We have a list of the names of those who formed the self-constituted deputation to Roblin but refrain from publishing it, as the parties feel very much ashamed of themselves.

Ibra B. Sills is daily being promised support from men of both sides of politics. He is a capable man and will doubtless be elected by a handsome majority.

ERNESTTOWN.

The gage of battle has been thrown and accepted and the first week in January will be a hot time in Ernesttown, even if the thermometer goes down to zero.

Last Saturday night a load of Napanee tories, headed by the Beaver's Grit editor, went to Odessa, and insisted on a full tory ticket being nominated. There was considerable demurring on the part of the victims who were asked to sacrifice themselves on the party altar, but threats and pleadings had their effect and five victims were chosen. These are their names.

For Reeve—Arnold P. Booth, (he who acknowledged getting a package of money at one of the elections, but never reported as to the spending thereof.)

presented a fine appearance. The crowd was so great that it was half past eight before the last tables were cleared,and the intellectual part of the programme was commenced by a speech from his Worship the Mayor. He, in a few well-chosen remarks, congratulated the Firemen and citizens on the great success of the Oyster Supper. First on the programme was an Instrumental selection by the 47th Battalion Band, rendered in a style, showing they have lost none of their former proficiency. Next in order was a fine selection played on the piano, by Miss Chambers, with her usual brilliancy, eliciting a hearty approval from the audience. Then came a reading by Perry Scott, selections from Mark Twain and Eli Perkins. Miss Hypatia Fox performed charmingly on the piano. At this stage of the proceedings the Chairman invited all the members of the TownCouncil present to take a seat on the platform and show their handsome faces to the audience. Councillor Gibbard particularly being named. He declined the honor, giving as his reason that"he was very comfortably situated where he was." This remark brought the Pastor of the Western Methodist Church to the front, who, after peering in the direction of Bro. G., coolly took his seat remarking that he only wanted to see if Bro. Gibbard had a lady along side of him. The audience appreciated the joke and made the welkin ring. Another instrumental selection by Miss Chambers was followed by a reading "William Brown of Oregon," by Mr. John Robinson, Merchant, which was well received. The next in order was a reading " Arrarstarcus studies Elocution," by Mr. Jas. Furguson, Hardware Merchant, which pleased the crowd. Prof. Kennedy gave one of his grand selections, ending with " Home, Sweet Home," with variations, rendered so sweetly that the audience were spell-bound till its conclusion, then arose such a shout of approval as the old hall has seldom heard. This was the first encore of the evening and was responded to by the Professor. The Rev. C. O. Johnston, Pastor of the W. M. C., came forward and made one of his inimitable addresses. "Manhood and Humanity "were the leading subjects touched upon, in such a manner as to thoroughly interest and get hold of the sympathies of his audience. No man on the platform in this Country knows how to get the heart string of his hearers better than does Mr. Johnston. His eloquent speech was followed by a song, " Have Courage my Boy to say No," sang to his own accompanyment, in Mr. Johnston's free and happy style. The audience were delighted with the speech,but the song set them fairly wild. An encore called the gentleman to his feet, when he very coolly announced that he never sang twice at once, and the audience had to be content. The evenings entertainment ended by the Band playing "God save the Queen." We congratulate the Firemen on their big success.

We understand the Reeve and First and Second Deputies are to meet on Monday next at Centreville, too bad to leave out Hodge and Dulmage. A change from Mr. Hodge in this corner would do no harm. He would do well enough in the Agricultural show, showing for his own special prize, but not for councillor. Mr. Baker, firrt-deputy, is going to have the village map business investigated after election. What is he giving us,chaff or taffey ? But what has the Camden council done in the last ten years ? For Deputy-Reeve.—Michael Asselstine, the same Michael that "Derb" beat out of sight last January.)

For Second Deputy-Reeve—Lewis H. Stover.

For Councillor.—Will Fraser and Will Armstrong.

It was currently reported that A. P. Booth was about moving to Kingston, and that he was very anxious to keep out of the field this year, but the threat about losing the contract for flannel was too much even for Arney's nerves, and he reluctantly consented to again suffer defeat at the hands of I. O. Fraser.

The electors of the various townships will do well to ask themselves why the Napanee clique are trying so hard to get "suitable" candidates in the various municipalities. We give them fair and timely warning that there is a big scheme on foot whereby certain parties living in Napanee will try to gain a big advantage for themselves at the expense of the people living in the townships. Hence their activity. Be warned in time and if you wish to save yourselves havy financial burdens, steer clear of the candidates nominated at the dictation of the Napanee clique. Remember what we say and if you catch them in your locality endeavoring to work up their infamous job, run them out. Electors ! Vote against the candidates of the Napanee ringsters.

SHEFFIELD.

The condition of the finances of the Township of Sheffild are a fair sample of tory management. For several years Benjamin Detlor and ex clerk Shields ran things as they liked and when the new council came into power the finances were badly muddled. An audit was made and after careful examination it was found that about $7,500 of good money had been used up within a very few years, in addition to the amounts raised by taxation. The township at one time had a School Fund of $5,000. That is all gone. $1,337.85 of the Sinking Fund has been used up, and there is a liability of about $1,000, for borrowed money. The present Council have squarely faced the difficulty and have succeeded in straightening out the muddle. In this they have been assisted by Clerk Aylesworth and Treasurer Way. It was found necessary to levy a rate of twelve mills on the dollar, this year, in order to get matters squared up. Ex-Reeve Detlor and his associates had been in the habit of levying a rate of only ten mills, with the result that $7,500 of money has been used up as above stated. The present Council believe in paying their debts as they go along, and raised sufficient funds to do so, and no more. Had the Detlor crowd been equally honest they would have had to have levied even a higher rate, for the Council of 1889 have been especially economical and careful. We commend the above facts to the eldctors of Sheffield.

RICHMOND.

Before going to press we learn that at the meeting held at Selby last Monday night, it was decided to let P. W. Dafoe run for Reeve against Ira B. Hudgins. This is anything but pleasing to Thomas V. Sexsmith, as he don't like being crowded to the wall by the Napanee clique. A. Hewitt will oppose Ibra B. Sills for the Deputy-Reeveship and will get badly beaten. Craig Carecallen will run for the Council.

PARDONED AT LAST.

A THRILLING CHRISTMAS STORY, BY "JACK FROST."

How Myrtle's little heart fluttered. This was indeed love's triumph—something to be proud of. He had met her as a simple maiden, and here was her apotheosis surrounded by nobility, wealth and worth, in a hall of dazzling splendour, the observed of all observers.

She felt her father's arm tremble, and knew that he, too, had recognized the fatal likeness.

Looking up, she saw his face was as pale as death, and that his eyes literally blazed with suppressed fury.

She trembled lest, at that moment, he should say or do something to be regretted.

But he soon recovered composure, and only Myrtle knew of the terrible tornado that had raged in his breast.

Miss Becky Pride, however, saw the startling expression that had leaped into Mr. Dene's face, and, having heard the name of Peyton announced, thought that perhaps Myrtle had confessed all to him, and this was his way of showing his disapproval.

"He will never consent to the match," she thought, exultingly. "That child will find that he has a will of his own which will not bend, even to her pleadings."

The guests, most of whom were familiar with grand displays, were perfectly enchanted with the gorgeous appearance of the apartments.

But the gardens, as arranged under Mr. Dene's directions, were a chef d œuvre of art and elegance, some striking surprise being in store for his visitors whichever way they turned.

Meandering passages led to tents of Eastern splendour in one direction, and to torchlight retreats of flowery sweetness in another.

All was managed with such mastery of deception, that of the three apartments constructed in the gardens, and approached from the principal ball-room through the aperture of a vanished window, not one could be reached but by a complication of arcades.

These were dazzling with a thousand many coloured lamps, yet so mysteriously devious from the labyrinth-like caprice of their direction, that those who sought the brilliant Eastern tent were likely enough to find themselves in the shady bower of exotics; and eyes longing for the soothing repose of this dimly-lighted retreat, might be dazzled anew by emerging upon a lofty chamber of rare brilliancy, where the gaudy decorations of a Chinese saloon were simply superb.

Although there were neither locks, bolts, nor bars for love to laugh at, yet that mischievous god had something left him to do this occasion—both Myrtle and Erle Peyton were longing for an opportunity to steal blissful half hour or so to spend in each other's society.

On Myrtle's part this was hard of accomplishment, for she was literally besieged by a young beaux to have their names placed on her programme.

At last she succeeded, and escaped to the garden, but not unobserved. Miss Becky had kept an observant eye upon her, and was repaid by seeing this manœuvre, the purport of which she rightly divined.

"This is so good of you, Myrtle," whispered Erle, as he led her to a secluded bower. "I have been dying to see you all the evening."

"Oh, indeed! Perhaps Miss Dene's mother was a connection of the family; did the duke's sister ever marry?"

"Yes, made a mesalliance, my dear. I remember the commotion it caused at the time. The duke was furious, and refused to have anything to do with the pair—her husband was a physician, I believe—to reably rich, handsome, and an Englishman."

"You have met him, of course?" she asked, somewhat eagerly.

"Me—no, never!"

"And pray, what became of them?"

"Oh, they left France! You see the duke was related to Royalty and made the place a leetle too hot for them; it was said that the husband——but excuse me, I see the dear Countess of Berks wants me to make up a four at whist?"

And so Becky lost the sequel to that story, nor did an opportunity occur again that night for re opening the topic.

What she had heard did not exactly suit her wishes—it was too favourable; there was nothing discreditable in being connected with a duke; but there was something else behind all this, was to her mind a certainty. If, as she suspected, Dene was the husband of the duke's sister, why did he wish to keep the matter a secret?

This fact, once known, would prove an "Open Sesame" to the best houses in England, and be a sure passport to Myrtle, who could look forward to making a brilliant marriage.

Miss Pride was not a woman to allow the matter to remain in abeyance; so next day, at luncheon, she began her campaign.

"My dear," she said, blandly "I had a high compliment paid to you last night, by no less a personage than Lady Rose."

"Indeed!" said Myrtle, stifling a yawn, while her father, after excusing himself, looked at his letters.

"Yes; she said you bore a remarkable resemblance to a distinguished lady she met in Paris, many years ago."

Mr. Dene looked up sharply; but immediately resumed his reading.

"And pray, who might it be?" asked Myrtle listlessly, feeling no interest in this gossipy conversation.

"The sister of the Duke of Brittany," she replied sweetly, keeping her eyes fixed on Mr. Dene, who gave an involuntary start.

As Myrtle made no reply, but only looked furtively at her father, Miss Becky pursued:

"The story of that lady's life was quite a romance; she married an English physician."

"Nothing romantic in that, surely?" said Mr. Dene, caustically; "what was the fortunate individual's name, pray?"

"That Lady Rose could not tell me; it appears the duke was most unkind about the marriage—old families are very prejudiced—but, if you would like to hear more about the matter, I will call upon Lady Rose with pleasure."

"Thanks; no, Miss Pride, you are too kind. I assure you the matter possesses no interest for either myself or Myrtle," he replied coldly.

She had too much tact to pursue an unwelcome theme, and changed the conversation with considerable adroitness.

"It never rains but it pours," is a true saying, which was again exemplified in Miss taking care of me while I was with you. What did you do? Half-starve, cruelly beat me, and keep me ignorant. Surely you cannot expect me to feel grateful to you, Mrs. Skinner?"

"I thought you might help Jack and me a bit. We're only poor folk, a pound or two a year won't hurt you."

"Perhaps I will help you; but it will depend upon yourself whether I do so or not. In the first place, you must never come here again; in the next, you must go back to the old place. If you agree to these conditions I promise that my father will settle an annuity upon you which will keep you in comfort for the remainder of your days."

"It is very kind of you, miss," said the harridan, becoming suddenly respectful; "but it wasn't altogether for money I came. After you left, someone called and asked after you."

Instantly it occurred to Myrtle that it was the duke on her track, and an expression of terror leaped into her face and eyes that did not escape Mrs. Skinner's powers of perception.

Was it a gentleman?" she faltered, "and had he a mark on his left cheek—three moles in the shape of the letter V!"

"Yes, he had; and there was a lady with him. You see they saw your likeness in the window of that photograph chap, and then they looked me up, and Mrs. Sinclair; but, of course, I couldn't tell them much. I didn't know where you had gone to, you see; neither did Mrs. Sinclair."

"Did they seem anxious to see me, or leave any message?" asked Myrtle, an icy chill at her heart, for she had a presentiment that should the duke and her father ever meet again, it would bode ill for one or both.

"They asked me to write, if I could find you."

"What address did they leave, have you got it by you?" Myrtle asked eagerly thus showing her hand to this rapacious woman.

"'Twas somewhere abroad; but I gave it to Jack and he lost it, most likely lit his dratted pipe with it," she answered, taking a huge pinch of snuff to clear her head.

"You are quite sure you have lost it?" Myrtle asked, anxiously.

"As sure as that I'm getting awful thirsty," said Mrs. Skinner. "I always like my drop of beer at this time of the day, with half a noggin of gin in it."

Taking out her purse, Myrtle poured its contents into her lap, saying:

"Take that for the present; you shall have more soon; and now I think of it, you might be more comfortable in London than at the old place. Leave me your address, please; I will write to you."

Martha Skinner was cunning enough to see that the interview had lasted long enough in her own interests, and took her leave, professing the utmost devotion for her foster child.

A part of her story was true—a lady had called and inquired for Myrtle; the gentleman was a pure myth introduced because of Myrtle's precipitate questions and description.

"Thank heaven, she has lost the address!" sighed Myrtle, on finding herself alone; "I must not let papa know of the duke's inquiry, it would only worry him."

If only she had known what fateful issues hung in the balance, she would have confided all to him without reservation.

"Well, Martha, what luck? asked Jack Skinner, somewhat huffily, "got the cold shoulder, eh?"

"That don't look like it, Jack," she pered her lover when she joined him. "My mother has done nothing but talk of you all the evening. When may I speak to your father, my darling?"

"It has gone as far as that, has it?" murmured the eavesdropper. "I expect you won't find him as pliable as his daughter, young gentleman!"

Myrtle did not reply to his question at once—a nervous dread was upon her lest this evening should prove the death of that love which had proved so sweet to them both.

"I think you had better not say anything to my father at present. I hardly know how to frame a question I must put to you. You will not be vexed. You would not if you only knew how much depends on your answer. Until it is answered, I dare not meet you again!"

"Has someone been slandering me, Myrtle?' he asked, quickly. "But that would be impossible—I have not an enemy in the world that I know of."

"But my father has—one who is bitter and implacable. I wish you did not resemble him so closely," said Myrtle, sadly.

Miss Becky Pride listened now intently; she was on the eve of learning some secret which might aid her in her schemes.

"Whom do I resemble, my darling? Surely you would not punish me because of that?" he said, smiling at her seriousness, and making light of what naturally appeared to him a matter of trivial import.

"The Duke of Brittany," she said; each word pronounced slowly, as if she feared to speak them—as if they contained a doom.

His light laugh reassured her, when, catching her in his arms he kissed her, saying—

"My darling, I never even heard of such a person! How it comes about that I should resemble him so closely is a matter of surprise to me as well as to you. Have I lifted a load off your mind, eh! dear one?"

"Yes; oh! I am so happy now—I could sing with delight. Until I received your answer I was most miserable. I shall be able to tell papa everything now. When he knows I love you he will not mar our happiness, I'm sure."

Miss Pride had heard enough, and had no wish to remain and listen to—what would prove to her—love's insipid nonsense.

She made a note on her tablets, and on re-entering the brilliant salon her smile was more seraphic than ever.

Fortune seemed resolved to shower its favors on her this evening, for one of the dowagers of fashion made room for her at her side, and forthwith began to ply her with questions about Myrtle and her father, to all of which she gave wary replies.

"I have been puzzling myself all the evening as to who it is Miss Dene so closely resembles," remarked the dowager; "and at last my memory has befriended me."

"That is nice," Miss Becky chirrupped. "I have often found myself in a similar dilemma. What a blessing a good memory is!"

"Mine is excellent; I can recall scenes of many, many years back. You see, dear, I'm not afraid of people guessing my age" (this with a little cackling laugh). "Such a one I recall now, when the very double of Miss Dene was present; face, hair, eyes, figure, voice alike. It was a splendid affair at St. Cloud, and all the haut ton of gay Paris attended, nor was Royalty absent, of course. Yes, Miss Dene ought to thank me when she hears I have said, and maintain it, that she is the exact counterpart of the Duke of Brittany's sister."

The governess dropped her fan in her excitement. Here was a clue which she determined to amplify.

Becky's case.

She was taking the air on the front lawn when a strange individual approached.

Becky could not forbear smiling at the grotesque figure—that of an elderly hard-featured woman, dressed in a yellow gown ornamented profusely with gaudy flowers, worked in colored worsted, and wearing a coal-scuttle bonnet.

Bobbing a curtsey, she said:

"Can I see Myrtle Dene, ma'am?"

"You mean Miss Dene!" said the governess, with some asperity, not liking the familiarity.

"Of course—of course, though she was always Myrtle to me. Lor bless you, I had the bringing of her up from a babby, and used to call her Myrt for short, you see."

Good heavens!" thought Becky, "what an odious creature! I must get rid of her somehow; she will bring disgrace on us all if the servants get to know of this."

"I think you have made a mistake, my good woman," she said, with ill-concealed hauteur.

"Oh, no I havn't, begging your pardon; I saw her out driving. I hope she isn't too proud to speak to her poor old foster-mother?' said Mrs. Skinner, stoutly; "my good man Jack and me live at Chelsea now. We're nice and handy to the child, and mean to see her often."

Before Becky Pride could reply, Myrtle came out; on catching sight of her, Mrs. Skinner flew towards her with outstretched arms, exclaiming:

"'Tis her, my own bonny Myrtle!" and before Myrtle could prevent it, she was enfolded in her strong arms, and smothered with kisses.

Many a person in Myrtle's position would have shown anger at this unpardonable display of hypocritical affection on the part of one who had treated her with almost cruelty.

But she resolved to take it all in good part, and not to give her governess a chance of humiliating her.

As soon as she could free herself from the creature's odious embrace, she said:

"Dear Miss Pride, this is my old nurse, Martha Skinner. I had no idea she was in London, or I would have sent for her."

"There, ma'am, didn't I tell you my Myrtle would be pleased to see me?" the virago exclaimed triumphantly, "she's none of your stuck-up marms. I brought her up too sensible for that."

To use a homely simile, all this took the wind completely out of Miss Becky's sails.

One thing she was forced to admit—that though young in years, Myrtle was more than a match for her in the art of dissimulation; and from that moment she began to respect, almost fear, her.

She merely bowed and walked away, lest Myrtle should deem her inquisitive; besides, there was nothing more to learn, for both Mrs. Skinner and Myrtle had confessed the truth of their relations.

Myrtle led the way into an ante-room, and closing the door turned to Mrs. Skinner, an angry glitter in her eyes, and said:

"Why have you come here?—why did you not write to me first, Mrs. Skinner?"

"Don't be angry, Myrtle! You see I saw you out driving and found out that you lived here. Jack and me had a talk, and we thought it better for me to look you up—how's your father?"

"Now, Mrs. Skinner, let us understand each other: you think my father is likely to bribe you to keep silent— is that not so?" said Myrtle, absolutely.

Mrs. Skinner looked guilty, and Myrtle pursued:

"Not one penny piece will you receive in that way; there is nothing in my past to be ashamed of. I find you were well paid for answered, showing him quite a little pile of gold.

"Phew! it's grand—first rate. I'll run and fetch something from round the corner, and some 'baccy; I feel awful for the want of a smoke," he suggested, snatching up a sovereign and hastening out on his errand. Now, matey, how did she look?' he asked on his return, having first made himself comfortable.

"Like a hempress: ler bless you, Jack, it would make your mouth water to see all the fine things; she was a little crabby at first."

"What about?

"My going there. And she didn't forget how I used to cuff her; but, bless you, it was all for her good, wasn't it now?'

"Of course; 'spare the strap and spoil the brat' is true as the gospel," he assented.

"She took me all aback at first, and warn't going to give us a penny piece, unless we went back to the old place out of her way; but I told her summat about a lady and gent calling, and bless you! she got as mild as mother's milk."

"Some one she's afreed of?"

"Yes, mortally afreed of by the look of her face. We're to have so much a year for our nat'ral lives, Jack, and a pound or two extra thrown in."

"For keeping her secret, eh?"

"That's it—she's like that under us," she asserted, placing the point of her thumb on the rude table.

"We'll keep it down on her, too. What sort of a crib is it, matey—easy to crack?"

From this point, the conversation was carried on in confidential whispers, but to their mental satisfaction.

Meanwhile a scene of a totally different character was taking place at Fairlawn House.

Myrtle, with flushed cheek, was seated on a footstool, her head resting on her father's knee.

"So you love him, Myrtle?" he asked sadly.

"Yes, papa; oh, so dearly! He saved my life. You would have had no daughter now, but for him."

"Am I to be lonely again, child? Think of what I have suffered! You are the only link now that binds me to life.'

"But I would never leave you, papa," she said tenderly; "in Erle you would find a son."

"Listen, child; I have kept nothing back from you. If the world only knew that I am an escaped criminal, condemned for the crime of attempted regicide, not one of those high-born men and women we received here and who smiled on us but would frown, and this man, who has won your heart, would perhaps scorn you.'

"Papa, oh, no, no!" she cried, with a shudder. "Erle loves me too dearly for that."

"Have you the courage to put him to the test?" he asked, quickly.

"It is your secret, papa. I dare not tell him."

"Would it be honourable to keep it from him? Some day, when you were his wife, the truth might reach him, and then his whole life might be made miserable. I did not dream love for another would fill your heart so soon; if I could only establish my innocence all would be well."

"But you know you are innocent, dear papa."

"What of that?—who would believe it? One man only could make my innocence as clear as noon-day."

"And he is?"

"My mortal enemy—the Duke of Brittany, your uncle; from what you know of him, through me, is it likely he would do that?"

"Yes; if I pleaded to him on my knees.

I am like my poor dead mother, the sight of me might touch his flinty heart."

"Your mother pleaded for me in vain, child. If ever he and I meet—and something tells me we shall—I will force him to do me justice, or——"

That awful look came into his face had seen there twice before: once at first meeting, again when he saw Peyton, and she shuddered visibly.

"'Tis not right, child, that you should share the weight of my heavy cross," he said, sadly, after a silence of some minutes' duration; "I will leave you all my wealth and hide my head in some foreign land; no one need ever know that your are the daughter of a convict."

Springing to her feet she threw her soft arms round his neck, crying:

"I will not accept the sacrifice; I will will give up this love and live only for you, trusting that heaven, more merciful than man, will one day make your innocence as clear as the noontide."

"And you would do all this for my sake?'

"Yes, even more. Have you not suffered? are you not my own dear father? when you were free, did you not hasten to me and make me what I am? You will not find me less noble than you."

"I thank heaven for having given me such a child!" he cried, her pressing to his heart; "it gives me courage, hope, trust in the future."

"Let us go away from England, papa—to America—I could learn to forget him there," she said, her lovely face was aflame with the resolution of a martyr.

"I am safer in England, child; let me think, Come to me in an hour's time—I will have decided by then," he said, kissing her fondly, and pushing her towards the door gently, but firmly.

When she came back to him, she saw at a glance how hard a battle he had been fighting with self.

His face looked haggard, his forehead seamed with furrows, but his eyes shone bright and clear, as if that hour's conflict had brought him peace and resignation.

"Myrtle, you need not give up the man you love; Heaven send that he may prove worthy of you" he said, calmly.

"But, papa, think of our secret"

"I have, child; it is safe in our keeping. I have wealth and a true friend in Paris, who will freely spend his time in tracking the witnesses who were suborned against me—what they did for gold then, they will undo for gold now."

"That's my own brave papa; it would be an ample revenge indeed to show the duke up in his character to the world."

"Aye! and make him disgorge your mother's fortune," he said, with an exultant smile; "together we will fight him in a way he little dreams of."

"Is he aware of my existence?"

"He thinks you dead. Some day his eyes will be opened, and then our opportunity will have come."

"Are you sure my mother is dead?" she asked, almost eagerly, for it flashed across her brain that perhaps it was she who had called at Mrs. Skinner's to inquire for her.

"Yes! with fiendish cruelty your uncle sent me on a certificate of her death."

"But he might have been deceiving you, papa."

"I verified the particulars for myself after I escaped. Some day I shall take you to see her grave," he said, brokenly. "My poor Marie—my angel wife!"

Burying his head in his hands, he wept silently, and in her eyes his grief was too sacred a thing to be intruded upon. So she stole from the room softly, more resolved it might unsettle his future plans.

Life now, since her father's decision, had become rosy once more, and full of light and colour. She could continue to love Erle; there was no need to stifle her heart's best affections—to go about in the world with a widowed heart, for some day—it might, perchance, be years—she would become his wife, but never till her father's innocence was established.

She was glad she had confessed to her all noble father—the man who had suffered a martydom for love for her mother.

He was a man to feel proud of—to almost worship, and but for her lover she would have gladly gone to some far off settlement in the wilds of America, and with him have spent a free life. In fact, had her father proposed such a thing to her when they first met, she would have hailed the proposal with unalloyed delight—it would have suited her then untamed nature. But love's chains held her enthralled, and she would make such a sacrifice for her father's sake even now, yet the wrench would be fearful.

She had learned to love the pleasant ways of society, and looked forwad to a happy future—such a one as wealth and a happy, contented home had in store for her.

Her pillow of roses had scarcely a single thorn in it; she would be happy, and strive to make those around her happy, too.

Halycon dreams these, which might, or might not, be fulfilled.

"What were the circumstances, Captain?"

"She was a Paducah woman, about forty five years old, and she had a horseshoe with her which she had found on the way to the boat."

"Well?"

"She brought it along, she said, because finding a horseshoe while on a journey was the surest sign of good luck. But what do you suppose she did next morning?"

"Give it up."

"Searched under her pillow, got her false teeth, packed them in her valise, anp put the horseshoe in her mouth. And, mind you, she never discovered her mistake, either, until she went to the breafast table, and there she calked her jaw with the toe of the shoe, while trying to get away with a beefsteak."—[Cincinnati Enquirer.

SELOVER & ATWOOD, Nurserymen,

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Width of nostrils in man or beast, although in the former hardly a type of beauty, is taken to signify good breathing power. Recognizing this also that victory on the playing field in violent games usually rests with those who possess the best staying ability, footballers at the leading United States colleges have actually invested a machine for the extension of the nostrils. It's a curious framework of wire, a parallelogram in shape, a third of an inch wide, about an inch long, and is inserted into the nose to expand the nostrils. Though uncomfortable to the wearer and likely to complicate such cracks on the nose as are often received in foot ball, it admits a more rapid supply of oxygen to the lungs and is supposed to increase the player's staying power. A device which will give more life, excitement and danger to foot ball by expanding the nostrils seems to be of vastly more value to some college students than learning what might expand their brain.

While on this subject, I may be allowed to quote liberally from a letter signed by the well known initials "T. C. P.," than whom there is no better authority on the practical or financial branch of breeding in the country. Here is what he says, and to me it appears that his views are well worth weighing:

"In the face of the fact that 80,000 grade shorthorn bullocks have been exported this year from Montreal, of which possibly a bare ten per cent have come from the Northwest and from the Eastern Townships, you will do well, I think, to permit a few lines in your paper cautioning our Ontario breeders against continuing the extraordinary sacrifice now being made of purebred shorthorn cattle. Think of it! 70,000 bullocks from Ontario, in addition to the home demand for beef! Now, of these bullocks at least three-fourths are the produce of thoroughbred shorthorn bulls. All ought to be. Shorthorn bulls can only be got from herds of shorthorn cattle, and of these, at the present moment, the price is lower than it has been ever before in Canada. Consequently many young males have been steered, or rather stagged, and there is great discouragement among ordinary breeders. . . . It would be a terrible thing for this province if its cattle industry were to be allowed to droop. It is the growth of it and of the cheese factories that has enabled the farmer to live in spite of the cheapness of his cereals. Farmers, at least those trading upon a limited capital, or none, are better off now than they were in the decade between 55 and 65, when Crimean war prices and great railway expenditure did so much to circulate cash. From 65 to 75 cash amongst them was comparatively unknown; and that state of things has been relieved by the circulation of cheese and beef money. It is a pity that the two industries are practically somewhat antagonistic. But so long as tastes differ, and farms offer variety of investment according to their adaptation, dairying and beefing may both prosper in the land, if not upon the same farm; or even in the same townships. . . . .

"I have heard exporters complain that this fall they secured the province for three year-old steers and found very few up to the mark. No doubt Montreal had already depleted the fields. To fill up engaged space a very sorry lot of creatures left our shore in October and November, a discredit to the trade, and not likely to give us or our cattle a good name. In 1880 the present two-year olds will be to the fore, and in 1991 those now yearlings will supply the demand of exporters. But if I am not very much mistaken the two next years will show a terrible they could watch his movements without being seen. Looking in the direction in which the fox's eyes were turned, they saw a full-grown pheasant roosting on one of the outer branches. The pheasant's eyes kept steadily following those of the fox. Round and round went the fox, keeping the bird fascinated with his stare. Gradually the pheasant seemed to get dazed. In a short time this was unmistakable, for at last the bird fell to the earth completely mesmerised. It was now high time to rush forth, as Reynard had seized his prize. This time, however, he was disappointed. The writer says he thought serpents were the only animals that could draw their prey by mesmeric influence, and I thought so, too.

Apropos of the recent development of phenomenal young trotters, a question has arisen as to whether at maturity their powers will not have fallen off. A number of cases are quoted showing that horses that have trotted with remarkable speed as two or three-years olds have not afterwards been able to maintain the pace. In my idea the question does not admit of argument. If things go on as they are going now, it will not be many years before the time of greatest speed in the trotter will be as it is in the runner between the years of three and seven. In other words I think the very early development of the speed powers of a horse is a large mistake. Flora Temple, Dexter, Goldsmith Maid were all in their teens when they did their best work, while Maud S., when she made her phenomenal 2 08¾ over the Cleveland track was ten years old and it is believed can now, in her fifteenth year, travel as fast as ever, if not faster. Will Simol, Axtell, Palo Alto and the other infant phenomena be able to go a 2 10 or 2 12 clip at that age? I rather think not. And this puts me in mind that the average time of mares is better than that of either stallions or geldings. Peruse the following list, the date given in parenthesis being the year of foaling:

He took the delicate hint and offered himself then and there.

CHRISTMAS SHOPPING.

Never mind, ladies. The Christmas shopping does not come out of your pockets. It is your annual opportunity to get more than even with the men, that's all.

And really, they are so good-natured just before Christmas that no one may be pardoned for expressing the wish that the holiday season might last all the year round.

CHRISLMAS PRESENTS.

"The Christmas season's at the door—
And through the air the snowflakes whirl;
The dude now seeks the dollar store
To buy a present for his girl."

Which reminds us to suggest that if you received any presents last Christmas that you do not fancy, this is a good time of the year to dispose of them.

WE DON'T BUY THEM.

"Buy your Christmas presents now!" is the legend that meets us in the window of an up-town store.

Thank you for the advice—but we won't do any such a thing, oh, no!

We always kindly permit our friends to buy them for us.

CHISTMAS SLIPPERS

This is the time of the year when useless girls derive exquisite pleasure in getting up slippers, the cost of which is out of all proportion to their value, and then think it a good joke to tell their shoemaker to "send the bill to pa—but be sure and not send it until after Christmas."

"It is a perfectly safe wager that there is not a "pa" in the land will see where the joke comes in.

CHRISTMAS STOCKINGS.

The old saying that "hanging is too good for them" is never understood to apply to the Christmas stockings.

And talking about stockings—"Stockings be hanged!" says the St. Louis girl, "It is only the Chicago belle who expects to find a grand piano in a sock."

HER CHRISTMAS GOOSE.

Mrs. A.: Are you going to have a goose this Christmas?

Mrs. B.: I have cooked my Christmas goose already.

Mrs. A.: Why—you don't tell me so?

Mrs. B.: Yes, I badgered my dear husband out of a sealskin sacque worth four hundred dollars!

HER CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

A gentleman sauntered into a large dry-goods store, a few days before Christmar and remarked: "I want something for a Christmas present for my wife." The clerk suggested various things, but the customes seemed not quite satisfied. At last he asked: "Have you cotton cloth?" "Certainly, sir."

falling off in the supply, both as regards quality and quantity. Everywhere I hear of a depression in the shorthorn business, and its effect will be pretty visible in 1892. It is proverbial that when things get to the worst they mend, and I trust that breeders will bear the proverb in mind. If the unwholesome and idiotic prices of a few years back are not again reached, and I think they will be, there will soon be a sharp demand for shorthorn bulls at trade prices. Now trade price means a price at which the animal can be delivered at a capable age without loss Debit—(1) Cow, worth $100 say one fourth of its breeding life, equal $25; (2) service of bull, $5; (3) feed of cow one year, equal $35; (4) feed, attendance of calf after six months' sucking, at $5 per month for eight months, $40. The breeder, I contend, must get over $100 for his bull calf before he can make a cent of profit, and then he is out of pocket $5 a month for every month he keeps the animal after his fourteenth month, which is early enough for even limited service I am presuming that he turns out a meritorious animal in high condition, and I defy anybody to do so for less than $100; but if anybody wants to challenge my figures, I am prepared in another communication to go into details. Now the ordinary farmer still thinks $100 a high price for a young bull, and no wonder, as he spends his life among scrubs worth less than $15 at the same age, and his mind is not prone to grasp the situation and the steps that lead to it. He can't get over the idea that the breeder is making a lot of money out of him, and he leaves—to buy a half-bred bull for $25.

"This being so, who is going to educate him up to the mark? His county paper is generally published by a man who knows a little of everything except farming and breeding, and his weekly newspaper, therefore, never brings him tidings of improvement in his own trade. I know no weekly country paper that pays an intelligent attention to the education of its country readers in their own walk of life. If a farmer takes a daily paper he only finds himself drowned in politics. The writers in the monthly agricultural press write over his head. It is true that laudable efforts of late have been made through the instrumentality of winter lectures to farmers' institutes to disseminate truth among this very unreceptive class of people, but no good result is yet visible. As well try to make beer of the waters of the Toronto bay by swimming round it with a sample bag of barley tied between the shoulders. If Messrs. Frankland, Thompson, Flannigan, Dunn, Loonis, Verral, Bleng, Sheridan, Lemon, Crawford, McLennan and others (to quote only Toronto names) do not wish to see their trade slip away from them, why don't they take steps to insure a supply of bullocks, and of better bullocks? It would pay them to hire two or three competent lecturers at a good salary and send them round the township to lecture. A few men like Arthur Johnson going the rounds and addressing the farmers from their own standpoint and in their own vernacular would do more than an army of professors; and the Local Government might be expected to help in some way." "T.C.P." is a little hard on the respective faculties of farmers, but, for all he speaks good sound common sense, and a convention of cattle breeders might well be held to consider the best place to be adopted to encourage cattle-breeding on the lines he lays down.

An English correspondent says that his shepherd and himself were one evening attracted by the singular movements of a fox. He was walking round and round a tree, steadily keeping his eyes fixed on some object in the branches. Bushes being near, give the said statement an unqualified denial. It is time that every civilized community put all boxing matches for money on the same footing as prize-fighting out and out, and then boors and liars of the Sullivan type would speedily become relics of the past, and their brutal strength would have to be used in production itstead of destruction.

The $105,000 paid for Axtell has set all America talking about high prices for horses, and a New York paper publishes the following list of high-priced thoroughbreds:

IN AMERICA.

Kentucky, b. h., 4, by Lexington..	$40,000
King Thomas, yearling colt, by Ban Fox.....	20 000
Dewdrop, b. f., 3, by Falsetto.....	29,500
Brother of Bassett, b, c., 3, by Lexington.....	25 000
Vigil, b, c., 3, by Virgil.....	25 000
Duke of Magenta, 3, by Lexington.	20 000
Ban Fox, b. c., 2, by King Ban....	20,000
Iroquois, br. h. (stallion), by Leamington.....	20,000

The highest priced imported stallions are Rayon d'Or, by Fageolet, for which W. L. Scott paid $33,000; Mortemer, by Compiegne, for which Pierre Lorillard paid $25,000, he having previously paid $15,000 for Glenlyon, by Stockwell, and St. Blaise, by Hermit, imported by Mr. Belmont at a cost of $15,000. Contrast these figures with the $250 paid in England for Diamond in 1799 He was the winner of the first Derby, and after his arrival in this country is said to have been sold for $5,000.

Some very high prices have been paid in England—the largest for the unbeaten Ormond, for stallion service, near Buenos Ayres, whence a great many high priced horses have been sent during the last five years. All the others, with the exception of Kangaroo, were sold for breeding purposes in England. Kangaroo was sold to the Marquis of Hastings in his "plunging" days, back in the "sixties."

Ormond, by Bend Or.....	$75,000
Doncaster, by Stockwell.....	70 000
Kangaroo, by West Australian....	70 000
Blair Athol, by Stockwell.....	62 500
Busybody, by Petrarch.....	44 000
Harvester, by Sterling.....	43 000
Gladiateur, by Monarque.....	35 000
Isonomy, by Sterling.....	30 000
Spinaway, by Macaroni.....	27,500
Wheel of Fortune, by Adventurer..	25 000
Jannette, by Lord Clifden.....	21 000
Cantinere, by Stockwell.....	20,500
Louisbourg, by Hampton.....	20,000
Foxhall (American), by King Alfonso.....	20,000

Of the above, Busybody, Harvester, Spinaway, Wheel of Fortune, Jannette, Cantinere and Louisbourg were sold at the late Lord Falmouth's famous break-up sales in 1884.

An Essential of Success.

Young Authoress (with bundle of manuscript): Would you like a story of a pair of young lovers who separated and each married some one else, and years after, when his wife was dead and her husband was dead, the two met again and the old love rekindled?

Experienced Publisher: Um—I'm afraid that wouldn't be a success nowadays, but if you'd rewrite the story and have the man's wife and the woman's husband both alive when the two meet again and the old love rekindles it would sell like hot cakes.—[Puck

Dick (aged eight, with disgusted air, to Tommy, aged ten, whose efforts at telling "a whopper" were not a success)—"If yer agoin' ter lie, why don't yer stand up te it like a man?"

"I want eight new shirts. Eight times four are thiryy-two. I'll take thirty-two yards."

The gratitude of the wife at receiving as a Christmas present the cloth for eight new shirts for her husband can be imagined.

EDITORS' PRESENTS.

The dry goods clerk always gets the bulge on the poor journalist in making Christmas presents. The editor can never put his hands on anything except an old mouldy paste pot, a rusty pair of scissors, and a box of steel pens, suspender buttons, and burned matches. And yet we hear people talking about the even distribution of justice. That is just like a fellow looks at the matter. We are open for an engagement as dry goods clerk.

Our girl must have an even show somehow, when it comes to the matter of Christmas presents.

WILFUL WASTE.

"Did you stop at Shears the tailor's?"

"Yes and I gave him fits."

"What did you do that for? You'll never get 'em back."

TOO MUCH TURKEY.

Little Frank, having eaten more turkey on Christmas than was good for him, complained bitterly.

On being asked where the pain was, he answered, with great seriousness, pressing his tiny hand upon his chest, "I think, papa, it must be in my wish-bone, 'cause it's right here."

A Sad Case.

"I reckon,' said farmer Begosh, "that Josiah might ez well be kep home from college. The base-ball is over, an' he can't learn much anyhow. Besides, I'm afraid it's kind o' mixin' his mind up."

"What makes you think so, Ezra?" asked Mrs. Begosh.

"Waal, I was to see him the other day, and every once in a while he would say sumthin' that seemed to hev no bearin' on anything in pertickier. Ez we wuz walkin' together along the street, he interrupted me an' says 'and the band played.'"

"I thought I might as well humor him, an' I says gently: 'Well, sposen' it did, Josiah?' Says he: 'That's all right, pop; you're a good one, but you ain't on.' 'Ain't on what?' sez I. 'You ain't tryin' to give me the razzle dazzle, are you?' he says, with an air of seriousness that made me sad. I told him I hadn't no razzle dazzle to give, so as to kind o' quiet him, an' he laughed in a satisfied way. He was purty quiet after that, only for askin' me where I got that hat over an' over ag'in, although he knew as well as I did where I bought it, havin' been with me at the time. I don't know whether to bring him home, or have him sent to a hospital or somethin'."

What is Needed

By every man and woman if they desire to secure comfort in this world is a corn sheller. Putnam's Corn Extractor shells corns in two or three days and without discomfort or pain. Mr. Zero—"What was that sigh for, my dear?" Mrs. Zero—"Nothing." Mr. Zero—"I didn't know but what 'twas me as usual." Mrs. Zero—"It was—a cipher is usually nothing."

A Business-like Offer.

For many years the manufacturers of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy have offered, in good faith, $500 reward for a case of Nasal Catarrh which they cannot cure. The Remedy is sold by druggists at only 50 cents. This wonderful remedy has fairly attained a world-wide reputation. If you have dull, heavy headache, obstruction of the nasal passages, discharges falling from the head into the throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody and putrid; if the eyes are weak, watery and inflamed; if there is ringing in the ears, deafness, hacking or coughing to clear the throat, expectoration of offensive matter, together with scabs from ulcers; the voice being changed and has a nasal twang; the breath offensive; smell and taste impaired; sensation of dizziness, with mental depression, a hacking cough and general debility, you are suffering from nasal catarrh. The more complicated your disease, the greater the number and diversity of symptoms. Thousands of cases annually, without manifesting half of the above symptoms, result in consumption, and end in the grave. No disease is so common, more deceptive and dangerous, or less understood, or more unsuccessfully treated by physicians.

When all other sins grow old, avarice is young.

Would you know the keen delight
Of a wholesome appetite,
Undestrained by colic's dire,
Headache's curse, or fever's fire
Thoughts morose, or icy chills?
Then use Dr. Pierce's pills.

Dr. Pierce's Purgative Pellets—the original and only genuine Little Liver Pills; 25 cents a vial.

A high note—One of a thousand dollars.

The only guaranteed cure for all blood taints and humors, eruptions, pimples, blotches, scalp diseases and scrofulous sores and swellings, is Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. You get a cure or money paid for it promptly returned.

"The Czar left £500 for the poor of Berlin, and he gave a very handsome present to his Alexander Regiment, and numerous diamond snuff boxes and a shower of decorations were distributed, but his gifts appear insignificant when compared with those of his grandfather, the Emperor Nicolas, when he visited England for a week in June, 1844. He gave £2 000 to the servants at Windsor Castle, and £1,000 to the housekeeper; £4,000 to various charities; $500 annually for a cup at Ascot, which was continued until 1854; a parure of diamonds, worth £2,000, to Mme. Brunnow, the wife of his Ambassador; twelve gold snuff boxes, with his portrait set in diamonds, among the great officers and lords of the Queen's household; twelve gold snuff boxes, with his cipher in diamonds, among the equerries and grooms-in-waiting; literally a sackful of brooches, watches, rings, and pins, which were distributed among the small fry who had been useful to him or in some way concerned with his visit.

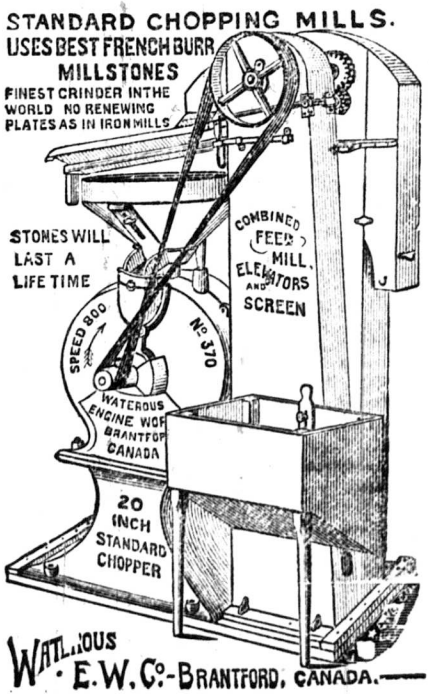
STANDARD CHOPPING MILLS.

USES BEST FRENCH BURR MILLSTONES

FINEST GRINDER IN THE WORLD NO RENEWING PLATES AS IN IRON MILLS



WATEROUS E.W. Co.-BRANTFORD, CANADA.

JOSEPH MADDAUGH WRITES FROM MORRISON P.O

NOVEMBER 26TH, 1889.

Now that I have purchased from you one of your Standard French Burr Chopping Mills, turning in on it as part pay my Iron Grinder, I have no objection to tell you that the plates used in the Iron Grinder cost $2 00, and latterly but $1.00 per pair.

I used over $50 00 worth last winter. Occasionally a plate would last a week, but sometimes not over two or three hour.

The price of the mill was $65.00, much cheaper than yours, but in the end was a very much dearer mill. I am satisfied that Iron Grinders are only suitable for farmers who have a very small amount of chopping to do for their own use.

J. COMEAU & CO., MANIWAKI, QUE, WRITES:

NOVEMBER 23RD, 1889.

I would feel inclined to apologise for not writing sooner, had I not been too busy and my desire to give the 20-inch Standard Mill a fair trial before writing.

I am most happy to state that I am entirely satisfied with the mill, it is doing splendid work.

FOR SALE.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, DEC. 6, 1889.

The Legislative Assembly of Ontario has been summoned for January 30th, for the transation of business. The Dominion Parliament Assembles on January 16th.

Rev. Dr. Williams, General Superintendent of the Methodist Church, died, at Toronto, last Tuesday night. Methodism has suffered a great loss in the death of the venerable Doctor. He was an indefatigable worker, an eloquent preacher and an eminently Godly man.

Queen's University has been celebrating its jubilee this week. Notables from various parts of the Province were present, including the Govenor General. Lord Stanley received the degree of Doctor of Laws, and is now entitled to be called, Doctor Stanley. We trust that Queen's may continue to progress, and that ever increasing instalments of educated young men may be sent out from her halls, thoroughly equipped for life's struggles.

The report is current that Warden Filson is to supplant Dr. Meacham as the Tory candidate for the approaching Provincial election. The Doctor is meeting with such poor success in his canvas that he is said to be anxious to get out of the contest as speedily as possible. We thought that something of this kind was in the wind when the Warden announced that he would withdraw from municipal politics, and that, too, just when his sworn opponent, Major Patterson, had announced that he would oppose him in January next. The secret is now out. The Warden aspires to a higher seat, and as "the party" feel that they are courting defeat in allowing Dr. Meacham to oppose Bowen E. Aylsworth, they are more than willing to swap horses before the time arrives to cross the stream. Mr. Aylsworth has so many sterling qualities that he is receiving the warm support of many Conservatives and his election is a foregone conclusion.

Planting Windbreaks.

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.

SIR.—Perhaps you will allow me again to suggest to your readers the infinite advantages which would follow, if every young man, on starting in farm life on a property of his own, would plant along the north, or most exposed side, a plantation of hardwood or pine trees. Young trees can be got from the bush, or from the nursery, the cost would not be much; but the bene-the cost would not be much; but the benefits, if many could be induced to carry out the plan, would be very great. The country, for want of the forests which covered it once, is drying up. Crops are not nearly so large as were formerly obtained, and there is apparently but one remedy, namely, to restore some proportion of the old forests. If every here and there, a good plantation, well cared for, and above all things, kept clear from cattle, existed, I have no doubt from what has been observed in other countries, that a very beneficial effect would follow with reference to the agriculture of our own. All lands in our zone need either woods to the south or woods intermixed. The woods to the south have long been cut away. The woods intermixed are fast following. If our farmers do not desire to see Ontario crops lower far beyond their present scale they must plant trees. They must neither grudge the land nor the labor. The average of Ontario fall wheat is now not more than between sixteen and twenty bushels an acre. I can remember when it fully doubled that. The difference was that we had more forest. Yours etc.

The Methodist people of this community are anticipating a very pleasant time at their Christmas Anniversary Services. The Rev. T. W. Cleworth, of Thomasburgh, is to preach on Sabbath, both morning and evening. The Tea Meeting is to be held on Christmas day, in the usual first class style. The Rev. A. B. Chambers, Chairman of Napanee District, with Revs. E. E. Howard, of Napanee, and W. H. Peake, of Morven, are to give addresses. There will be choice selections of music, and the committee have reduced the fee equal to the price of barley. Five hundred persons may come.

GREAT SALE

WILL BE CONTINUED UNTIL

NEW YEAR'S DAY.

$10,000 worth of goods must be sold out of the stock by that date.

Many lines will be cleared out at cost prices, and large reduction from regular prices on all others.

We are going out of some branches of trade altogether.

Our Fur business has grown so largely the past two years that it is now large enough to take all our time and attention alone.

WE WILL CLEAR OUT all our DRESS GOODS AND SILKS at cost.

We will clear out our Tweeds and Overcoatings at cost, and make them to order at lower prices than you can find anywhere else for equal quality.

WE WILL GIVE you big reductions on Flannels, Blankets, Tiedowns, Table Linens, etc.

We will give you grand, royal, bargains all over the house.

The balance of our Carpets will be cleared out at prime cost prices.

Profit not so much an object with us just now as to have our stock reduced to the smallest possible proportions before stock making.

A word to all who owe us. We have been patient and haven't dunned you to death. We sympathize with you on the low prices of produce and scarceity of money, but it is now the time of year, when we expect every account settled by cash or note, and must have it done.

CHEAPSIDE.

YOUNG FOLKS.

One Small Boy's Christmas.

The small boy looked at the Christmas tree,
And straining his eager eyes to see,
Says he:
"Now, I wonder just what they have got for me.

"By Gee!
There's a bully old pair of nickeled skates,
The size of which clearly indicates
That they're meant for a boy of about my size—
If I get them I'll draw a prize.

"Then over there is a dandy drum,
Which I'm rather led to believe will come
My way, and a printing press and type see,
Which would be just about the thing for me.

"That clipper sled looks mighty fine,
And I shouldn't wonder if that were mine,
And I'm rather inclined to think, from looks
Of things, that I'll get that box of books.

"And the shotgun up there behind the tree
I'm mighty sure is designed for me;
And the camera and the baseball bat
Are coming to me, I'll bet my hat!"

The camera went to another boy
And loaded him up with peaceful joy,
While the case of type and the printing press
Filled his cousin Tom with happiness;
And the nickeled skates, his brother Jim
Remarked, with a grin, belonged to him,
And the dandy drum and the clipper sled
Were both designed for his cousin Ned.
But when the small boy sadly saw
The shotgun go he dropped his jaw,
And doleful indeed became his looks
When he lost his grip on the box of books,
While the thing that simply knocked him flat
Was the fact that he missed the baseball bat.

AND

All that gladdened that small boy's life
Was a candy bag and a new jack-knife.

AUNT JANE'S PAPER OF PINS.

"I say now, Aunt Jane, what would you like for a Christmas present?"

Aunt Jane looked at her small nephew, who from his corner by the fire hurled this question at her in the twilight. "What would I like?' she said, briskly. "Oh, a set of Browning in Russia leather, or Omar Khayyam, or a new silk dress, or Millet's 'Angelus,' the etching, in a carved frame, or—"

"Oh, pshaw, now, Aunt Jane!" Fred interrupted, "you know we can't get one of those things. I meant—you know what I meant."

"You said what would I like?" answered Aunt Jane. She was rather fond of taking the children up for careless speaking, but Fred knew well enough the twinkle of fun that was in her eye now.

"Well, I meant what would you like that we could get," Fred said. "I do say picking and choosing is worse than anything when you haven't much money, and we haven't, you know."

"No!" Aunt Jane said, dropping the long mitten she was knitting for Fred. "Well, then, a paper of pins."

"Oh come now, auntie, that isn't fair;

"We picked him up in a twinkling and it was not many minutes before we found that one of his poor little legs was broken.

"'I'll go for the doctor,' said grandpa, at once; and then he sank back into a chair and groaned, remembering that we had no horse, and that he could not fight his way through those drifted roads. I dare say we were foolish old people, but we absolutely didn't dare try to set that leg, and meantime it began swelling, and poor little Tom never for a minute stopped crying.

"'And to think, father,' I said, through my own tears, 'the express will go by within a quarter of a mile of us, and we can't stop it. Oh, if we could! for maybe there is doctor on board, and he'd come for little Tom's sake.'

"But the express did not go by. It whistled, and we could see from the window that the track was again blocked, and that it would have to be cleared.

"'Hurry, father,' I cried; 'see if you can wade across the field, and get help.'

"But there was no need. While he was tying on his scarf, there came a kicking and stamping at the kitchen door, and when we opened it, there stood your father, and weren't we glad then he'd studied to be a doctor!

"'Train had to stop, he explained, 'so I got out and waded across lots. Mary's gone on to town, and is going to spend the night there, but I had an impression I'd better stop and see to you.'

"It wasn't long before the poor little leg was safely within splints, and Tom had gone to sleep holding his father's hand. Next day, the roads were broken, and a horse sled brought Mary, your mother, to us."

Christmas!

Another Christmas! One more year has passed to the eternities. What have you been doing during this time? The great Nazarene came into the world at Bethlehem to restore a nearly lost equilibrium and give us a new testament of that immortality which was dimly foreshadowed in the old testament of the patriarchs and prophets and singers. It was His mission to sweep away the clouds that obscured the heavens so that man could stand up and ask of his Father that which he desires without the intervention of professional oracles in Greece or the priests of Isis in Egypt, or of other intermediaries, pagan or non-pagan. A poetess below speaks of the gospel of love as a catholicon for evil and a creator of happiness in the Here. So it is, also, in the Hereafter. Our dual lives, natural and spiritual, enable us to live in both the Here and Hereafter. Who preaches the gospel of love? Are they those who leave Jesus of Nazareth and his supernal doctrines to make the pulpit ring with sectional politics. Are they those who keep alive the embers of the dead past as journalists and other authors and politicians, and thus make mischief which delights excarnated spirits? These people preach the gospel of hate, and the gospel of hate is the gospel of the hells. There are other preachers of the gospel of hate, the Czars and the Alexanders, and the epauletted professionals who make war their pastime and their aggrandizement. The only real gospel of love which has been preached in its fullness is that which rose and rises from the hearts of mothers for their offspring. Were it not for motherhood and those little refiners, babies, the world would be in the shadow of night. George Barlow, the "new poet" of England, beautifully writes:

Each child upon the planet born
Brings back that planet's early morn
In the sweet sunrise in his face.

WHO WOULD BE A CZAR?

Uneasy, Indeed, Is the Head Wearing the Crown of All the Russias.

The Emperor of Russia is in a state of panic which can neither be imagined nor described. It was given out that he would be the guest of the German Emperor at the Marble Palace, Potsdam, and when all kinds of expensive preparations had been made there, he decided that he would be safer in Berlin, and a large sum was expended in arranging for his reception at the Schloss. Finally, only one day before the Emperor arrived, Count Schouvaloff received a telegram from Copenhagen to intimate that His Majesty would alight at the Russian Embassy, and the message was by the arrival of the Imperial workmen, seven in number, who now go in advance of the Emperor whenever and wherever he travels. There are two carpenters, two masons, two locksmiths and a foreman. They most carefully examine the chimneys, locks, flooring, walls and furniture of the house which the Emperor is to occupy, and his own apartments are subjected to a most rigorous search. The chimneys are objects of special attention, and every flue which leads to a room which the Emperor is likely to enter is thoroughly barred both top and bottom, and, as if these precautions were not sufficient, police agents from St. Petersburg patrol the roof both night and day.

Both in appearance and in manner the Emperor has became a Muscovite of the old Cossack type. He is a colossal figure, being a giant both in height and in girth, quite bald, with a flat nose, an immense sweeping mustache and a stupendous beard, which flows over his chest. I learn that he has been both by the accident to the Shah's special train, the official report of which disaster was laid before him when he reached St. Petersburg. The embankment along which the train was running collapsed, the accident being an exact repetition of the one which befell the Imperial train at Borki last year, and the Emperor is now convinced that all the Russian railways are rotton, so that, in the event of war, there would be a complete failure in the transport arrangements, and if the railways are all wrong, His Majesty justifiably concludes that, probably, he would find his army and navy in a similar condition when the time of trial arrives.

The Emperor is, as I have often before remarked, in constant dread of assassination, and this state of ever present fear, added to the hereditary melancholy of the Romanoff family, has so utterly shattered his nerves that for days together he is practically not responsible for his actions. He smokes incessantly, and not only endeavors to sustain his spirits by copious libations of champagne and brandy, but of late he has taken to drugging himself with chloral.

Where Does It Rise?

Where does the river St. Lawrence rise? How many of our readers can answer this question in geography? Some will probably say in Lake Ontario; others, in Lake Superior. Neither answer is quite correct.

Like the Amazon, this river has a different name for each part of its course. The lower part of the great South American river is called by the natives the Amazonas, the middle part is the Solimoes, and the upper the Maranon.

So the St. Lawrence, between Lake Erie that isn't any present."

"It's something I want, and something you can afford to buy, isn't it?" Aunt Jane said, laughing a little, as she picked up her knitting. "But be sure they are the best make, Fred; I can't use poor pins." And with that she left Master Fred to his meditations.

"A paper of pins—pshaw! Aunt Jane just likes to tease us boys. If she wasn't just an up-and-down jewel of an aunt about kites and gingerbread, and painting sleds and all the rest, I'd feel like taking her at her word. A paper of pins—hum!"

And therewith there crept into Fred's brain the first glimmer of an idea. Presently he shared it with Kate, the sister next older, and then with Will and Mary, and then with mamma; and the result was this:

On Christmas morning there appeared at Aunt Jane's door a procession of children carrying a large roll, which, after due greetings, they solemnly unrolled on the bed where Aunt Jane lay. At the head of the sheet was a pretty lace-pin from mamma (a golden arrow in filigree), next a handsome shawl-pin in wrought silver from papa, then some fancy hair-pins in tortoise shell from Kate, and then every variety of pin the shops afford—large and small, black and white, milliner's pins, hat-pins, hair-pins, safety-pins, sleeve button-pins—all ranged neatly down the paper. And under all was fastened a handsome card—Mary's work—which stated that the linchpin and the thole-pin sent their compliments, which they thought would be more acceptable to a lady's toilet-table than they themselves would be.

Grandma's Christmas.

"Were you ever truly thankful at Christmas, grandma?" asked Jean, the household ingénue and pet, "right down thankful for real things, I mean, and not just thinking whether the turkey is big enough or the squash as good as it was last year?"

"I often think I am," said grandma, smiling over her knitting, "and once I know I was."

"Tell me about it," was, of course, the next demand, and grandma, unrolling another length of yarn, began her story.

"It was a long time ago, according to the reckoning of such young things as you, when grandpa and I lived in the little house in Canton, not far from the railroad track. Still, it was a good ways from the station, and though the express trains whizzed by within a quarter of a mile of us, we had to travel seven miles before we could take one.

"One fall, before you were born, your father and mother went out West to visit your other grandma and left your brother Tom with me. He was only four then, and a dear little pet and comfort. We hoped they would be home by Christmas Day, but two days before, the greatest snowstorm I ever knew so early in the season, began to pack the roads, and even cover the fences.

"'No use to expect 'em,' said grandpa, 'the trains will be blocked up, and we might as well give 'em up for a week or so.'

"The snow kept coming, and on the very eve of Christmas the railway track was so completely covered that, although men had been trying to clear it all day long we knew the express would have a hard time to get through.

"We made up our minds to have a cosey Christmas all to ourselves, and tried to comfort little Tom, who had made up his mind that he must see papa and mamma that very night. I put him to bed and with that our troubles began; for Tom, tired of lying awake for perhaps ten minutes, got up in the dark, tried to find his way downstairs and fell from top to bottom of the steep staircase.

Christianity commenced with a woman and will end with a woman. Mothers like Mary illustrate best on the birthday of the Reformer and Savior the love and tenderness and beauty of true Christianity. Here is the poem;

CHRISTMAS.

Eighteen hundred years! yes, almost nineteen hundred.
Since over the manger-cradle the wise men leaned and wondered.
Eighteen hundred years; and yet the world to day
Is blind to the meaning of truths that Jesus was sent to say.
Eighteen hundred years! and yet men stand and preach
Creeds and canons and dogmas, beyond the tired mind's reach.
While all the sad souls want and all the sad souls need,
Is Love, Love, Love, for that was the Saviour's creed.
Eighteen hundred years! and yet the churches contend;
But Love was in the beginning, and Love will be in the end.
For Love is the only law that knows no alteration,
And Love is the only door that leads us into salvation.
Eighteen hundred years! and men are doubting still!
But Love is the way to peace, and all may find it who will.
We have only to keep on loving, and lo! the path appears
Though the world has been slow to see it, for eighteen hundred years!

The Singing Shepherds.

To Bethlehem, at dead of night,
Came shepherds hurrying;
At dead of night, to Bethlehem,
A seeking for the King.

In the dark streets of Bethlehem
Red blazed the inn before;
"He is not there," the shepherds
And passed by the door.

Loud roared the revellers within,
Then drowsed to sleep again;
"Glory to God!" the shepherds said,
"And peace, good will to men!"

For they did seem to hear once more
The angels on the hill;
In the dark streets of Bethlehem
They sang of God's good will.

So came they to a stable mean,
And heard across the air
The crying of a little Child
And knew the King was there.

LIZETTE WOODWORTH REESE.

A Source of Annoyance.

A gentlemen, coming home at evening, spoke harshly to his little three-year-old, who was playing very noisily.

The little lady dropped her playthings and retreated hastily to a corner.

"What's the matter?" asked papa.

"Well," said the child, "I've been a good girl all this day, and now you come home and make trouble the first thing."

Very Seldom.

"What is the use of flopping your claws around in that fashion?" said the oyster to the crab. There's no use in getting excited."

"I'll bet you'd be excited if you were in my place," said the crab.

"I don't lose my temper."

"At all events it is very seldom that you get into a stew."

and Lake Ontario, is called the Niagara, between Lake Erie and Lake Huron the St. Clair and Detroit River, and between Lake Huron and Lake Superior the St. Mary's River. Yet are these all one and the same river, the lakes being but so many expansions of its waters.

Beyond Lake Superior, to the northward, there is still another portion of its course, called the Nepigon, a noble stream of clear, azure-tinted water nearly as large as the Hudson in volume, which flows down from the great Lake Nepigon in the heart of the Canadian wilderness.

Until recently Lake Nepigon has been but little known. On our maps it is figured as a much smaller lake then it really is. Its actual dimensions are about seventy-three miles in length by fifty-one in breadth, These figures give but an inadequate idea of its size, for there are five great bays varying from twenty to ten miles in length. The actual coast line of the lake is not much less than six hundred miles.

Twelve rivers of considerable size, four of them rising far up on the "divide" toward James Bay, flow into it, and its waters rival those of Lake George in purity and clearness. It literally swarms with whitefish and trout.

The Nepigon River—the outlet of the lake—may be fairly termed the northerly and upper course of the St. Lawrence, not only from its size, exceeding greatly all other rivers flowing into Lake Superior, but from the clearness and color of its water, and other general characteristics.

Whereas the other smaller rivers of Lake Superior are "black-water" rivers, that is to say, having turbid or stained water, the Nepigon is clear and a beautiful river of the same azure, sea green and marine-blue water which one sees at Niagara and in the St. Lawrence.

Strange Occupations for Women.

At Martha's Vineyard a dumb woman owns and manages a schooner and earns a living as a fisherman. Between times she peddles threads and buttons along the coast. At Cincinnati there is also a boat woman who earns her living on the water. In Maine many women are farmers, working from 200 to 300 acres, and, of course, finding time to read the magazines. At Louisville a Mrs. Shelby is sexton of St. John's cemetery. At Gardiner, Me., Mrs. Preble is a marble and granite cutter employing ten or twelve men. In New York City Mrs. Gill is is a shoemaker. The best of her work is cobbling. Also in New York Mrs. Emma Yewdell gets along fairly well keeping a livery stable. San Francisco and Brooklyn have each a woman blacksmith, Mrs. Lena Seigfried, of New Orleans, is a bird hunter, living on her father's schooner, and able to kill, clean and prepare more birds to the hour than any male hunter along the coast. In New Orleans more than any other city we have women engaged in occupations unusual to the sex. Here are to be found women editors, merchants, florists, dairy farmers and manufacturers in great numbers, all earning good sums of money.—[New York Paper.

An Afflicted Family.

Old Lady (to small boy, who is endeavoring to attach tin can to dog's tail)—"You naughty little boy! What would your mother say if she saw you acting so cruelly?"

Small Boy—"She wouldn't say anything; she's dumb.

"But if your father could see you, be—"

"Would give all he's worth; he's blind."

CHRISTMAS CANDY.

HICKORYNUT CANDY.—Two cups of sugar, half a cup of water. Boil until thick, flavor with extract of lemon, stir in one cup of hickory nut meats, turn in a large flat dish. When cold cut in squares.

ALMOND CANDY.—To one pound of sugar take half a pint of water and the white of one egg, let stand a short time, then boil a few minutes, skim and boil until thick. Mix in a pound of blanched almonds, take from the fire, stir, and pour on buttered plates.

COCOANUT CANDY.—A pound and a half of white sugar and one pound of grated cocoanut; add the milk of the cocoanut to sugar, boil five minutes, put in the grated cocoanut, boil ten minutes longer, and stir to keep from burning. Pour on buttered plates to harden.

NOUGAT.—Drop a pound of almonds in boiling water, skin, when cool, cut in pieces. Dissolve a pound of sugar with a little water. Pour in the almonds, and cook eight minutes. Grease a pan, set in a warm place, put the almonds and sugar on, press them to the side and bottom of the pan with a lemon cut in halves. Take off the stove, turn on a plate and cool.

CHOCOLATE CARAMELS.—Put half a pound of chocolate, half a teacup of molasses, a cup of sweet milk, two pounds of brown sugar and two ounces of butter in a preserving kettle, set on the fire, let heat slowly, and stir until dissolved. Then boil until stiff. Take from the fire, flavor with vanilla, turn in a greased pan, when partly cool, mark in squares with a dull knife, stand in a cool place to harden.

CREAM DATES.—Put the white of one egg and a little cold water in a bowl; add a teaspoonful of vanilla and beat until frothy, add sugar to make a stiff paste, work with the hands until smooth, form in small balls, lay on greased paper, and put in a cool place to dry. Remove the stones from large dates and press the little balls into the place, roll in granulated sugar and set away to harden.

QUICK MOLASSES CANDY.—One cup of New Orleans molasses; one half cup of light brown sugar, two tablespoons of vinegar, a piece of butter the size of an egg. Boil steadily about ten minutes, then try in cold water, if it hardens it is done. Just before taking it from the fire add one-fourth of a teaspoon of baking soda; do not dissolve it, but put it in dry. Pour on buttered plates to cool, and pull as soon as can be handled. Very nice pop-corn balls are made by having the corn roasted and leaving a little of the candy in the bottom of the kettle, pour in all the popped corn it will dampen, stirring carefully until it takes up the candy.

The Dusky Duck.

Within the blind, before 'tis light,
I take my place to watch, and wait
The coming of the morning flight
Of dusky ducks, to meet their fate.
The mist against the eastern sky
Is rising now; as breaks the day
The gloom is fading into light,
The horizon is streaked with gray.

I think that up the stream I see
A welcome sight, as in the air
A speck appears: yes, one, two, three,
Nine large black ducks towards me bear,
My trusty "Greener" with trembling hands
I closer grip, and try to calm
My breaking heart, while on the sands
I lower crouch, so that the charm

May not be broken; now the flock

AS YOU LIKE IT.

A THANKSGIVING HYMN.

For bud and for bloom and for balm-laden breeze,
For the singing of birds from the hills to the seas,
For the beauty of dawn and the brightness of noon,
For the light in the night of the stars and the moon,
We praise thee, gracious God.

For the sun-ripened fruit and the billowy grain,
For the orange and apple, the corn and the cane,
For the bountiful harvests now gathered and stored,
That by thee in the lap of the nations were poured,
We praise thee, gracious God.

For the blessing of friends, for the old and the new,
For the hearts that are trusted and trusting and true,
For the tones that we love, for the light of the eye
That warms with a welcome and glooms with good-bye,
We praise thee, gracious God.

That the desolate poor may find shelter and bread,
That the sick may be comforted, nourished and fed,
That the sorrow may cease of the sighing and sad,
That the spirit bowed down may be lifted and glad,
We pray thee, pitying Lord.

That brother the hand of his brother may clasp
From ocean to ocean in friendliest grasp,
That for north and for south and for east and for west,
The horror of war be forever at rest,
We pray thee, pitying Lord.

For the blessings of earth and of air and of sky,
That fall on us all from the Father on high,
For the crown of all blessing since blessing begun,
For the gift, "the unspeakable gift," of thy Son,
We praise thee, gracious God.

Sir Edward Guinness has donated $1,000,000 for the erection of dwellings for the laboring poor of London.

For the information of posterity a London newspaper has elicited, directly from the ex Lord Mayor, that he has partaken of 250 public dinners during his term of office.

According to a London daily, there are about 2,500 building associations, with over 600,000 members, in the United Kingdom Last year their receipts were upwards of $100,000,000.

The Japanese are fond of raw fish When the fisherman goes a-fishing he has a bottle of pepper-sauce along with him, and taking the fish from the hook, eats it at its freshest. This seems barbarous to us, and yet we eat raw oysters, and live oysters, too!

SPIRITUOUS STATISTICS.

Production of Wine in Various Countries—Our Consumption of Distilled Spirits.

The chief of the government bureau of statistics, in his recent report to the secretary of the treasury on the production, consumption, etc., of spirituous and malt liquors and wines, extended his investigations through a series of twenty years in order to compare the relation borne by the liquor industries in the United States to those of Great Britain, France, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Canada. The following are some of the leading characteristics exhibited, so far as relates to the countries mentioned: First, the rapid increase of the consumption of malt liquors in the United States; second, in the consumption of beer per capita Great Britain stands first, Germany second, the United States third, and Canada fourth; third, France is the largest consumer of wine per capita; fourth, Denmark appears to be the largest consumer of spirituous liquors per capita. From a report by the United States consul at Marseilles, dated Feb. 27, 1889, the production of wine in the principal wine-growing countries of the world, vintage of 1888, is given in gallons as follows: Australia, 1 902 024; Austria, 92,459 500; Algeria, 72,072 788; Cape Colony, 4 490 890; France, 795,274 534; Greece, 46 493 920; Hungary, 184 919,000; Italy, 798 242 489; Portugal, 132 085 000; Roumania, 18 418,900; Russia, 92 459 500; Servia, 52,834 000; Spain, 607,591,000; Switzerland, 29 058 700; Turkey and Cyprus, 68 684 200; United States, 32,000,000 It may interest prohibitionists to know in detail that during the year ending June 30, 1888, there were consumed in the United States distilled spirits as follows, the figures representing proof gallons: Domestic, from fruit, 888 107. Other—Bourbon whisky, 12 190,013; rye whisky, 5 148,244; alcohol, 10,487,938; rum, 1,114 544; gin, 803 288; highwines, 1,044,586; pure neutral, etc., 28,289,687; miscellaneous, 14,174 979 Total domestic, 74,201,386 Imported—Alcohol, 153,143; brandy, 437,519; cordials, etc., 143 780. Other—From grain, 646,107; from other material, 236 403 Total imported, 1,643,966. Total spirits, 75,845,952.

A Good Boy.

It was a bright morning in early spring. The sun was shining brightly, and the birds were singing in the tree tops. In a small old house facing an alley in the large city of New York, lived a poor widow and three children. John, who was the eldest of the boys, sold papers, while James and Ned stayed at home with their mother.

John was not always successful in selling his papers, and this made him very sad. At last, the time came when this poor family had no more food to eat, and they came near starving. One morning when John was walking along the street selling papers, he saw something drop from a lady's pocket who was walking ahead of him. John ran and picked it up. It was a purse with a large sum of money in it.

Now John was a good boy and knew it would not be right to keep the purse although they were poor and in need at home so he ran up to the lady and asked her if the purse belonged to her.

"Yes" she said, "I just lost it. Thank you, my boy. Come with me, and I will find you some work to do that will be better than selling papers. You were kind to find my purse and not have kept it, as most boys would have done."

Johnny walked along with the lady until they reached a large building. They went

Is surely coming to the blind:
My heart stops beating; here they come
On whirring pinions like the wind,
Just as they turn my right speaks out,
And bang! I spat! spat! now two ducks fall,
Then with the left through smoke and doubt
I speak, two answers to the call.

Two shots, four ducks, with rapture held,
There's nothing more I can desire.
. . . . .
My wife at once the dream dispelled
With "Come, get up and make the fire."

Marriage Festivities of Our Ancestors.

It may be of interest to know how they arranged marriages a hundred years ago. An old paper has the following description bearing upon the subject:—"Married in June, 1760, Mr. William Donkin, a considerable farmer of Great Tossor, near Rothbury, in the county of Cumberland, to Miss Eleanor Shotten, an agreeable young gentlewoman, of the same place. The entertainment on this occasion was very grand, there being no less than one hundred and twenty quarters of lamb, forty-four quarters of veal, twenty quarters of mutton, and a quantity of beef, twelve hams, with a suitable number of chickens, &c., which was concluded with eight half ankers of brandy made into punch, twelve dozen of cider, a great many gallons of wine, and ninety bushels of malt made into beer. The company consisted of five hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen, who concluded with the music of twenty-five fiddlers and pipers, and the whole was conducted with the utmost order and unanimity."

Hints on Hats.

Few seasons have been less rigorous in the matter of style; and if a woman's bonnet does not become her it will be her own fault, for the amplest play is allowed to personal taste. Certainly some modes predominate, and the theatre hat is becoming a specialty. Poppy-red is particularly fashionable for theatre and evening bonnets, and they are generally made of some delicate fabric, such as tulle or lace, or the lovely directoire frilling that can be gathered into tosettes and allowed to fall softly about the face.

Of winter bonnets the New York "World says that as they diminish in size, the hats increase at the brim and flatten in the crown. Charming black felts, with broad shovel brims, have a band of Astrachan running round the edge, and are trimmed with a couple of long-tailed black-birds and ribbon loops drawn forward from the back. These hats become almost every style of face.

Because.

"Freddie," said a little girl to her brother, "do you know why the world goes round and round?"

"Yes," replied Freddie promptly.

"Why?"

"Because it has its axis to grind."

— Millions of mocking birds are said to frequent the Yosemite Valley. A letter writer says their music is sometimes low and sweet, anon sad and plaintive, and then full rich and triumphant, like a pæan of joy and gladness. The effect upon the listener becomes almost unsupportable, so overpowering in sweetness is the volume in song Forunately, when the wind dies away, the thunder of the waterfall comes in to break the spell.

The beard of Henry S. Cook, a tailor, of Norwich, Conn., is as long as he is, Mr Cook is a small man, 60 years old. His beard is jet black and fine and silky, and so is his hair. When he is erect and his beard unfurled, he can step on six inches of it. He wears it ordinarily coiled in a wad inside his vest. Barnum wanted Mr. Cook to travel with his circus; but Cook is prosperous, and does not care to be a freak.

France is going to put an increased tax upon strong liquors as a means of checking their sale as much as possible, potato brandy and other strong and injurious liquor having come into use in the north, since the vineyards of France became injured by the phylloxera. The Germans will be sufferers by the taxation, if it becomes prohibitive, for they manufacture most of the infamously impure liquor which is drunk by the Belgians and the poorer classes in northern France.

Japanese gold thread, which is used in finer embroidery on account of its elegant lustre, consists of a core of silk or of wool and a spiral envelope of thin gilded paper. The strip of paper is only two-fiftieths to three fiftieths of an inch wide, and therefore must be wound with great care. The thread thus wound is saturated with shellac and then gilded. Compared to European gold thread, these threads possess the advantage of greater flexibility and finer lustre. In this they equal the beautiful gold thread of the middle ages, the manufacture of which for a long time was a lost art, and was recently discovered by microscopic investigation.

The disappearance of the buffalo from the North American plains is leading to the consideration of a possibility of the elephant becoming extinct in Africa. The consequences to the ivory trade would be dire, and the contingency may not be so remote as some think. The best ivory comes from Africa, and the destruction of elephants there annually is very great, one authority estimating that in fifty years the animals will be extinct. The consumption of ivory has been estimated at about 15,000 cwt. yearly, which would mean the destruction of perhaps 45,000 elephants, while the natives of Africa themselves kill a good many and retain the finest tusks for their own decoration. Our civilization demands knife-handles, combs, piano keys and billiard balls of ivory, and when the supply of material runs out some inventive genius will have to try his hand at a substitute, though the connoisseurs affect to believe that nothing can ever take the place of the best ivory.

CHRISTMAS.

...John told the lady his sad story, and she said she would give him work so that he might support himself and those at home. The lady then took him to a room in the large building. Here a man was sitting. The lady told John he was her father. He looked to be a very pleasant and good man, and so he was.

The lady then told her father the story, and he said, with a smile on his face, "I will give you work here, my boy, if you will come to me early in the morning, and I will pay you a good sum of money each month."

That night John ran home, very happy, and told his mother the good news. How surprised she was, and how glad that Johnny had work!

The next morning John went to work bright and early and did his many errands for the gentleman. Johnny earned enough in this way, so they were a much more happy family. It was all through Johnny's hands.

Burdettes's Advice.

Excellent advice does "Bob" Burdette, the genial humorist, give in one of his last magazine articles. Speaking of the lowering pettiness of spite he says:—"Every time you are tempted to say an ungentle word, or write an unkind line, or say a mean, ungracious thing about anybody, just stop; look ahead twenty five years, and think how it may come back to you then. Let me tell you how I write mean letters and bitter editorials, my boy. Sometimes, when a man has pitched into me and 'cut me up rough,' and I want to pulverize him I write a letter or editorial that is to do the business. I write something that will drive sleep from his eyes and peace from his soul for six weeks. Then, I don't mail the letter, and I don't print the editorial. I put the manuscript away in a drawer. Next day I look at it. The ink is cold; I read it over and say, 'I don't know about this.' There's a good deal of bludgeon and bowie-knife journalism in that. I'll hold it over a day longer.' The next day I read it again. I laugh and say, 'Pshaw!' I haven't hurt anybody, and the world goes right along making twenty-four hours a day as usual, and I am all the happier. Try it, my boy. Put off your bitter remarks until to-morrow. Then, when you try to say them deliberately, you'll find that you have forgotten them, and ten years later, ah! how glad you will be that you did! Be good-natured, my boy. Be loving and gentle with the world, and you'll be amazed to see how dearly and tenderly the worried, tired, vexed, harassed old world loves you." Good advice, from a humorist or anyone else.

Woman and Tobacco.

Woman. "How many of those cigars for a dollar?"

Dealer. "Twelve, ma'am. Shall I do them up?"

Woman. "No, I guess they're not the kind Charley smokes. I can get twenty-five for the same money on the next corner; and Charley tells me he is very economical in his smoking."

Practical Demonstration

"I understand," said a handsome young woman, entering the printing office, "that you employ only girls and that you are in need of a forewoman?"

"Yes," replied the printer. "Can you make up a form?"

"Just look at me and see," she answered, turning herself around.

She was engaged.

PARDONED AT LAST.

A THRILLING CHRISTMAS STORY BY "JACK FROST."

ACT THE FOURTH.

Mrs. Peyton and her son were frequent visitors at Fairlawn, and none were more welcome than they.

Myrtle was a great favourite with her, and a close bond of union was being cemented between them in these peaceful days, which might stand the strain of dark ones.

Erle had a long conversation with Mr. Dene when he pleaded for Myrtle's hand in marriage.

"My daughter is very young yet—a mere child, in fact, and you too have not seen many summers of your life," he said, gravely. "Hasty love-matches do not, as a rule, turn out well. I have no desire to thwart Myrtle's inclinations; I like you, and have no doubt you would make her an excellent husband."

"Then you permit our engagement?" Erle answered, eagerly.

"Yes, under certain conditions; that you obtain your father's consent;—that gained, that the marriage does not take place till Myrtle is twenty-two years of age (she is twenty now), and not even then, as certain matters in my past life are not satisfactorily cleared up."

"Myrtle said something to me about my bearing a close resemblance to an enemy of yours. Do your conditions refer to that?" Erle asked sadly.

"No; it is clear that you are not related to that man," Dene answered, readily. "I refer to some great wrong done to myself—an injustice it is impossible I can explain at the present moment."

"I am glad to hear you say that, sir. As regards my father, we expect him home shortly, when I am sure of gaining his consent; he has only to see Myrtle to love her as a daughter."

"I trust the love you profess for my child will stand the test of time," Dene said, gently; "strange and startling changes sometimes happen in this life."

"Nothing could change my deep affection for Myrtle; it would kill me if I lost her," he protested, warmly.

"I am content," Dene said, with a sigh. "May Heaven shield and protect you both, is my earnest prayer."

Erle Peyton was satisfied, and hastened to tell the good news to Myrtle, and henceforth they looked on each other as affianced man and wife.

At their period of life love was one continual poem; something fresh and new was inscribed on its pages daily—nay hourly.

The thoughts of each heart were pure, unsullied; no dark places were there—no spot which need be hidden from the searching gaze of the other.

The struggles, trials and difficulties of life had not touched them as yet; love's bark rode on a calm sea in unbroken sunlight.

'Twas a something to think of, to look back upon in after life—this perfect union of two hearts, with only one absorbing thought between them; it was an earthly Heaven such as Paradise must have been before the Fall.

It brought a secret joy to Mr. Dene's heart to see the tranquil content of the one being earth held for him. He was solaced for years of misery, of cruel punishment and torture; it seemed as if his evil genius was tired of persecuting him, and fled before the guileless, unselfish love of parent and alone in this room would drive her mad—turn her hair grey.

Such a mortal terror had seized upon her that when she rose from her chair, her limbs refused to support her, and she stumbled heavily against the wall which partitioned the study from the billiard room.

Something seemed to fly open suddenly, and when she recovered consciousness, she found herself lying in an open doorway. She had fallen against the spring of a secret door, which Mr. Dene, for some purpose best known to himself, had had made there.

All her courage came back to her now. Taking up the candle, and closing the secret door, she hastened up to the drawing-room, eager to begin perusing the diary.

Drinking some wine to steady her nerves, she seated herself in a cosy armchair, and after adjusting the reading-lamp, began to read.

So absorbed was she that the hours sped by, and still found her engaged in the task. The ormolu clock on the marble mantle-shelf chimed the hour of midnight.

"It will be three before they are home," she murmured. "I think I shall be missed of Fairlawn House after all."

Another hour passed, and still her absorption continued; what she read had a terrible fascination for her. About this time she thought she detected a stealthy footstep in the room, but put it down to nervousness, and read on.

"At last!" she murmured, as she closed the book. "I know all, and mean to use my power skilfully."

The next moment she was held down in her chair, and a handkerchief placed over her nose and mouth until she became insensible. 'Twas the work of a burglar, who wore a crape mask.

"Cleverly done," he muttered, and thereupon commenced to clear the room of everything valuable and portable, not forgetting Miss Becky's portmonnaie, which he took from her pocket, also her watch and chain. "She's safe enough for another hour," he chuckled. "This will be a good night's work for me; couldn't find a better crib to crack from here to John O'Groat's. Here's another sack-load of swag, matey," he said, handing it through the gate abutting on the river, "and here's some prime stuff to swig. I'm off for another lot."

"Better be satisfied, Jack," said a woman's voice from the boat; "them river police might spot us, or the family come back atop of you."

"I'll chance it," was the gruff reply. "If you hear a disturbance, row away like mad; I'll escape by the road."

"Hilloa, my man, who are you, and what do you want here?" said Erle Peyton, who, with his mother, had just returned in Dene's carriage.

The burglar's answer was to aim a terrific blow at his head with a life-preserver, which Erle warded off with his right arm.

The arm fell helplessly at his side; but before he could repeat the blow, Mr. Dene had him by the throat in a grip of iron, from which he could not shake himself free.

Myrtle and Mrs. Peyton screamed in chorus, as well they might, and a posse of alarmed servants were quickly on the spot, to whom Mr. Dene handed over the half strangled burglar.

Poor Erle Peyton was assisted to the upon him. He knew that the criminal was safely away, and trusted he would never meet him again in life. Publicity had been avoided, and to him that fact was of incalculable service.

But he was soon to be confronted by another danger from an unexpected quarter. He missed his keys, which Becky had kept in her pocket, thinking that she would be able to put back the diary before he returned. But Skinner's unexpected attack had rendered that impossible.

"Have you seen my keys, Myrtle?" he asked, anxiously, the second morning following the burglary.

"No, papa, have you lost them?"

"Yes! I wouldn't care so much if the bunch did not contain the keys of my study. I must ask the servants about them."

Poor Myrtle had been so upset by recent events that she had quite forgotten the fact of picking up the diary in the drawing-room at Miss Pride's feet. Her lover's state, though not critical, was sufficiently grave, too, to cause her anxiety. She had to receive visitors, anxious and curious about the recent events, and to answer numerous letters of condolance and inquiry. But the keys brought the circumstance to her recollection, and she said:

"Have you missed any of your private papers or books, papa?"

"I cannot tell what is missing until I find my keys," he said, fretfully. "These constant upsets are really too bad."

"Wait a minute!" she replied, with a strange expression, as a light began to dawn upon her. "I think I know where your keys are." Going straight to Becky's room, she said, quietly: "Did you find a bunch of keys?—papa has missed his."

A guilty flush came into her face, as she answered:

"Yes, I put them in my pocket; they were on the drawing-room table, dear."

"Thanks," said Myrtle, somewhat coldly, and returned to her father, to whom she gave the keys, saying, "Miss Pride found them, papa."

"I am very much obliged to her, I'm sure," he remarked, greatly relieved, and would have dismissed the incident from his mind if Myrtle had not said, as she placed the diary in his hand, "That is yours, papa—is it not?"

He flushed, and then turned as white as marble, on recongizing the book.

"I found it in the drawing-room, lying at Miss Pride's feet on the night of the burglary," she continued, speaking very gravely. "She must have been reading it."

He nodded, for his rage was too great to find vent in words: every secret of his life was laid bare to a designing woman—a traitoress—who, by this time knew that he was an escaped convict.

The same relentless fate that had sent him to Siberia still pursued him implacably—ruthlessly.

Was he never to find rest or peace? Was he to be hunted like a wild beast, and find no haven where he could hide until his innocence was made clear?

Myrtle read all this in the workings of his face, and if she ever hated a woman it was Becky Pride.

Laying her hand gently on his arm, she said, in accents of tender solicitude:

"Papa, you appear vexed—grieved. Is there anything compromising in that book?"

"Yes—it tells of my being an escaped convict!" he moaned, a piteous look in his eyes that cut her to the heart.

"Defy her—charge her with her treachery—with theft! Your name is not to it, surely; and even if it is, you can tell her that it was only the outline of a plot you had written for a novel. If you will permit me,

Those dark, brooding thoughts of vengeance, which had haunted him—been his constant companions for years—were slowly fading from his mind, to be replaced by others, better, holier.

Miss Becky Pride saw all this, and was not too pleased; her ambitious schemes were thwarted, and she had serious thoughts of retiring from the contest by leaving his service, when something happened to give her fresh hope.

Myrtle and her father had gone to a party, leaving her at home, as she pleaded indisposition. An unusual thing for him he left his keys on the drawing-room table, being rather hurried in getting away. She pounced upon them with secret joy and triumph; she could now penetrate to Blue Beard's chamber, and discover something of importance. She was sure he kept all his important correspondence there, and she hoped to discover its hiding-place.

Armed with a candle and matches, she stole out, and having tried the door till she found the right key, unlooked it, and entered.

Lighting the candle, she looked around, and was rather disappointed to find it all so commonplace. She saw the glass jars, but wisely resolved not to meddle with them, and was right, for they contained deadly poisons.

The curtain next attracted her attention and drawing it softly aside, she started on seeing that waxen face. Its resemblance to Erle Peyton struck her instantly, as did also the peculiar V-shape mark on the left cheek.

"This, then, is his enemy, the Duke of Brittany," she said to herself. "I would know him if I saw him among a thousand. Strange that Mr. Dene should keep such a memento here. I am sure there is some dark secret connected with his life. If I can only find the hiding-place of his letters I may learn what that secret is."

She espied an escritoire, which she was not long in unlocking.

A novice in the art of ransacking drawers would have left traces of his or her handiwork behind. Not so she; each packet was looked over, and put back exactly as before.

A book of MS. proved a rich prize; it was headed "My Diary." At first she thought of reading it there; but the spot was too gruesome for one possessed of such delicate, sensitive nerves as hers. Concealing the precious treasure in her pocket, she tried to open the door, but failed.

Mr. Dene alone knew the secret of the lock from the inside; she was fairly trapped, caught, "hoist with her own petard."

He would return, miss her, and all be discovered; then disgrace, with one fell swoop, would overwhelm her. She grew sick at heart, and dizzy at the awful prospect—at the being found out. In unearthing the family skeleton, she had become clasped in its bony arms, and saw those sightless sockets glaring at her.

Her state of terror was pitiable, and the thought that perhaps days might elapse before the door—a massive one—could be broken through, added poignancy to it.

Summoning up courage, she once more essayed to discover the secret of the lock, but in vain.

It occurred to her that her immunity from disgrace would consist in mastering the contents of the diary, which, if it contained any secrets, would enable her to defy him.

But the effort to read was fruitless; the words swam before her eyes like phantoms, and she closed the book with a little cry of despair. What was she to do—how to act? If she shouted ever so for help, her cries would not be heard. To pass a whole night drawing-room, and a doctor sent for in haste.

Miss Becky Pride was found in an insensible condition, and lying at her feet was the purloined diary.

Myrtle picked it up mechanically; but on recognizing her father's handwriting, placed it hastily in her pocket.

Meanwhile, the burglar had been placed in a room to await the coming of the police.

. . . . . .

"Wants to see me, Manvers?' said Mr. Dene, when the butler delivered the burglar's message.

"Yes, sir; says it's important. It will be too late when the police arrives."

"Perhaps he wants to give up what he has stolen," Dene remarked. "I will see him."

"Now, my man, what is it?" he asked, sternly, on entering the room.

"Is anyone listening, sir?' said the fellow

"No! you can speak out; but be quick."

'I'm Jack Skinner, sir. My missus brought up your daughter, Miss Myrtle," he said, with a whine. "But it isn't for that I asked you to come. When you took her away from us a gent came to ask about her; he had three moles on his cheek, like the letter V."

"Good Heavens!" Mr. Dene exclaimed, thrown off his guard for the moment.

"We met him again, sir, only to day—Heaven's truth, we did, sir; and he wanted to know where you were, very bad. We wouldn't tell him, sir, no fear! without first seeing you. I took a drop too much to drink, sir, and forgot myself. Don't look me up—please don't, for Miss Myrtle's sake! We was as kind as poor folk could be to her, sir, all those years."

"I am afraid I can't help you; you have been guilty of violence, as well as robbery," he returned, severely.

"It was only a tap on the arm, sir; the young gent will soon get over that. If you just cut those cords, I can get out through the windows, and no one can say you helped me. If I'm had up before the beak, I must tell everything."

Bertram Dene winced at this veiled threat. Publicity was what he most dreaded at this crisis in his affairs, for Myrtle's sake as well as his own.

In a few minutes he had freed the wretch from the cords, saying:

"You must leave England to-morrowr. I will find the money. Where can I meet you?"

"At the Fulham side of Putney Bridge.'

"At what hour?"

"Twelve o'clock in the day."

"I'll be there!"

At the door Mr. Dene turned, and said, in a loud voice:

"I regret your position, my man; but cannot help you. The law must take its course."

He locked the door, and put the key in his pocket.

When the police arrived their prisoner had flown, and though a strict search was made of the grounds, no trace of him was found.

The police investigated the affair of the burglary next morning, and traced heavy footsteps in the direction of the river; but here the clue failed.

Miss Becky could give no information whatever about the affair, except that she was attacked suddenly, and quickly rendered insensible.

Naturally the matter made a great stir, especially when it became known that the burglar had assaulted young Mr. Peyton.

Mr. Dene took the affair very quietly, and made light of the loss the robbery had entailed will dismiss her on the instant."

"She has suspected something for some time past; the story she told us, as related by Lady Rose, proves that much. If I dismiss her, I cannot muzzle her tongue, child. The Duke would hear of it, and frustrate all the plans I have weaved to establish my innocence."

'Why should you fear that man, papa? 'Tis he who ought to tremble, to think that you have escaped—that you are alive to crack him down—to exact a terrible vengeance for all the wrongs he has inflicted upon your innocent head. Oh, that I were a man, instead of a weak woman! I would soon force him to do you justice. As for this woman, she must and shall be crushed!"

"I do not fear him because of any further injury he could inflict upon me. My liberty is not in jeopardy. In England I am, and can remain, a free man—there is no extradition treaty for such a case as mine; but I do tremble lest he should learn of your existence. Already he has been trying to discover you."

"Who told you that?' she asked, eagerly.

"Skinner—the man who committed the burglary," he answered; "he said that only the previous day the Duke recognized him and wanted your address and mine. 'Twas to prevent him gaining the information that I let the burglar escape, and gave him a large sum of money next day to frank him and his wife to America."

"The duke, black hearted and unscrupulous as he is, dare not molest me, papa. The whole of England—all the civilized world—would hound him down if he dared to hurt even a hair of my head," she said, with ringing defiance in her voice.

"He is too cunning to attempt anything openly, my child, and I am too wary to invite attack. I am rich enough to bribe Miss Pride to keep silent. Patience gained me my liberty: thrice I attempted to escape, was caught, flogged, chained—almost starved; but my goalers could not break my spirit or crush my resolution, and to day I stand here, a free man."

"It is cruel to have to submit tamely," she sighed, her proud nature rebelling at the mere thought of that woman having the power to injure them.

"Bitterly cruel, I admit; but our turn will come, child—endurance now leads to future victory," he said, kissing her forehead tenderly with deep admiration shining in his eyes of her noble courage.

"May I speak to her on the matter? I promise to be prudent, not to let one angry word—a single reproach—escape me. Perhaps she will give me some insight into her motive, and prepare you to come to some arrangement."

"Yes; I will trust you, Myrtle, with this delicate negotiation. You have shown a self-possession—a tact—far beyond your years. Make her no offer—do not even hint at such a thing: merely probe her purpose, if possible."

Myrtle nodded, and hastened to fight out this battle, woman to woman. The fair fame of her noble father was at stake, and for it she would fight like a tigress robbed of its young.

Miss Pride lay on the couch in her room, a prey, not to remorse, but fear.

She had eaten the bread and salt of these people, had been treated loyally, generously, as a friend—not a dependant; yet she thought not of the treachery she had been guilty of.

She was self—all self—and wanted to make Mr. Dene wed her, not from love, but fear. She expected a visit from him; but instead Myrtle came, her face showing no index of the passion that was consuming her.

"Papa thanks you for taking such care of his keys," she said, with a smile; "he has a lot of valuables in his study. What a blessing the burglar did not find them!"

Miss Becky gave her a searching glance; but she did not flinch under it. It was woman to woman—cunning opposed to craft. "I am so pleased I have been of service to him, dear," she purred. "Sometimes one hides away things they would not let others see for the world."

"Papa has no secrets from me that I am aware of," Myrtle replied, softly. "Even if anyone had ventured into his study their search would not have availed them much."

"Perhaps not, dear; he knows best," she said, looking Myrtle straight in the eyes.

"Of course; I have seen everything—even to the face in the corner; did you, Miss Pride?"

"I—— Surely you don't think I would be guilty of such conduct, Miss Dene?"

"We don't merely think—we are sure you entered the room," remarked Myrtle, pleasantly. "He is not a bit angry, only amused at your curiosity. You found it a Blue Beard's chamber, perhaps?"

"I tell you, I did not——"

"Come, dear, there's no occasion to fence with the matter. I found a book lying at your feet, entitled "My Diary." I hope you found it amusing reading?"

Finding further prevarication useless, Becky Pride said, significantly:

"It was the story of a life."

"Exactly; but not papa's. He is amusing himself by writing a novel which, for thrilling interest, will astonish the readers of fiction; Would you object to acting as his amanuensis?"

"I have a perfect right to put my own construction on the matter," she said, shifting her eyes uneasily under Myrtle's keen gaze.

"But why should you not accept my definition, dear Miss Pride?" Myrtle asked, half-mockingly. "Surely, you can have no ulterior motive in view?"

"I decline to discuss the matter further now, Miss Dene," she said, snappishly. "If Mr. Dene will favour me with a private interview, I will gratify him with my opinions. I think he will, in his own interest."

"Certainly there can be no great danger in his granting that, Miss Pride—he is not easily captivated or intimidated. I will tell him of your wish," said Myrtle, with playful irony, as she left the apartment.

To herself she almost hissed, "Viper that we have warmed in our bosom, how I detest, scorn you! You are too contemptible for hate even! We shall see who wins—you or I!"

The most magnificent house in Paris was that of Charles, Duke of Brittany. It was a palatial and elegant mansion in the Rue de Lille, with a noble garden, groves of forest trees, and a wide expanse of lawn in its rear.

Furnished regardless of expense, it stood out premier among the many luxurious homes of that period. The ducal arms figured above the portico, and the ducal crest was emblazoned on everything, bespeaking pride of ancestry as well as lavish display.

The duke was well known in political as well as fashionable circles, and as well disliked. He was a creature of intrigue, of unbridled passion and stubborn pride, possessed, too, of an inflexible, unyielding will.

He was seated in the grand salon, filled with objects of virtu—pictures, vases, priceless porcelain and innumerable treasures from every clime—reading the Moniteur, in irreproachable dress—an Adonis of fifty summers.

summers.

A servant presented a card on a gold salver, bowing low and obsequiously, as if approaching a deity.

"Pierre Verlon, Notary, Paris,' was inscribed on the card.

"Show him in here," was the haughty response, accompanied by a dignified wave of a hand on which rare gems glistened.

Enter Pierre Verlon in rusty black; a stooping figure, bristling grey eyebrows surmounting eyes of piercing blackness—not by any means a person in keeping with the refined surroundings of the apartment, but a man of parts for all that.

"Monsieur, your pleasure?' said the duke, hardly deigning to look up from his paper.

"It is important enough for you to put down your paper and attend to it, monseigneur," was the calm reply.

"You are uncouth," was the disdainful reply.

"Bnt a lover of truth; one who holds your honour and fame in his hands," was the bold reply.

"My lacqueys shall show you the door," was the angry retort.

"What matters?" came cool reply, accompanied by a shrug. "All Paris shall ring with the perfidy of the noble Duke of Brittany."

"You dare this?"

"Yes—your victim, the husband of your sister, has escaped from Siberia, and his child lives and is with him."

"'Tis false!" hisses the duke.

"You only believe what suits you, monseigneur. I tell you truths."

"Well, what of that!—he is still a criminal," was the sneering reply.

"Not so—a martyr, and you know it. Don't knit your brows; I care naught for your anger, A Frenchman is not fallen so low as to fear even a perjured duke. Be calm—the witnesses you suborned are known to me, and have confessed. You see I am armed with facts; you have only the memory of past misdeeds to support you."

"Did he send you here?"

"I wanted no sending. I am his friend, I protected his child, and I, noble duke, mean to stand by him to the end."

"He wants money," the duke sneered.

"Pish! he is almost as rich as you, and will be wealthier when he wrings from you his wife's fortune. If you are wise you will conciliate him, not defy."

"What is it you want?" he asked, grinding his teeth with impotent rage.

"A written confession of his innocence."

"That he shall never receive from me," he cried, revengefully.

"As you please, I give you an opportunity of hushing this grave scandal up. It may transpire that you not only employed false witnesses to swear away his life, but kidnapped his wife, murdered her perhaps," said the notary, with imperturbable calmness of manner and speech, and keeping his eyes fixed on his face.

Every drop of blood left the duke's face, which became the colour of marble, and for the moment the notary thought he was dying.

Gen. Boulanger, in London, received an offer from an American of a lucrative invitation to make a tour through American cities and ventilate his ideas on the French republic.

There is an amusing story told of a Delaware man, who received a "horning" because he married within a month after his first wife's death. He told the serenaders that he didn't think it showed good taste to come banging around a man's house so soon after a funeral.

PIANOS ON THE

3 YEARS SYSTEM

A regular monthly, quarterly or half-yearly payment (a slight advance on the rental rate) buys the instrument.

Any piano may be chosen out of a magnificent assortment of Uprights, Squares, and Grands, unsurpassed in quality and value. Ministers, Teachers, Governmen Officers, and those in receipt of regular incomes will find this a convenient and advantageous mode for securing a first-class instrument. When the instrument is used for practice, our Soft Stop or Practice Pedal saves wear on the nerves, as well as preserves the tone of the piano. Our Patent Foot Pedal attachment for Pianos is invaluable to organists, students, and teachers. Prices on application. Inspection invited.

—We wish the readers of the EXPRESS a right Merry Christmas and a year of peace and plenty during 1890.

—Financial statements for the various municipalities are being published this week. The electors will soon have plenty of figures over which to puzzle their brains.

—A choice lot of jewelry embracing all of the novelties in rings, bracelets, brooches, &c., just to hand at F. W. Smith & Bro. These goods are just the thing for Christmas presents.

—Miss Eva Taylor, one of the most popular teachers in Napanee, was made the recipient of a handsome jewel case and an address from her pupils. The recognition was well merited.

—W. E. Baker has recently put in a stock of choicest and latest designs of picture frame mouldings and is prepared to frame pictures on the shortest notice and at prices to suit the times.

—Prof. Loisette's Memory System is creating greater interest than ever in all parts of the county, and persons wishing to improve their memory should send for his prospectus, free, as advertised in another column. 5189d

—W. E. Baker has recently put in a stock of choicest and latest designs of picture frame mouldings, and is prepared to frame pictures on the shortest notice and at prices to suit the times.

—In table ware, such as knives, forks, spoons etc., we take the lead as we have the sole right of selling the best make, that is Reed & Bartin's. Engraving free. F. Chinneck.

—Space will not permit of an extended notice regarding the death of the late Mrs. Mitchell. The circumstances are peculiarly sad and we extend our deepest sympathy to her husband, as well as to her father and mother.

—For sale.—One of the most comfortable homes in Napanee. A good brick house, good barn, hard and soft water, gas, furnace and well situated. Easy terms of payment. A bargain for somebody. Apply at THE EXPRESS office.

—Nothing but words of praise have reached us regarding our Christmas EXPRESS. From all parts of the Province come compliments on the tasty appearance of our special number. The EXPRESS aims to keep in the lead, and we are encouraged to go on by the generous support that has been accorded us.

—Nominations on Amherst Island take place on Monday next, one week earlier than in the other municipalities of this County. It is currently reported that Robert Patterson, Esq., will be a candidate for the Reeveship. Other names are also mentioned, but Monday next will settle the question whether or not he is to have opposition.

—There will be the Annual Oyster Supper in the Anderson Church, North Fredericksburgh, on New Years night. If you have ever attended one of these suppers you know that a good time can be relied on. Special pains will be taken to make this the best of the list. Further particulars next week.

—The N. T. & Q. is now an established fact, and close connection with the C.P.R., east and west, can be made any day. Parties going to any point on the C. P. R. should try the new line. You can buy through tickets to Manitoba, British Columbia and all points in the United States, over the N. T. & Q. and C. P. R., from W. D. Madden. Baggage checked to destination.

—We have been asked if we intended replying to the Beaver's scurrilous innendos of last week, and our reply was "No. An innendo is always cowardly and needs no reply."

—F. W. Smith & Bro., are the only manufacturing jewelers in this part of Ontario. If they haven't got what you want, they will make it for you on very short notice.

—There will be a free excursion from Tweed and other points to Napanee, on Monday next. Come to Napanee and see our fine stores and tempting bargains. The special train is expected to arrive in Napanee shortly after nine o'clock and will remain until about half past four. We trust that it will be crowded.

Presentation.

Last evening about twenty young ladies called at the Western Methodist Church Parsonage, and requested to see Mrs. J. C. Drewry, who, with Mr. Drewry and others, was spending the evening with Mr. and Mrs. Johnson. They were ushered into the spacious drawing-room and presented Mrs. Drewry with a large framed photograph of her Bible class accompanied by the following address:—

Address to Mrs. J. C. Drewry from her Sabbath school class, on the occasion of her removal from Napanee to Toronto, December 1889.

MRS. J. C. DREWRY:

Dear Teacher and Friend,—On this the eve of your departure from our midst, we, the scholars of your Sabbath school class, desire to approach you with an expression of our feelings, which are those of mingled gladness and sorrow.

Gladness, because of the privilege enjoyed and blessings received under your faithful tuition in Holy things. Your instruction, so wise and deep, so kind and winning, has brought us into a richer experience of heart and life, than could otherwise have been ours. We have learned of Christ from you in such a measure, as we believe, will be a benediction to us while life shall last, and lead us finally to a higher place in His Celestial Kingdom.

Sorrow we experience because brought to the necessity of saying farewell. It is not possible for us to part with one we had so learned to love and esteem, without a sense of pain. Yet we doubt not God's hand is leading you and that in some other church and school you will be made a blessing, as you have been here and to us.

Believing that while we have regarded you affectionately, you have also cared for us, we take the liberty of offering you this reminder of our faces, and ask that when you look upon this group, you will think of us as friends.

Our sincere desire and prayer is, that Our Father in Heaven may ever richly bless you and yours, with all the gifts of His Grace, and bounties of His Providence and that when we each have spent a useful life on earth, we may all meet in Heaven. Yours,

YOUR BIBLE CLASS.

Mrs. Drewry made a feeling reply, in which she urged the class to follow Christ faithfully. After prayer by Rev. C. O. Johnston, a few minutes was spent in social intercourse and the young ladies withdrew. Mrs. Dr. Edwards, who takes charge of the class for the future, was also present.

PERSONAL.

—H. V. Fralick has been laid up with a bad attack of neuralgia.

—Mrs. Eva Allison, of Picton, mother of Mrs. J. C. Drewry, is seriously ill.

—Rev. S. Card and wife, have gone to Brockville to spend the Christmas holidays.

—Mr. D. W. Fralick has been poorly since last September and lately has been confined to his house most of the time.

—W. A. Wilson, of Richmond, has just returned from Albert College where he has put in a highly successful term. He is taking two years Collegiate work in one, and at the examinations just held, Mr. Wilson came off with flying colors, passing in every subject.

—Word has been received from Toronto that Mort. Lane passed his first term examinations at the head of the list. He received the highest possible marks, one hundred per cent. His many Napanee friends will join with us in extending heartiest congratulations.

—New Goods—You ought to see the new stock of Christmas Goods now arriving at the 7 Cent Store in toys, crockery, glassware, vases, china cups and saucers, mouth organs, dolls, knives, purses, toy tea setts, toy furniture, drums, steam engines, and thousaads of new novelties. West of the Campbell house.

—A. S. Kimmerly still takes the lead; 13 lbs extra granulated sugar for $1; best Coal oil, 15 cts. per gallon; fine mixed candy, 2 lbs for 25 cts; choice 50 cent tea, 25 cts; good tea, 15 cts. I have also a stock of the finest Western flour always on hand, and am selling away below all others. 17 lbs. new currants, $1. It will pay you to call and see our stock. Remember I will not be undersold.

—Cash boy wanted. Apply to Lahey & McKenty.

—Wanted.—To purchase. a small brick house. Apply at THE EXPRESS office.

—Two farms to rent.—Apply at once to J. C. Drewry, at the Napanee EXPRESS office.

—For sale—A first class brick house in thorough repair. For particulars apply at THE EXPRESS office. adv. tf.

—A quantity of picket fence for sale at a bargain. In good repair, posts and all complete. Apply at THE EXPRESS office. tf.

—W. E. Baker has recently put in a stock of choicest and latest designs of picture frame mouldings and is prepared to frame pictures on the shortest notice and at prices to suit the times.

—F. W. Smith & Bro., of the Napanee Jewelry Store are just entering upon their twenty-first business year in Napanee, and this Christmas they lead the trade, as they have always done, and they are fully prepared to cane Ministers, Editors, or other public characters, with their gold and silver headed canes. adv

—Send to 9 Adelaide St., West, Toronto, for a Free Sample opy of the Fireside Weekly, a finely illustrated and interesting story paper, and so realize what an extraordinary offer we are making when we agree to send both the NAPANEE EXPRESS and Fireside Weekly for $2.25 when the Fireside alone is $2 a year. Now is the time to subscribe and receive the benefit of this great offer.

—Note this—to new subscribers we will send The Napanee EXPRESS and that spicy publication the Detroit Free Press—for four months to any address in Canada or the United States for forty cents. Only ten cents a month for two splendid newspapers. The EXPRESS and Detroit Free Press to anyone for one year for $1.75. Send in your orders.

—The improved Pease Furnace has a larger heating capacity than any other warm air furnace invented. The fire pots are heavier than those of any other. All parts above the cast iron fire pot are made of heavy wrought Scotch plate steel. Nine tenths of the furnaces put up in Toronto where they are made, and three fourths in Napanee are the Pease furnaces. Proof positive they are the best. BOYLE & SON, Sole Agents.

—The Christmas number of the Globe has been received and words completely fail us as we attempt a description of this most artistic number. Mr. C. W. Taylor, the business manager of the Globe, deserves the highest credit for his undertaking and successfully publishing such a beautiful work. The two plates "Friends" and "Canadian Militia" are gems; the press work, illustrations and paper are just what they ought to be, and Mr. Taylor can congratulate himself on having produced the finest Christmas number ever offered to the Canadian public.

Use GRANGE'S COUGH-NOT

tion. Low rates. good accommodation.

—Word was received here on Wednesday that Mark R. Hanover, one of the waterworks contractors, had died at New York city. Mr. Hanover had made many friends in Napanee during his visits to this place and, had won the esteem of all with whom he came in contact. Mr. Hanover's death will not interfere with the completion of the waterworks in accordance with the terms of the contract.

—A clock that will keep good time is necessary in every home. You can buy one from F. W. Smith & Bro., at astonishingly low prices.

—There will be a grand Conversazione and Concert in aid of the R. C. church Centreville, on Wednesday evening, January 8th, 1890. An efficient orchestra will furnish good dance music. Dancing all the evening after the concert. Refreshments served. Tickets forty cents, or seventy-five cents for a lady and gentleman. Rev. Father Hartigan invites everybody to participate.

THE CANADIAN HORTICULTURIST improves every year, both in appearance, illustrations, colored plates and reading matter. Every fruit grower, gardener and farmer should have it. The editor is a practical fruit grower, and the other writers are the leading practicalgardeners and fruit growers in Ontario. One dollar, addressed to the editor, Grimsby, Ont, secures this monthly, the interesting Annual Report of the Fruit Growers, and a choice of plants for testing. 2-2in.

—Watches, clocks, jewelry, silverware, and spectacles. The cheapest place in Napanee is at Chinneck's.

—Bills have been issued for a grand Anniversary Tea meeting to be held in the Hawley Methodist church on New Year's Eve, December 31st. A platform meeting will take place immediately after the tea, and good speeches are promised. The Anniversary sermons will be preached on Sunday, December 29th 1889, by Rev. A. B. Chambers, and others. Rev. H. I. Allen is the pastor of the Hawley church, a sufficient guarantee that everything will be run on right principles.

—Next Monday evening the Annual Concert given in aid of the poor of the town, will be held in the Town Hall. There will be a choice programme, both literary and musical, and all who attend will be sure of receiving good value for their money. In addition to other attractions, Rev. C. O. Johnston will sing a song and play his own accompainment on a guitar. By going to the Concert you will be aiding a worthy cause. Don't fail to attend, but if you cannot go, buy a ticket anyway. Let the Poor Fund Concert be the biggest success of the season.

—Read the advertisement of F. W. Smith & Bro. They offer great bargains in Watches and Silverware. Wouldn't your wife like a nice watch for a Christmas present?

—A large number of farmers go from Lennox to Deseronto to attend market and do their trading. Some effort should be made to draw these parties to Napanee, and we believe that a step in the right direction would be the abolition of market fees. The matter of five cents does not appear to be much, but all the same it sends a good many farmers to Deseronto, where they have a free market. The loss to the merchants is considerable, and we believe that they would be consulting their own interest if they would agitate for a free market. A trip to the Deseronto market on any Saturday will satisfy anyone that our statement is correct.

teading heartiest congratulations.
